PEOPLE ex rel. NORTHWESTERN MUT. FIRE ASS'N v. STANLEY, County Superintendent of Schools. (L. A. 7145.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 1, 1924. Rehearing Denied May 1, 1924.)

1. Schools and school districts 🔑79—Authority of trustees to place insurance on school property purely statutory.

Boards of trustees of school districts possess no authority to place insurance of the school property other than that granted to them by Pol. Code, § 1608, subd. 3.

2. Statutes 🔑190—Legislative intent determined from language used if free from ambiguity.

To ascertain the intent of the Legislature in enacting a statute, recourse must first be had to the language of the statute itself, and if the words, given their ordinary and popular signification, are reasonably free from ambiguity and uncertainty, the courts will look no further to ascertain its meaning.

3. Schools and school districts 🔑79—Board of trustees could not place fire insurance with mutual company organized under laws of another state.

Under Pol. Code, § 1608, subd. 3, empowering boards of school trustees to insure school property, "such insurance to be written in any solvent insurance company doing business in this state or in any mutual insurance company organized under the laws of this state," a school board had no power to place fire insurance on school property with a mutual insurance company organized under the laws of another state.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Petition for a writ of mandate by the People, on the relation of the Northwestern Mutual Fire Association, a corporation, against Grace C. Stanley, as County Superintendent of Schools of San Bernardino County, to compel approval of a warrant for premium on a policy of fire insurance. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hahn & Hahn, of Pasadena, and Shank, Belt, & Fairbrook, of Seattle, Wash., for appellant.

T. W. Duckworth and John L. Campbell, both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of the county of San Bernardino, after an order made by said court sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's petition for a writ of mandate, requiring her, in her capacity of county superintendent of schools of said county, to approve a warrant issued by the Alta Loma school district to the Northwestern Mutual Fire Association, in payment of an annual premium upon a policy of fire insurance taken out by said district in said association, and covering certain property of the school district.

The petitioner, in the opening averment of its petition, sets forth that "it is a mutual fire insurance company, organized under the laws of the state of California"; in the next paragraph of its petition, however, in connection with its averment that it is qualified to do business as a mutual fire insurance association in the state of California, it refers to the certificate of compliance with the laws of said state, issued by the insurance commissioner thereof, attaching said certificate to its complaint as Exhibit A, and expressly making the same a part of its said complaint "as fully as if set forth herein." By reference to said certificate it is found to be recited therein that "the Northwestern Mutual Fire Association of Seattle, Washington, is duly organized under the laws of the state of Washington and is authorized by this department to issue policies and transact business of mutual fire and automobile insurance." The plaintiff also incorporates in its bill for the insurance premium upon which the warrant which the respondent failed to approve was issued and in which it describes itself as "Northwestern Mutual Fire Insurance Association of Seattle, Washington." In the opening brief of the appellant its counsel asserts that "the petition sets forth that Northwestern Mutual Fire Insurance Association is a mutual fire insurance company organized under the laws of the state of Washington," and it is nowhere stated or argued in said brief that the petitioner is other than a mutual insurance company organized under the laws of another state.

The decision of the trial court in sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the petition herein was evidently based upon the fact that the petitioner was not a mutual insurance company organized under the laws of this state, and for that reason did not come within the permissive authority given to boards of trustees of school districts to place insurance upon the school property of their respective districts under the provisions of section 1608, subdivision 3, of the Political Code. The said section of said Code, as it stood at the time the contract of insurance involved in this proceeding was entered into, read, in part, as follows:

> "1608. Boards of school trustees and city boards of education shall have power, and it shall be their duty: * * * Third—To furnish, repair, and insure and in their discretion, rent, the school property of their respective districts, such insurance to be written in any solvent insurance company, doing business in this state, or in any mutual insurance company organized under the laws of this state."

[1-3] It would seem that the foregoing provision of the Political Code is susceptible of an interpretation which is at once simple and natural, and which is entirely relieved of the labored and involved reasoning insisted upon by the appellant as the proper means of arriving at its meaning. Boards of trustees of school districts possess no authority to place insurance of the school property of their respective districts other than granted to them by the foregoing section of the Political Code. Its mode is the measure of their power. It is a cardinal rule, applicable to the interpretation of statutes, that, in order to ascertain the intent of the Legislature in enacting the same, recourse must first be had to the language of the statute itself, and that if the words of the enactment, given their ordinary and popular signification, are reasonably free from ambiguity and uncertainty, the courts will look no further to ascertain its meaning. Tynan v. Walker, 35 Cal. 634, 95 Am. Dec. 152; Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1–28, 16 Pac. 345; Merkley v. Williams, 3 Cal. App. 268, 84 Pac. 1015; King v. Armstrong, 9 Cal. App. 368, 99 Pac. 527; Sacramento County v. Glann, 14 Cal. App. 780, 113 Pac. 360; Smith v. Union Oil Co., 166 Cal. 217, 135 Pac. 966. The obvious meaning to be given to the language of said section of the Political Code is this, that boards of school trustees are given power and it is their duty to insure the school property of their respective districts in any solvent insurance company doing business in this state, provided that, if they select a mutual insurance company to carry their insurance, it must be a mutual insurance company organized under the laws of this state. The question as to whether the mutual insurance company to which the choice of boards of trustees of school districts is thus confined is solvent or insolvent does not arise in this case, for the reason that the petitioner herein does not come within such limitation, and was therefore not qualified in either event to be awarded this insurance. It follows that the respondent herein, in her capacity of county superintendent of schools of San Bernardino county, properly refused to approve the petitioner's warrant for the premium upon its void insurance policy.

The judgment is affirmed.

NATIONAL ENGINEERING CORPORATION et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 7865.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 1, 1924.)

1. Master and servant 🔑416—Award not invalid because not specifically terminating temporary disability compensation.

Though the Industrial Accident Commission finds an injured employee entitled to temporary disability compensation indefinitely, its order of award is not invalid because of its failure to specifically terminate its award at the end of 240 weeks from the injury, the maximum temporary disability period under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 9(b) 2(4); the award terminating by operation of law at the end of that period.

2. Master and servant 🔑419—Compensation award for permanent disability, though purporting to be final, may be changed to one for temporary disability.

Though the Industrial Accident Commission's award of permanent disability payment purports to be a "final decision," it, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20(d), having continuing jurisdiction over its orders, decisions, and awards, may reopen the matter, and, on further testimony showing a temporary disability for which payment would be greater than the permanent disability payment, change the award to one for temporary disability payment; the employee under section 9(b) 2(8) being entitled, not to both, but to the greater.

3. Master and servant 🔑419—Commission's finding on reopening compensation case held to amount to one that disability had recurred.

The finding of the Industrial Accident Commission, after reopening case, that employee's injury "caused a temporary total disability * * * continuing from * * * (a date subsequent to the previous award) indefinitely," held, in view of entire proceeding, to amount to one that the disability had "recurred"; a fact, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20(d), authorizing the Commission to increase the previous award.

4. Master and servant ⚿417(7)—Finding on evidence in compensation case conclusive.

The finding of the Industrial Accident Commission on a disputed question of fact cannot be disturbed when there is evidence in the record supporting its conclusion.

In Bank.

Certiorari by the National Engineering Corporation and another against the Industrial Accident Commission of California and another. Writ discharged, and award affirmed.

Geo. H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. This is a proceeding in certiorari, instituted by National Engineering Corporation and the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, of London, England, its insurance carrier, to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in the matter of the application of respondent J. C. Westhafer for compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831). Westhafer was injured December 19, 1918, while employed as a pipefitter in the service of the Engineering corporation. It is admitted that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment, was proximately caused thereby, and occurred while the employee was performing service growing out of and incidental to his work. He fell a distance of some 20 feet, sustaining a serious fracture of the right femur and a fracture of the front of the skull. He was unconscious for 10 days, after which time the head injury was not particularly disabling, although it is asserted by respondents that throughout the entire pendency of the proceeding before the Commission he complained of headaches and pains in the head. The fractured leg proved to be of a serious nature. Westhafer was kept in the hospital from the date of his injury to August 30, when he was discharged. Two weeks later an abscess developed at the site of the fracture of the thighbone, which necessitated further treatment. Thereafter he was disabled on several occasions by recurrent abscesses of the bone, an ailment described by the physician as "recurrent osteomyelitis." Medical, surgical, and hospital treatment was furnished, and the insurance carrier paid Westhafer compensation benefits, other than such medical and hospital care, to April 13, 1921.

On January 4, 1922, Westhafer filed an application with the respondent Commission to have the extent of his disability determined. He represented that he was totally disabled from the date of his accident to March, 1920. The Commission found that the injury caused a permanent disability, consisting of shortening of the right leg and limited motion of the knee joint, which, for applicant's age—57 years—and occupation, was held to equal 27 per cent. of total disability. On April 24, 1922, Westhafer was accordingly awarded compensation for this permanent partial disability, for the period of 108 weeks, in the sum of $1,702.08. No special mention is made in these findings of the recurring abscesses of the bone from which the applicant was suffering, and which necessitated his return to the hospital for treatment, but the record shows that such condition of the applicant's leg was inquired into, and was considered, by the Commission. There was testimony indicating that the inflamed condition and the recurring abscesses were eliminated, or would probably subside in time. Westhafer applied for a rehearing, after the decision of the Commission, and claimed that the temporary disability, due to repeated hospitalization and treatment for the recurrent abscesses, entitled him to more than the permanent partial disability indemnity he had been allowed. The Commission granted the application, and on rehearing, took further testimony. After considering this evidence, it made the following finding:

> "It now appearing to the satisfaction of this Commission that the applicant's temporary disability would still entitle him to less compensation than that herein awarded for permanent disability, and that since the date of said award further payments have been made thereon so that the sum of $1,702.08 has now been fully paid, it is ordered that said findings and award of April 24, 1922, be and they are hereby confirmed and adopted as the final decision herein."

This finding and order of the Commission amounts to a determination that, under the provisions of section 9 (b) 2 (8) of the Workmen's Compensation Act (to be hereinafter referred to), and as between temporary and permanent disability payments, Westhafer was entitled to the amount already awarded by the Commission as the "greater of the two," and had not been prejudiced by the first award.

Following the second hearing, Westhafer appears to have had further trouble with his leg, necessitating his return to the hospital and further operations to relieve the condition. On March 14, 1923, he filed a petition for further compensation, upon the ground that he had sustained additional temporary disability since the period covered by the previous decision on rehearing, and that the temporary disability had now exceeded the permanent. The case was reopened and much additional testimony was taken concerning the condition of the applicant's injured leg since the last hearing. On July 19, 1923, the Commission entered its decision upon this claim for supplemental award for further disability. It found that the injury sustained by Westhafer caused temporary total disability, due to a swollen and ulcerous condition of the leg between the knee and ankle, continuing from September 13, 1922, indefinitely. It accordingly made a supplemental award in applicant's favor and against the insurance carrier of the employer, in addition to the compensation previously awarded under date of April 24, 1922, in the sum of $538.09, payable forthwith, and that, beginning as of May 11, 1923, applicant be paid the sum of $15.76 a week until the termination of disability and the further order of the Commission. It is this order and award which is attacked on this proceeding.

[1] It is first contended that the Industrial Accident Commission had no power to make an award for temporary disability covering a period beyond 240 weeks from the date of the injury; that to do so would be a violation of section 9 (b) 2 (4) of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The Commission concedes that it cannot award compensation for any temporary disability beyond the two hundred and fortieth week from the injury. The date of the order complained of is July 19, 1923, the last day of the two hundred and thirty-ninth week after the injury. While the Commission found Westhafer entitled to temporary disability compensation from September 13, 1922, indefinitely, the award would terminate, by operation of law, on July 26, 1923. The validity of the order is not affected by the failure of the Commission to specifically terminate its allowance as to that date. Southwestern Surety Insurance Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 768, 773, 158 Pac. 762.

[2] It is next contended by the petitioners that the original award made on April 24, 1922, had become final, and that the Commission had no jurisdiction to reopen the case and make a supplemental allowance to the applicant. Section 20 (d) of the Workmen's Compensation Act provides that the Industrial Accident Commission shall have continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions, and awards made and entered under the provisions of the act, and may at any time, within 245 weeks from the date of the injury, upon notice and after opportunity to be heard is given to the parties in interest, rescind, alter, or amend any such order, decision, or award made by it, upon good cause appearing therefor. It is further provided that such power shall include the right to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate, within the limitations prescribed by the act, any compensation awarded, upon the ground that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished, or terminated. Any such order, decision, or award will have the same effect as is provided in the act for the original orders, decisions, or awards of the Commission. The mere fact that in the order and award of October 19, 1922, the Commission purported to make such award its "final decision" avails nothing, for it could not, by such attempted adjudication, deprive itself of the jurisdiction vested in it by the statute. Section 9 (b) 2 (8) of the act provides that where an injury causes both temporary and permanent disability, the injured employee shall not be entitled to both a temporary and permanent disability payment, but only the greater of the two. This court has held that the power of the Commission, under this section, to allow a temporary disability payment in lieu of a permanent disability payment is one which, from the nature of the act to be accomplished, must be a continuing power and within the scope of the continuing jurisdiction of the Commission. Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Comn. (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 611. Consequently, the Commission, in the instant case, had jurisdiction to reopen the matter of the application of Westhafer for compensation, and to take further testimony and make such disposition of the matter as should be warranted by the facts developed on such re-examination.

[3, 4] The only remaining contention of the petitioners which we deem necessary to consider is the claim that there was no evidence and no finding in this case that Westhafer sustained "a new and further disability," a necessary situation, they argue, upon which to support the supplemental allowance. No special findings were made, but the ultimate fact found by the respondent Commission is that the injury sustained by the applicant "caused a temporary total disability due to a swollen and ulcerous condition of the leg between the knee and the ankle, continuing from September 13, 1922, indefinitely." Viewed in the light of the entire proceeding, this finding can be construed in no other way than as amounting to a finding that the disability of Westhafer, the person in whose favor the first and second awards were made, has "recurred." The situation thus presented justified the reopening of the case. Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20 (d). On the final hearing before the Commission, the testimony was devoted to the condition of Westhafer's leg, and his ability to work after the injury, and particularly during the period following the first rehearing. New conditions occurring since the original award were developed, and the supplemental award appears to be predicated thereon, which situation distinguishes this case from that considered in Georgia Casualty Co. v. Industrial Accident Comn., 177 Cal. 289, 170 Pac. 625, cited and relied on by petitioners. Evidence in the record supports the claim of the applicant that the injury sustained by him caused a temporary total disability following the period covered by the previous awards, and continuing indefinitely. This testimony was of a substantial kind, and justified the conclusion reached by the Commission. It had full power to determine all the disputed questions of fact which arose, and its finding cannot be disturbed where there is evidence in the record which supports its conclusion.

The writ is discharged, and the award is affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. LAND CO. v. DICKERSON. (Civ. 4182.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 21, 1924.)

1. Public lands 🔑25—Official township plats conclusive evidence of title under patent.

In a suit to quiet title to a tract of land to which plaintiff claimed title through patent, the issue being as to whether the land in question was part of a certain section in a certain township, it was not error to instruct, in the absence of any evidence impeaching them, that the official township plats were conclusive of the fact that the land in question was part of the section patented.

2. New trial 🔑39—Should be granted where instructions conflict as to material point.

Where there is a decided conflict in instructions on a material and vital point in the case, a new trial should be granted.

3. New trial 🔑66—Should be granted where proper instructions disregarded by jury.

Where the instructions are proper and legal, but disregarded by the jury as disclosed by the verdict, a new trial should be granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Land Company against W. W. Dickerson. Verdict for defendant, and, from an order granting a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 188 Cal. 113, 204 Pac. 576.

O. V. Willson, A. C. Verge, and J. B. Joujon-Roche, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank Thunen, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. The Southern Pacific Land Company, a corporation, brought a suit against defendant Dickerson for the purpose of quieting title to and recovering possession of certain land in Imperial county, Cal., and for damages for withholding possession of said land. The answer of defendant specifically denied the material allegations of the complaint, and, in addition, interposed the defense of the statute of limitations and pleaded title by adverse possession. The cause was tried before the court sitting with a jury, and a general verdict was returned in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, based principally upon the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision; that the decision was against law, and on account of errors occurring at the trial. From an order granting a motion for new trial defendant appeals.

The controversy involves the ownership of certain real property described as being a part of tract 188 of township 13 south, range 14 east, San Bernardino meridian. It appears that a part of the grant made by the United States government to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company included section 5 of the said township, and the principal question to be decided in the suit was whether or not tract 188 was a part of said section 5. Plaintiff showed title to tract 188 through a United States patent therefor granted to plaintiff's predecessor in interest, and introduced in evidence copies of United States government official instructions and plats of the survey and the resurvey of the township, which showed that tract 188 was a part of section 5. Some years before the suit was commenced, defendant had filed two separate desert land entries on the land involved herein, but each of said entries had been rejected by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and defendant's alleged adverse possession of the property rested entirely upon physical possession.

> "You are instructed that the official township plats in evidence are conclusive in this case, that the plat approved May 2, 1913, designated tract 188 of township thirteen (13), south range fourteen (14) east, S. B. M., as original section 5 of the same township and range, by the original survey of 1856.
> "You are further instructed that the patent No. 101 issued by the United States of America to Southern Pacific Railroad Company on November 9, 1915, is conclusive evidence in this case of title and right of possession in the patentee, and you are instructed that by the stipulation of counsel all right of Southern Pacific Railroad Company under said patent is vested in plaintiff Southern Pacific Land Company."

However, the jury was also instructed as follows:

> "You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the grant, under which the patent, read in evidence, was issued, did not include the particular tract of land involved in this action, then you must find for the defendant."

The following instruction was also given to the jury:

> "You are further instructed that the admitted possession by defendant of the land in suit, if at all times mentioned in the complaint, has been wrongful; that the measure of damages for wrongful possession of said real property is the value of the use of said property during the period of said wrongful possession, which in this case must date from the acquisition of title and right of possession by plaintiff, to wit: March 6, 1912. You are therefore instructed to determine from the evidence the value of said use and occupation of said land by defendant from March 6, 1912, and give a verdict accordingly."

The case of Southern Pacific Land Co. v. Meserve, 186 Cal. 157, 198 Pac. 1055, was a quiet title suit involving the same tract as is here in litigation. In that case, as here, the defendants' only claim rested upon a desert land entry which, like the two claims of the defendant in the instant case, had been rejected by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The evidence of plaintiff's title was identical with that introduced here, and defendants there made no attack upon either of the surveys or other evidence adduced by plaintiff. Among other things, the court, by Justice Shaw, said:

> "The evidence shows a straight chain of title to the plaintiff based on a patent from the United States to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, executed on November 9, 1915. * * * The patent from the United States to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company included the particular tract in controversy as a part of tract 188 of township 13 south, range 14 east, San Bernardino meridian. * * * There is a presumption that official duty has been duly performed. Since the proper officers of the United States selected and listed this land as a part of the land covered by said grant and issued the patent accordingly, the patent itself is prima facie, and in this form of action perhaps conclusive, evidence that the land was included in an odd-numbered section according to the survey of 1856, the survey in force at the date of said acts, if that fact was necessary to the validity of the patent. If in a collateral attack, such as the one here made, the patent is conclusive upon this point, there is no more to be said. If it is only prima facie evidence of the fact, it is sufficient, for in that event it puts the burden on the defendants to prove the contrary, and they introduced no evidence on the subject. * * * Furthermore, the only interest which the defendants claim in defense was under a desert land entry made by Alvin R. Meserve in 1907, and the evidence shows that on appeal by Meserve to the Secretary of the Interior this entry was canceled on February 28, 1912, prior to the completion of said resurvey and prior to the issuance of the patent to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. It would seem, therefore, that whatever may be the state of the title of the plaintiff, the defendants had no title whatever except such as comes from the bare possession at the time said resurvey was made and hence the same could not impair their rights. Under any view of the case, therefore, the finding that the title was in the plaintiff was fully sustained by the evidence."

Neither was there any direct attack made by the defendant here against either of the surveys. In the reply brief of appellant, wherein answer is made to the claim of respondent that error was committed by the trial court in permitting certain questions to be asked of witnesses attacking the validity of the several surveys, it is admitted by appellant that—

> "These questions did not attack the validity of the so-called survey; they simply show that the so-called survey was not a resurvey but a supplement to the resurvey of 1908 by which supplement certain claims were segregated and certain tracts of the resurvey of 1908 were described by a new number."

[1] Adopting, then, the rule announced in the Meserve Case that, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the surveys are conclusive, it would follow that no error was committed by the trial court in its instructions to the effect that the official township plats were conclusive of the fact that the land in question was a part of section 5.

[2, 3] It is conceded by counsel representing appellant herein that a decision is "against law" when it is contrary to the instructions. One of the instructions under consideration tells the jury that the plats are conclusive evidence that tract 188 is a part of section 5, and that plaintiff's title and right to possession under the patent, etc., are also conclusive. The second instruction informs the jury that, if they believe to the contrary of what they were informed in the former instruction was conclusive, they must find for defendant; and the third instruction tells the jury that the possession by defendant "at all times mentioned in the complaint has been wrongful," and that the jury must return a verdict against defendant for the value of the use of the property during the time defendant had possession of it. It is apparent that there is a decided conflict in the instructions to the jury upon a material and vital point in the case. The rule in such circumstances is that a new trial should be granted. Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. 253, 107 Pac. 309; Sappenfield v. Main St. Ry. Co., 91 Cal. 48, 27 Pac. 590; Estate of Cunningham, 52 Cal. 465. Had the instruction been erroneous, its disregard by the jury would not constitute legal ground for granting a new trial. O'Neill v. Thomas Day Co., 152 Cal. 361, 92 Pac. 856, 14 Ann. Cas. 970; Lucas v. Walker, 22 Cal. App. 305, 134 Pac. 374, 379; Western Pacific Land Co. v. Wilson, 19 Cal. App. 343, 125 Pac. 1076. But where, as here, the instruction was proper and legal, its disregard by the jury, as shown by its verdict, constituted such a prejudicial error to plaintiff's rights that the granting of a new trial was manifestly correct and proper in the premises.

The order granting the motion for a trial is affirmed.

BANK OF SUISUN v. FISKE et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 25, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 24, 1924.)

1. Mortgages 🔑481 — Cross-complaint and findings in foreclosure held without variance and to show open account as basis of transaction.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage involving cross-complainants, right to surplus held, that findings and allegations of cross-complaint by one claiming an equitable mortgage evidenced by a deed to him to secure loans were without material variance and showed the basis of the entire indebtedness to be an open account augmented as such by successive notes.

2. Bills and notes 🔑430—Surrender of old secured note covering open account, and giving new, does not extinguish debt.

Where an original note, with mortgage security, was given to cover the amount of an open account never paid, the subsequent surrender of the old note and giving of a new one did not extinguish the debt.

3. Mortgages 🔑28—Conveyance of property, conveyed to wife after marriage, by wife alone, as security for debt, held an equitable mortgage.

Where a wife at her husband's request, signing alone, deeded land conveyed to her after marriage, to a creditor as security for a note which was signed by both husband and wife, and both continued to obtain further moneys and credits from the creditor, held, that the wife's deed was an equitable mortgage, enforceable by the creditor against the surplus, after foreclosure of a first mortgage, since the property is presumed conveyed to her as separate property, and the mortgage presumptively valid notice to the world.

4. Husband and wife 🔑267(2)—Deed by wife alone of community property inoperative.

A conveyance of community property made and executed by the wife alone is inoperative.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Suit by the Bank of Suisun against J. Allen Fiske and others to foreclose a first mortgage, in which William Pierce and Alden Ames filed cross-complaints claiming the surplus. From a judgment for William Pierce on his cross-complaint, Alden Ames appeals. Affirmed.

W. U. Goodman, of Fairfield, for appellant.

Gregory & Goodell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. The plaintiff, the Bank of Suisun, began an action to foreclose a first mortgage upon certain lands and premises belonging to the defendant Fiske, situated in the county of Solano, upon which the respondent Pierce claims a second mortgage and the appellant Ames claims a lien by virtue of an attachment and judgment, second only to the lien held by the plaintiff. Foreclosure was had, and after the settlement of the amount due the Bank of Suisun there remained a surplus of $2,170.29. The right to this surplus gives rise to the present controversy now before this court. The respondent Pierce, to whom was awarded the sum just referred to, claims the same by virtue of a mortgage lien evidenced by certain deeds alleged as having been executed as security only. The appellant Ames, as just stated, claims the surplus by virtue of the judgment founded upon attachment proceedings instituted against the defendants Fiske, and to support his claim alleges that the lien claimed by the respondent Pierce is invalid. The trial court made lengthy findings of fact which, among other things, found that the respondent had an equitable mortgage second only to the lien of the plaintiff herein, and that as a holder of such second lien it was entitled to the fund remaining after the satisfaction of the plaintiff's claims.

While several causes are alleged by appellant as reasons why the judgment of the trial court should be reversed, only two of them need to be considered: First, that the findings are not supported by the pleadings; second, that the instrument executed by the Fiskes does not constitute a mortgage or give the respondent Pierce any lien upon or right to the surplus fund awarded him.

The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone. The pleadings, as they refer only to the controversy between the appellant and the respondent, are set out in the transcript, and the theory upon which the cause was tried is not disclosed to this court.

[1] Are the findings supported by the pleadings? Paragraph 2 of the respondent's cross-complaint alleges as follows:

> "That on the 28th day of March, 1916, the defendant, Elsie Latimer Fiske made, executed and delivered to the defendant Pierce that certain indenture which is annexed to this answer as 'Exhibit A' and hereby made a part hereof; that said indenture was made, executed and delivered as aforesaid as security for a balance due and payable upon an open account from defendants, Elsie L. Fiske and Jay Allen Fiske to defendant Pierce."

Finding 4 is as follows:

> "The court further finds that at the time said indenture 'Exhibit A' was executed and delivered, said Jay Allen Fiske and Elsie Latimer Fiske signed and delivered to said William Pierce a writing reading as follows, to wit:
> " '$5,290.00. Suisun, Cal., March 28, 1916.
> " 'For value received, two (2) years after date, we jointly and separately promise to pay to the order of William Pierce the sum of five thousand two hundred ninety dollars with interest at the rate of seven per cent. (7%) per annum from date until paid. Interest to be paid semiannually and to be added to and become part of the principal if not so paid, and thereafter bear the same rate of interest. In the event of default of interest or principal for a period longer than sixty (60) days, both interest and principal to become immediately due. Interest and principal payable in United States gold coin. J. Allen Fiske.

" 'Elsie L. Fiske.

" 'This note is secured by the following: Deed, Elsie L. Fiske to William Pierce, of even date, covering sixty-three (63) acres of land, located in Green Valley, Solano County, California.' "

Finding 2, in relation to Exhibit A and the note to which we have referred is as follows:

> "That on the 28th day of March, 1916, the defendants Jay Allen Fiske and Elsie Latimer Fiske, wife of said Jay Allen Fiske, made, executed and delivered to said William Pierce that certain indenture, a copy whereof is annexed to the answer and cross-complaint of William Pierce herein in this action as 'Exhibit A' thereto, to which reference is hereby made, and which 'Exhibit A' is hereby made a part hereof by reference; that said indenture was made, executed and delivered as aforesaid, as security for a balance of money due owing and payable from said defendants Jay Allen Fiske and Elsie Latimer Fiske to said William Pierce.
> "The court finds that the promissory note dated March 28, 1916, for $5,290, was given by said Jay Allen Fiske and Elsie Latimer Fiske merely as evidence of an indebtedness in said amount then owing to said William Pierce, and that said indebtedness was secured by said indenture dated March 28, 1916, and the court finds that said note was canceled and surrendered up by said William Pierce upon a new promissory note being given him by said Jay Allen Fiske and Elsie Latimer Fiske, but the court finds that neither said note nor said indebtedness was fully paid or satisfied, and that said indenture continued and remained as security for the balance which remained owing to said William Pierce after said note for $5,290 was surrendered up by him."

After alleging the execution of Exhibit A, as set out in paragraph 2 of plaintiff's cross-complaint, there is an allegation that on or about the 25th day of June, 1917, a settlement of accounts was had between the defendants Fiske and the respondent Pierce, and it was then ascertained that the amount due Pierce, the respondent, was the sum of $10,600, and a note evidencing that amount was thereupon executed and delivered by the defendants Fisk to the respondent Pierce; that thereafter and on or about the 1st day of November, 1917, it is alleged that the indebtedness from the Fiskes to the respondent Pierce had increased to the sum of $12,000; and that thereupon a note in that sum was executed and delivered by the defendants Fiske to the respondent Pierce. It appears that as the successive notes were executed in the increased amounts, the previous notes for the lesser sums were surrendered. By reference to finding 2 it will be seen that the court found that the original note given for the sum of $5,290 was given to evidence the amount of an indebtedness then existing and the amount of money which was then owing from the defendants Fiske to the respondent Pierce, and that the Exhibit A referred to in the complaint was made, executed, and delivered as security for the payment of whatever money was due and owing from the defendants Fiske to the respondent Pierce. It further appears that the notes were not paid. The indebtedness was not paid, but successive notes were given to evidence the amount thereof.

By following the steps of this recital, it will be seen that there was an existing indebtedness at the time of the execution of the first note and also at the time of the execution of the deed given as a mortgage hereinbefore referred to, that the indebtedness appears to have been an open account and the notes were simply evidences of the amount due, that this account increased from time to time, and, as the amount owing was from time to time ascertained, the subsequent notes were executed and delivered. Upon this statement we do not see that there is any material variance between the allegation in the cross-complaint that the mortgage was given to secure an open account, and its transmutation into a form evidenced by a note in the sum of $12,000, and the findings of the court, which we have hereinbefore set forth. In other words, both the complaint and the findings when analyzed show that the basis of the entire indebtedness was an open account and was augmented as such and was from time to time evidenced in the total thereof by the successive notes given as hereinbefore referred to.

Upon this question we need only cite one authority. In Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs, 138 Cal. 724, on page 733, 72 Pac. 352, 355, the court says:

> "The general rule is that 'no change in the form of indebtedness or in the mode or time will discharge the mortgage. A mortgage secures the debt and not the note or bond or other evidence of it. No change in the form of the evidence or the mode or time or times—nothing short of actual payment of the debt, or an express release—will operate to discharge the mortgage. The mortgage remains a lien until the debt it was given to secure is satisfied, and is not affected by a change of the note or giving a different instrument as an evidence of the debt, or by a judgment at law on the note merging the original evidence of indebtedness.' "

[2] The authorities are numerous to the effect that the cancellation and surrender of an old note and the giving of a new one do not extinguish the debt. In this particular it must be remembered that the original note of $5,290 was given to cover the amount of the open account at the time the mortgage was executed and that the sum evidenced thereby has never been paid.

We think the foregoing statement shows clearly that there was no variance of any material consequence, and hence a resumé of the numerous authorities cited by appellant is unnecessary.

[3, 4] The next point made for reversal which we will consider is that the Exhibit A, herein referred to, did not and does not constitute a mortgage and valid lien because it was signed only by the defendant Elsie Latimer Fiske. It appears from the transcript that the 63 acres of land covered by the deed was conveyed to Elsie Latimer Fiske after she had become the wife of Jay Allen Fiske. Under this state of fact it is contended that, by reason of the provisions of section 172 of the Civil Code, the husband has the complete management and control of the community property, and that as the court found the property conveyed to Elsie Latimer Fiske was community property, her signature to the instrument in question did not give to it any vitality. The trial court found, however, that the mortgage in the form of a deed was given at the direction and procurement of the defendant Jay Allen Fiske; that the indebtedness was his indebtedness; and that he signed the note hereinbefore set out. The fact that Jay Allen Fiske did not sign the deed executed as a mortgage appears to have been the result of the belief that, as the property stood in the name of his wife, his signature was unnecessary.

A number of cases have been cited to the effect that a conveyance of community property made and executed by the wife alone is inoperative. This, of course, is a correct statement of the law, but the principle announced in such cases we think inapplicable to the questions herein presented for consideration. As just stated, the debt was the husband's debt. The note evidencing such indebtedness was signed by him. It had appended thereto an annotation that it was secured by the certain mortgage or deed given as a mortgage. The court finds that this mortgage or instrument was given at his request and upon his procurement. This brings the circumstances of this case directly in line with the following authorities. In Remington v. Higgins, 54 Cal. 620, it appears that one Remington agreed to sell to Higgins a parcel of land for the sum of $12,000, $300 in cash and the remainder to be secured by a mortgage on the premises. Conveyance was made of the premises to the wife of the defendant Higgins; she alone executed the notes and the mortgage. The husband paid the $300 and also a subsequent sum. In upholding the instrument as a valid mortgage in equity the court says:

> "The husband did not join in the execution of the notes or mortgage, but they were executed at his request and in pursuance of the agreement between himself and plaintiff. Both husband and wife took possession of the land, and have ever since occupied it. Subsequently the husband paid $108 interest on the debt; the balance not having been paid, plaintiff brings his action for a foreclosure."

The court then, in dealing with the defense set up, that under the provisions of section 167 of the Civil Code, which provides that as community property is not liable for the contracts of the wife, the mortgage is void, etc., and also the defense that the instrument created no lien, proceeded to discuss the questions presented and then held as follows:

> "We are of opinion that plaintiff has a lien upon the premises by way of equitable mortgage, to secure the unpaid portion of the purchase money and interest." * * * That "equity will treat that as done which the parties agreed to have done, and which ought to have been done."

This case is cited with approval in Peers v. McLaughlin, 88 Cal. 294, 26 Pac. 119, 22 Am. St. Rep. 306, where it is again said:

> "The principle is well settled in equity that a mortgage defectively executed, or an imperfect attempt to create a mortgage upon specific property for the purpose of securing a debt, will create a specific lien upon the property so intended to be mortgaged."

In the more recent case of Beckwith v. Sheldon, 168 Cal. 742, 145 Pac. 97, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 963, the Supreme Court of this state, citing with approval the cases of Remington v. Higgins, supra, and Peers v. McLaughlin, supra, states the law as follows:

> "With regard to that part of the judgment which declares a lien on the property of the company, we need only say that, under the well-established principle of equity that that which ought to have been done will be deemed to have been done, it is held that where a party agrees to give a mortgage or lien on property, or imperfectly attempts to execute such mortgage or lien, upon a valuable consideration received, a court of equity, upon a proper showing, will create a specific lien on the property intended to be hypothecated, and enforce the same."

After the giving of the mortgage in the form of a deed executed by Elsie Latimer Fiske, the wife, the husband, Jay Allen Fiske, obtained further moneys and continued to obtain further moneys and credits until the amount due, at the time of the foreclosure proceedings had herein, the sum of $12,000 was due and owing by the Fiskes, both husband and wife, to the respondent Pierce. Upon such a showing there seems to us no question as to the duty of a court of equity in relation to the deed signed only by the wife, and that the holding could only be to the effect that the instrument constituted a mortgage.

Upon the record, the presumption would be that when the property in question was conveyed to the wife it was conveyed as separate property, and that her mortgage executed therein, even though signed by herself alone, was presumptively valid and a notice to all the world. The court, however, found that the property was community property, as herein stated, upon which was a valid and subsisting mortgage.

The foregoing are the only vital questions involved in this appeal, and, as we agree with the conclusion of the trial court, it is ordered that the judgment entered herein be and the same is hereby affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HAMIL. (Cr. 1154.)

1. Bastards 🔑17½—No proof of father's failure to provide for minor child.

Evidence on prosecution of the father of an illegitimate child, under Pen. Code, § 270, as amended by St. 1923, p. 592, for failure to provide for the child, held to constitute no proof of such failure; defendant having up to the time of indictment contributed for the child's support $7 per week out of his weekly earnings of $34, though he had a wife and three other children.

2. Bastards 🔑17½—Parent and child 🔑17 (2)—For conviction of father of nonsupport of child, proof of mother's nonsupport necessary.

It was an excuse, preventing conviction of a father, under Pen. Code, § 270, of failure to support a minor child at a time prior to the going into effect of the amendment of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 592) relative to support of both legitimate and illegitimate children, that the child was being properly supported by the mother, then charged, equally with him, with the duty of providing for it.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Louis Hamil was convicted of failure to provide for a minor child, and appeals. Reversed.

Roy L. Daily, James C. Espey, and Walter J. Thompson, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction under the provisions of section 270 of the Penal Code, which prescribes a penalty for failure to provide for one's minor child.

Resolving all conflict in the testimony against the defendant, it appears that he is the father of a child which was born at the St. Elizabeth's Infant Hospital on October 8, 1922, to a young unmarried mother; that at all times during his acquaintance with the mother of this child, the defendant was married to another woman and that there were three children of that marriage; that the defendant was supporting his legitimate family; that he was earning his living by driving a laundry wagon at a salary of $34 a week at the time of the trial; that he gave to the mother of his illegitimate child, who is the prosecuting witness here, $50 or $60 before she went to the hospital for the birth of her child; that up to the time the prosecuting witness went to the hospital, which was four months before her child was born, she worked as a waitress and earned her living. After she left the hospital, on November 4, 1922, she resumed her work as a waitress and the defendant gave her $7 a week for the support of her child until about April, 1923, at about which time she began this prosecution. The indictment charges the defendant with failure to provide for the child on May 1, 1923. The prosecuting witness testified upon cross-examination:

"Q. Now * * * when did the defendant discontinue giving you money for the support of the child? A. It was in April; I don't know exactly the date; but it was after I had sworn out a warrant for him. Q. When did you swear out this warrant? A. Well, I don't remember; it was some time in April, * * *"

She then testified that some time in April, 1923, the defendant came to her home to give her some money for the child; that on that night the health officers had called at his home for some purpose; that, thereafter, she telephoned to the defendant's wife. She was then asked:

"Q. Now * * * did you make any demand on this defendant for any money after the time he was over to see you at the time the health officers were out at his place? A. No, I didn't exactly make any demand, I started—swore out a warrant then for him."

[1, 2] It is apparent, after a reading of the entire transcript, that there was no proof that the defendant failed to provide for the child. Furthermore, there was an entire absence of proof that the child was not being properly provided for by the mother. She was working, according to her testimony, and there is no proof that she was not able and willing to provide necessaries for her six months' old child; nor is there any proof of the amount of money required for the maintenance of the child.

No brief has been filed by the people and no attempt made to point out any evidence in the record upon these two vital elements in a prosecution of this kind under the statute applicable at the time the alleged offense was committed, or to defend, in any manner this judgment against the attack of the appellant. At the time of the alleged offense, it was the law of this state that the duty of providing for minor children rested equally upon father and mother. Ex parte Kendrick (Cal. App.) 212 Pac. 226. The change in the law effected by the amendment of 1923 to section 270 of the Penal Code did not go into effect until August 18, 1923, and the defendant was charged with failure to provide as of May 1, 1923.

As heretofore stated, it is uncontradicted in the record that the defendant, up to the time of the filing of the indictment against him had contributed to the support of this child about $7 a week, a reasonable sum, in view of the testimony that he had been earning $50 a week for a time, and, later, and at the time of the trial, he was earning only $34 a week; and that he had three children and his wife and himself to support, in addition to the child of the prosecuting witness. In view of this testimony, it would seem, that whatever the motive for this prosecution, it was not a desire to obtain support for the minor child.

There is also a complete failure of proof that the child was not being properly supported by its mother, who was also charged, equally with the defendant, with the duty of providing for its needs prior to the last amendment of the section of the Penal Code relative to the support of illegitimate children.

The judgment is reversed.

RUDOLPH WURLITZER CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. CUTTING et ux. (Civ. 4593.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 28, 1924.)

1. Principal and agent 🔑145(4)—Third party may hold either undisclosed principal or agent.

Where, at the time of a sale of a piano, seller did not know that married woman was principal and that her husband was acting as her agent, seller was entitled to hold for the purchase price either the principal, when discovered, or the agent.

2. Appeal and error 🔑187(2)—Joinder of principal and agent, not questioned below, not considered.

In action against principal and agent jointly, where no demurrer was interposed and no motion was made, based on the proposition that the plaintiff might not sue the principal and agent jointly, that question is not before the appellate court.

3. Sales 🔑176(1)—Delay in making repairs held not to constitute defense.

In action for purchase price of piano, delay of plaintiff in sending a mechanic to repair the piano was no defense, where no objection to the delay was made until the action was started.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by the Rudolph Wurlitzer Company of California against Henry C. Cutting and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. E. Keyes, of Oakland, and J. C. Thomas, of Visalia, for appellants.

Jesse A. Mueller, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover the unpaid balance alleged to be due on the sale by the plaintiff of a certain piano. The trial court awarded a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed.

The judgment of the trial court was based on findings of fact, which included, among others, a finding:

"That heretofore, to wit, on the 2d day of June, 1922, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, the said plaintiff sold to the said defendants one Wurlitzer piano (used) style AX, No. 38637, to be used at said Daisy Farm Inn, and at said time and said place the said defendant Henry C. Cutting, for and on behalf of both defendants herein, made, executed, and delivered to the said plaintiff an agreement in writing, by which the said defendants agreed to pay for said piano the sum of twelve hundred fifty and 00/100 ($1,250.00) dollars; that a copy of said agreement is annexed to the amended complaint on file herein and marked Exhibit A.

"4. That at the time of the entering into of the agreement above referred to the said plaintiff agreed to install said instrument in the Daisy Farm Inn and to furnish service for the purpose of keeping said instrument above referred to in repair and adjustment, and that the said plaintiff did so install said instrument and did furnish said service to the said defendants whenever so requested by them."

The Exhibit A referred to in the findings commences:

"San Francisco, June 2, 1922.

"I promise to pay to the order of the Rudolph Wurlitzer Company of California, a corporation. * * * I admit receipt of said instrument in good order, and I agree to keep the same in good order. * * * I agree that there is no warranty that said instrument is sound or merchantable. * * * I also agree that the Rudolph Wurlitzer Company shall not be bound by any agreements or representations not contained in the foregoing, which I have read and understand.

"Henry C. Cutting.

"Witness: Francis M. Madsen."

On the trial the plaintiff called an outside salesman, Mr. Carr, who testified that he called on Mr. Cutting at the Daisy Farm Inn and also at Mr. Cutting's office in the Security Bank Building in Oakland. Mr. Carr testified that the Daisy Farm Inn was a restaurant, and that it had, among other appurtenances, a dancing floor. He further testified that on June 2d, Mr. and Mrs. Cutting went with him into the store owned by the plaintiff, and that, after the musical instruments were exhibited to Mr. and Mrs. Cutting, Mr. Cutting made the remark that the instrument mentioned in the findings "would be most satisfactory in our place." Later on the same day the sales contract above referred to was signed, and a few days later the musical instrument was put in place in accordance with the terms of the sales contract. The subscribing witness, Francis M. Madsen, was called as a witness, and testified that he was present on June 2, 1922, and took part in exhibiting the instruments to Mr. and Mrs. Cutting; that in the conversations held Mr. Cutting stated that the instrument was to be installed at the Daisy Farm Inn in Oakland. He further stated that the instrument was first examined by Mr. Cutting on one occasion; that nothing was done until Mrs. Cutting was brought over later; that, when she stated she liked the instrument designated in the writing, Mr. Cutting decided to take it, and Mrs. Cutting decided to take it, although the witness could not say that any particular words in that behalf were used by either the husband or his wife. The plaintiff also called as a witness Mr. Cutting. He testified that his codefendant, Mrs. Cutting, was the owner of Daisy Farm Inn. The property formerly stood in the name of Mr. Cutting until 1915 or 1916. In November, 1918 or 1919, he converted a building that was then a barn into a café. In the year 1922 Mr. Cutting stated that his wife was managing the place and that he used to do what he could in assisting in the management. He hired employees. The musical instrument as installed had ten slot boxes, so that the instrument might be used by the guests of the house dropping coins in the slots.

When the defendants came to introduce their testimony, they offered witnesses to the effect that Mrs. Cutting was the owner of the personal property contained in the Daisy Farm Inn, and that the title to real estate stood in her; but they offered no testimony to the effect as to whether the condition of the title was ever at any time called to the attention of the plaintiff in this case until the date of the trial, or that she objected to the presence of the machine in her house.

[1, 2] There is no testimony, other than that stated above, showing that at the time the written instrument was signed the plaintiff knew that Mrs. Cutting was principal and Mr. Cutting was acting as her agent. Under such a state of facts the plaintiff was entitled to hold either the principal, when discovered, or the agent. 31 Cyc. 1574. No demurrer was interposed, and at no stage of the proceedings was any motion made, based upon the proposition the plaintiff might not sue the principal and agent jointly. That question, therefore, is not before us.

[3] Complaint is made to the effect that at times the piano was out of order; on one occasion that Mr. Cutting notified the plaintiff on Thursday that the instrument was out of order, and that the plaintiff did not send a mechanic until the Tuesday following. The record does not disclose the exact date of the incident. The defendants made no objection to the delay until they were sued for the price of the instrument. As the matter appears on the face of this record, the delay in making repairs does not constitute a defense to the action. The findings are supported by the evidence.

PLATNAUER v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF SACRAMENTO COUNTY et al.

1. Justices of the peace ⚷3—Township and city justice's offices distinct.

Under Pol. Code, § 4015, and section 4236*l*, as added by St. 1921, p. 794, Code Civ. Proc. § 103, as amended by St. 1923, p. 1011, the offices of township justice of the peace and city justice of the peace are distinct, with differences in qualification, salary, and jurisdiction of the officers; so the fact that the territory of a judicial township, which has a justice of the peace, is identical with the territory of a city, is no reason for not filling the office of city justice of the peace.

2. Justices of the peace ⚷2—City justices' courts permissible in cities having freeholders' charters not providing for municipal courts.

Const. art. 11, § 8½, subd. 1, declaring it competent for the freeholders' charter of a city to provide for a municipal court, and declaring that when such court has been established there shall be no other court inferior to the superior court, does not prevent the Legislature from providing for city justice court in a city operating under a freeholders' charter, which makes no provision for a municipal court.

3. Mandamus 🔑76—Lies to compel an officer to fill a vacancy in office is specially enjoined by law.

Performance of the duty specially enjoined by Code Civ. Proc. § 103, as amended by St. 1923, p. 1011, on a county board of supervisors, to fill by appointment vacancy in office of city justice of the peace, can under section 1085 be compelled by mandamus.

4. Mandamus 🔑23(2)—Elector and taxpayer proper party plaintiff to compel performance of duty specially enjoined on officer.

An elector and taxpayer is a proper party plaintiff in mandamus to compel an officer to perform a duty specially enjoined on him by law.

5. Constitutional law 🔑68(1)—Necessity for city justice's court legislative question.

The necessity for a city justice's court in addition to a township justice of the peace is a question for the Legislature, not the courts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Mandamus by R. Platnauer against the Board of Supervisors of the County of Sacramento and the members thereof. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. J. Henderson, Dist. Atty., and W. V. Cowan, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for appellants.

R. Platnauer, of Sacramento, in pro per.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff was granted a peremptory writ of mandate, directing the defendants to appoint a justice of the peace for the city of Sacramento. The defendants have appealed.

Plaintiff alleged that he is a taxpayer and a qualified elector of the city of Sacramento; that for more than 20 years he has been admitted to practice law in the state of California; that he presented and filed a petition, signed by taxpayers and electors of the city of Sacramento, requesting defendants to appoint him justice of the peace of said city; and that plaintiff demanded of defendants that they appoint some competent person justice of the peace of said city, but that they refused and still refuse to appoint any person to such office. From the pleadings and the stipulations of the parties it appears that one of the judicial townships into which the county of Sacramento is divided is designated Sacramento township, and is identical in boundaries with the city of Sacramento; that a justice of the peace for said judicial township was elected at the last general election and is now acting as such; that for a number of years there has been no incumbent of the office of city justice of the peace of the city of Sacramento; and that said city is a city of the second and one-half class.

Section 4015 of the Political Code provides:

> "The board of supervisors of each county, as public convenience may require, shall divide their respective counties into townships for the purpose of electing justices of the peace and constables; provided, however, that in the establishment of townships that may be hereafter established no incorporated city shall be divided so as to lie partly within one township and partly within another."

The county of Sacramento is a county of the seventh class, and the city of Sacramento has a population of more than 20,000. Section 4236*l* of the Political Code, as added by St. 1921, p. 794, provides:

> "For the purpose of regulating the compensation of township justices and constables in counties of the seventh class, townships shall be classified on the basis of population. * * * Incorporated cities having a population of twenty thousand or more, shall be known as townships of the first class. * * * Townships of the first class shall have one justice," whose salary is fixed at "three thousand six hundred dollars per annum."

Section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by the Legislature of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 1011), provides:

> "There shall be at least one justice's court in each of the townships of the state, for which one justice of the peace must be elected. * * * In every city of the first and one-half class there must be seven justices of the peace, and in every city of the second class there must be two justices of the peace, and in every city of the second and one-fourth, second and one-half, second and three-fourths, third and fourth classes there must be one justice of the peace, to be elected in like manner, by the electors of such cities or towns, respectively; and such justices of the peace of cities shall have the same jurisdiction, civil and criminal, as justices of the peace of townships and township justice's courts. Said justices of the peace of cities and justice's courts of cities shall also have jurisdiction of all proceedings for the violation of any ordinance of any city in which courts are established both civil and criminal, and of all actions for the collection of any license required by any ordinance of any such city, and generally exercise all powers, duties and jurisdiction, civil and criminal, of police judges, judges of police courts, recorder's courts or mayor's courts, within such city.
> "No person is eligible to the office of justice of the peace in any city of the first, first and one-half, second, second and one-fourth, second and one-half, second and three-fourths or third class, who has not been admitted to practice law in this state. * * * Every city justice of the peace in any city of the second and one-half class shall receive a salary of four thousand dollars per annum. * * * Where the number of city justices herein fixed for any city exceeds the number elected at the last general election, the board of supervisors of the county in which such city is situated shall, as soon as is practicable after this amendment

[1-5] From the foregoing it clearly appears that the offices of township justice of the peace and city justice of the peace are distinct entities, though having certain jurisdiction in common. The fact that Sacramento township and the city of Sacramento embrace the same territory is a mere incident. In other counties a city of the same class may constitute a part only of a judicial township. City justice's courts are given broader jurisdiction than those of townships. No one is eligible to the office of city justice of the peace, except in the fourth class, who has not been admitted to practice law. No such qualification is required of a township justice. The salary of the justice of the peace of Sacramento township is not the same as that of a justice of the peace in a city of the second and one-half class.

The freeholders' charter of the city of Sacramento (Stats. 1921, pp. 1919, 1963) provides for a police court with jurisdiction of all misdemeanors, of proceedings for violation of the charter or of any ordinance of the city, and of the examination and commitment of persons charged with offenses triable in the superior court. It is competent, in freeholders' charters, to provide, in addition to police courts, for the establishment of—

> "municipal courts and judges thereof, with such civil, criminal and magisterial jurisdiction as by law may be conferred upon inferior courts and judges thereof. * * * When such municipal court has been established, there shall be no other court inferior to the superior court." Const. art. 11, § 8½, subd. 1.

The Sacramento charter makes no provision for a municipal court. The Constitution in no manner restricts the power of the Legislature to provide for city justice's courts in cities operating under freeholders' charters which make no provision for municipal courts. Graham v. Mayor, etc., of Fresno, 151 Cal. 465, 91 Pac. 147. Since the Legislature has made such provision and has expressly directed boards of supervisors to fill existing vacancies, it is the plain duty of appellants to appoint some competent person to the office. The writ of mandamus—

> "may be issued * * * to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office." Code Civ. Proc. § 1085.

The writ may issue to compel an officer to fill a vacancy. City of San Diego v. Capps, 32 Cal. App. 461, 163 Pac. 235; Commonwealth v. Livingston, 171 Ky. 52, 186 S. W. 916; Wampler v. State, 148 Ind. 557, 47 N. E. 1068, 38 L. R. A. 829. An elector and taxpayer is a proper party plaintiff in such a proceeding. High's Extraordinary Legal Remedies (3d Ed.) § 431; Conn v. City Council, 17 Cal. App. 705, 121 Pac. 714, 719; Frederick v. City of San Luis Obispo, 118 Cal. 391, 50 Pac. 661; Commonwealth v. Livingston, supra. KLEIN-SIMPSON FRUIT CO. v. HUNT, HATCH & CO. (Civ. 4478.)

1. Trover and conversion 🔑1—"Loan" cannot rest on conversion by borrower without owner's consent.

A "loan," as defined by Civ. Code, §§ 1884, 1902, presupposes an agreement by the borrower to return the same or a similar thing at a future time, and excludes any obligation to pay for the thing borrowed, which is the subject of special agreement, but in both cases an agreement is necessary, and neither can rest on a conversion by one terming himself a borrower without the owner's consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Loan.]

2. Principal and agent 🔑159(1)—Principal held not entitled to recover value of materials taken by agent and delivered to another principal for whom obtained.

Where an agent obtained from his principal, without the latter's consent, materials for work done for another, though expressly directed by the latter to obtain them elsewhere, the principal could not recover the value thereof from such other, even if the agent were agent for both; he being presumed to have knowledge of the limitations of his agency.

3. Trover and conversion 🔑40(4)—Finding defendant borrowed materials from plaintiff held contrary to evidence.

In an action for the value of materials taken from plaintiff, without his knowledge or consent, by defendant's agent without authority, the court's finding that a loan was made held contrary to the evidence, notwithstanding evidence of a local custom as to borrowing such materials, where there was no evidence of a custom authorizing the taking thereof without the owner's knowledge or consent.

4. Account stated 🔑4—Statements of claims for materials taken by defendant's agent from plaintiff held not statements of account.

An agent's statement of a purported personal claim against his principal and rejected by him for "settlement of box material loaned," and subsequent unapproved statements in varying amounts by the owner of such box material, which claimed that the materials, which were taken from it without its consent by the agent, were loaned, held not statements of account between the owner and principal.

5. Account stated 🔑1—Essential elements stated.

Essential elements of a statement of account are an agreement that the items are correct, and a promise, express or implied, by the debtor to pay the amount thus found correct.

6. Account stated 🔑8 — Prior negotiations merged.

When an account is stated by agreement on the amount and a promise to pay it, a new contract, into which all prior negotiations are merged, is created, and the creditor must recover on the account as stated, if at all.

7. Account stated 🔑6(1)—Assent to correctness of items cannot be inferred from specific objection or refusal to state account.

An implied assent to the correctness of items of an account cannot be inferred from a specific objection or refusal to state the account.

8. Account stated 🔑5—Presupposes complete adjustment of accounts and absolute acknowledgment of certain sum due.

An account stated presupposes an absolute acknowledgment or admission of a certain sum due, or a complete adjustment of accounts between the parties, the striking of a balance, and an express or implied assent to the correctness of such balance.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Account Stated.]

9. Limitation of actions 🔑146(2)—Open account, barred by statute, not relieved therefrom by oral statement of account.

An open account, barred by the statute of limitations, cannot be relieved from such bar by an oral statement of the account; no acknowledgment or promise being sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract taking the case out of the operation of the statute, unless contained in a writing signed by the party to be charged. Code Civ. Proc. § 360.

Action by the Klein-Simpson Fruit Company against Hunt, Hatch & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Fred L. Dreher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George L. Stewart, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff commenced this action on October 15, 1918, by filing a complaint setting forth two separate causes of action. The first cause of action is a simple cause for conversion. The complaint alleges that during the month of May, 1914, the defendant was operating a packing house at the town of Los Mochis, state of Sinaloa, Mexico, and was engaged in the business of buying and packing tomatoes and shipping them to the markets of the United States; that one Bosworth was then the general agent in Mexico of the defendant; that plaintiff was then the owner of a certain quantity of wooden box materials, designated as shook, stored at the town of Los Mochis, and in the safe-keeping, custody, and control of one Scally; that during said month of May, 1914, the defendant, through its agent Bosworth, knowing the relation between plaintiff and Scally, employed the latter to superintend the packing house of said defendant in Los Mochis; that during said month of May the said Bosworth and Scally, acting as agents of the defendant, converted and appropriated to the use of defendant a quantity of said shook to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $1,232.94; that owing to a state of insurrection which then existed in the state of Sinaloa the said Scally was unable to communicate with plaintiff, and the plaintiff remained in ignorance of the facts above stated until the month of October, 1916; and that upon learning of said conversion plaintiff immediately demanded of the defendant a return of like materials for the materials so taken and used, but the defendant refused to comply with this demand, and thereupon plaintiff demanded payment for the materials taken. The allegations in the second cause of action, in direct contrast with those of the first, are that Scally, while acting as agent for the defendant, as well as agent for the plaintiff, loaned the shook in question to the defendant according to a local trade custom prevalent in that community by which local packers borrowed from others box material during the packing season, with the understanding that they would either return and restore like material to the lender within a reasonable time or pay the reasonable value thereof to the lender. The other allegations of this cause of action are similar to those found in the first cause, and need not be repeated.

The defendant interposed a demurrer to this complaint, setting up, among other things, the bar of the statute of limitations to both causes of action. This demurrer was sustained, and, within time, an amended complaint was filed. In this amended complaint the charge of conversion was abandoned, and the first cause of action therein is similar to the second cause found in the original complaint, except that the allegations relating to the local custom eliminated the element of reasonable time, and set forth the custom as one calling upon the defendant to replace materials "when it was able so to do," and that, in the event that defendant failed to make return, plaintiff, at its option, might charge the reasonable value thereof. It was then alleged that, owing to the state of rebellion existing in the territory, and the consequent interruption of freight communication with the United States, the defendant was able to return the shook in the month of December, 1916, but failed to do so. (It is not alleged that the return could not have been made sooner.) It was alleged that on account of defendant's failure to return the shook in December, 1916, plaintiff charged said materials to defendant's account in January, 1917, and thereupon demanded payment from the defendant. As a second cause of action defendant alleged that on the 11th day of January, 1917, the defendant "was and still is indebted" to the plaintiff in the sum sued for "on an account for goods, wares, and merchandise * * * sold to defendant and to be paid for at San Francisco." It is not alleged when the goods were sold or when the indebtedness accrued. The third cause of action is based upon an account stated, alleged to have been made in the month of September, 1916, at San Francisco, between plaintiff and defendant for the sum of $1,232.94. (It will be noted that in this cause of action the plaintiff depends upon a statement of an account made in September, 1916, for the same item which in the previous causes of action the complaint alleged were charged to the defendant in January, 1917, the same date at which it was charged the defendant became indebted to the plaintiff. It should also be noted that in the original complaint it was alleged that plaintiff's first knowledge of the loss of the shook was on or about October, 1916; and that, in the amended complaint, it was alleged that the charge was made against defendant because of his failure to return the shook in December, 1916.) Defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint having been overruled, it filed its answer denying the allegations of the complaint relating to the loan of the shook in May, 1914, and specifically pleaded the statute of limitations to the three causes of action. The answer also denied that a charge for the materials was made against the defendant in January, 1917, that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in any sum in January, 1917, or at any other time, and in answer to the third cause of action specifically denied that in the month of September, 1916, or at any other time, an account was stated between the parties, or that the defendant agreed to pay plaintiff any sum for the shook in question.

In findings directed specifically to the first cause of action, the court found that in the month of May, 1914, defendant operated a packing house at Los Mochis; that Bosworth was the general agent in Mexico for the defendant; that in the month of May plaintiff was the owner of the shook in question, which Bosworth borrowed from plaintiff, and which defendant used for its own purposes. It also found that during this time there existed at Los Mochis a custom by which packers borrowed box materials from each other, with the understanding that they should return or replace said loan when able to do so from supplies receives from the United States, and that in the event of their inability to do so, they should make a return in kind or the value of the same would be charged to the borrowing party. It also found that defendant could have returned the shook to the plaintiff in the month of December, 1916; that it failed to do so, and that on January 11, 1917, plaintiff charged defendant's account the reasonable value thereof, amounting to $1,232.94. In findings directed specifically to the third cause of action, the court found that in the month of September, 1916, at San Francisco, a settlement of account was reached between plaintiff and defendant whereby defendant was charged with the sum of $1,232.94; and, as the findings of fact appearing in the transcript are segregated and designated as covering the first cause of action and the third cause of action separately, and as no findings are shown to have been made covering the second cause of action, we assume that that cause was abandoned, or that it at least was not carried into the judgment. Upon the findings above noted judgment was entered for $1,232.94, with interest from December 2, 1916, and from this judgment defendant appeals.

The facts of the case material to the opinion are that in May, 1914, Bosworth, acting as general agent for the appellant, employed Scally to take charge of appellant's interest in the packing of tomatoes in Los Mochis under an express authorization that, if the packing boxes left by Bosworth in appellant's packing house were inadequate, Scally should purchase what was needed from the United Sugar Company, a corporation having box material in the same town. Scally took charge of appellant's interest, but he was not at any time during the period in question the agent or representative of the respondent. In fact, the respondent did not have any agent at Los Mochis during the time in question. This all appears from the testimony of Scally, who was called by the respondent. His testimony also shows that during the month of May, 1914, he found that he was short of boxes necessary for the season, and, without any express authority from his employer, and without the knowledge or consent of the respondent, he sent an employee to the Los Mochis agricultural union, where respondent had stored a quantity of shook, and obtained from the custodian thereof some of the respondent's materials, which were then made into boxes and used for the shipment of appellant's tomatoes. He did not notify the respondent that he had taken these materials until September, 1916, at which time he also sent a notice through the mail to Bosworth, who was not then an employee of the appellant.

This notice was lost in transit. At the end of the packing season in 1914 Scally had made a complete report of his operations as agent of the appellant showing the purchase of a certain amount of shook from the United Sugar Company, but not showing that any material had been acquired from the respondent. Soon thereafter he made claim upon Bosworth that he personally had furnished some shook which was used in the packing and shipment of appellant's tomatoes. This seems to have been the attitude of Scally for a period of about two years while negotiations were had between him and the appellant. The first direct knowledge which the appellant had of any claim outstanding for the use of shook used in May, 1914, at Los Mochis came to it through Scally in September, 1916. At that time, as in his conversation with Bosworth, he claimed that he personally had furnished the shook which was used by him at Los Mochis. At that time he filed a written statement of account of his services as agent for the appellant, showing the moneys which he had received and paid out for appellant's account during the packing season of 1914. To this account was attached another reading:

> "Hunt, Hatch & Co. to J. P. Scally. Due settlement of box material loaned to be paid or returned, at warehouse at Los Mochis, Mex. Loaned during May, 1914. * * *"

In a letter accompanying this account Scally stated that he had furnished the shook in question, and that he would like to have it returned to him in kind, and requested that shipment be made to him so that it would reach him at Los Mochis by December 15, 1916.

As this claim was presented to the appellant by Scally at a time when he and the appellant were having some controversy over the settlement of their personal accounts, the appellant refused to approve the account, and insisted upon Scally obtaining the approval of Bosworth before giving further consideration to it. Thereupon Scally approached Bosworth, requesting him to approve the account which he had presented to the appellant. Bosworth refused to approve Scally's claim, because, as he said, he did not believe it was a just claim, or that the shook had actually been delivered to the defendant, and the appellant so notified Scally. All these transactions were had between appellant and Scally upon the latter's representations that he had furnished the shook and that appellant was under obligation to either return the same to him or pay him the reasonable value. This was the condition of the controversy until February 14, 1918, when, for the first time, respondent herein made claim upon the appellant for payment of the shook in question. The amount of this claim was $906.31. No evidence was offered to prove the correctness of this account, and it does not appear what was done about it, or whether it was treated as an account stated. However, on August 10, 1918, another claim was made by the respondent in the sum of $1,232.94. Here again no attempt was made to prove the correctness of this account, and as was the case with the letter of February 14, 1918, it was not pleaded or treated as a statement of account between the parties.

[1-3] From the statement of the facts it is apparent that Scally obtained the shook from the possession of respondent's custodian by conversion and not by a loan. It is shown in the pleadings, and appears from the evidence as well as from the briefs, that the materials were taken from the warehouse without respondent's knowledge or consent. A loan as defined by sections 1884 and 1902 of the Civil Code presupposes an agreement between the parties by which the borrower is to return either the same or a similar thing at a future time. An obligation to pay for the thing borrowed if not returned within a certain time is no part of a loan, but is the subject of a special agreement. In both cases an agreement of the parties is necessary, and neither the loan nor the obligation to pay can rest upon a conversion by one who terms himself a borrower without the owner's consent. All the facts appearing in the evidence go to prove the allegations of the original complaint that Scally converted the property without the knowledge or consent of the owner. There is no evidence of any nature which sustains the finding that a loan was made. Some suggestion has been made in the briefs that Scally was the agent of both the respondent and appellant. The evidence does not support this position, but, even if it were so, it would not help respondent's case, because, as agent for both parties, he would be presumed to have knowledge of the limits of his agency, and it is not disputed that he was expressly authorized and directed to procure what shook he found necessary from parties other than the respondent. The finding of the trial court, therefore, that in the month of May, 1914, the appellant, through its agent Bosworth, borrowed and procured the shook from respondent is directly contrary to the evidence. All the evidence shows without conflict that Scally obtained the materials without authority from his principal and without the knowledge or consent of the owner. There is no evidence of any nature tending to show that those materials were borrowed from the respondent, and the respondent's position is not helped by the evidence relating to the local custom. This custom, as appears from the evidence, was that, in cases of emergency, box materials might be borrowed by one shipper from another, to be returned during the season or paid for at the end of the season. There is no evidence of any custom authorizing one shipper to take materials from the custody of another without his knowledge or consent. As to the first cause of action, therefore, it is apparent that respondent failed to make any proof of the essential allegations of a loan in accordance with the local custom.

[4] The evidence relating to the third cause of action shows what purports to be an account stated between Scally personally and the appellant in the month of September, 1916. The appellant rejected the account, and refused to consider it, unless Scally would present the approval of Bosworth. Bosworth refused to approve the account, and nothing further was done in regard thereto between September, 1916, and February, 1918, when the respondent herein addressed a letter to the appellant inclosing a claim for $906.31. This statement might have ripened into a statement of account between the parties, if it had been supported by proof, but no attempt was made to do so. The same may be said as to the statement of account in the sum of $1,232.94, dated August 10, 1918. There is a marked difference between the three statements which were presented. The one presented by Scally personally in September, 1916, made no charge of any nature. It merely contained an itemized list of the quantity of pieces claimed to have been loaned. Neither the cost nor the value thereof was stated. The statement of February, 1918, in the total sum of $906.31, listed the materials furnished at 1½ cents and 1¼ cents, and added an additional claim of $123.90 to cover freight charges at the rate of 50 cents. The statement of August 10, 1918, charged the same quantity of material at the rate of 2 cents instead of at the rate of 1½ and 1¼ cents, and included the item of freight charges estimated at $.556 instead of at the rate of 50 cents. It is quite evident, therefore, that even the respondent has not treated any one of these statements as a statement of account between the parties.

[5, 6] The essential element of a statement of an account is an agreement between the parties that the items contained therein are correct and a promise, either express or implied, on the part of the debtor to pay the amount thus found to be correct. When an account is thus stated, a new contract is created into which all prior negotiations are merged (Gardner v. Watson, 170 Cal. 570, 150 Pac. 994), and the creditor must recover upon the account as stated or not at all (Duerr v. Sloan, 40 Cal. App. 653, 655, 181 Pac. 407). Here the respondent sued upon an account claimed to have been stated in September, 1916, and recovered judgment on a statement made in August, 1918, which was essentially different from the former account.

[7, 8] In addition to this the evidence is without conflict that the appellant did not at any time agree to the correctness of the account of September, 1916, but that at all times after its presentation had insisted that the account was incorrect, and that it would give it no further consideration until Scally had obtained Bosworth's approval of the items of the account. Where reliance is placed upon an implied assent that the items of an account are correct, such assent cannot be inferred from a specific objection or refusal to state the account.

> "An account stated presupposes an absolute acknowledgment or admission of a certain sum due, or an adjustment of accounts between the parties, the striking of a balance, and an assent express or implied to the correctness of the balance. If the acknowledgment or admission is qualified, and not absolute, or if there is but an admission that something is due, without specifying how much, there is no account stated; nor does an account stated exist if there is but a partial settlement of accounts, without arriving at a balance, or if there is a dissent from the balance as struck." 1 R. C. L. p. 211, § 9; 1 Cal. Juris. p. 195, § 52.

Thus, where the party to whom an account was presented replied that he expected to receive funds at an early date, and that he would then endeavor to adjust the account agreeably, it was held that no account was stated. Craig v. Lee, 36 Cal. App. 335, 337, 171 Pac. 1089.

[9] Finally, if we are to assume that the account of August 10, 1918, upon which the judgment was rendered was an account stated, it was barred by the statute of limitations. If any liability attached to the appellant, it arose out of the conversion of the materials by Scally while acting as appellant's agent. The period of limitations to enforce such a liability expired before the respondent had presented any claim to the appellant. This feature of the case is controlled by the well-established rule found in Auzerais v. Naglee, 74 Cal. 60, 67, 15 Pac. 371, 373, where the court say:

> "An open account already barred by the statute of limitations cannot be relieved from the bar of such statute by an oral statement of such account, for the reason that under our Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 360) no acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract by which to take the case out of the operation of the statute, unless the same is contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby."

Judgment reversed.

MUEHLEBACH v. PASO ROBLES SPRINGS HOTEL. (Civ. 4657.)

1. Innkeepers 🔑11(11)—Innkeeper liable under statute as depositary for hire.

By Civ. Code, §§ 1859, 1860, as amended by St. 1895, p. 49, the strict rule of the common law that an innkeeper was an insurer of the property of his guest was changed to that of a depositary for hire.

2. Bailment 🔑14(1)—Depositary for hire must use ordinary care for preservation of the thing deposited.

A depositary for hire under Civ. Code, § 1852, must use at least ordinary care for the preservation of the thing deposited.

3. Innkeepers 🔑11(4)—Hotel keeper liable for servant's theft of valuables deposited in safe.

Where a guest at a hotel deposited valuables in a hotel safe which were stolen by a servant who was charged with safeguarding the same and who had access thereto, the hotel keeper being a bailee or depositary for hire was liable therefor under the rule that, if a duty of the master be violated, he is liable whether he or his servant was guilty of the breach, even though the servant acted contrary to instructions without his master's consent, fraudulently or criminally.

4. Principal and agent 🔑159(1)—Rule as to principal's liability to third persons for negligence of agent stated.

A principal is liable to third persons, following Civ. Code, § 2338, not only for the negligence of its agents in the transaction of the business of the agency, but likewise for the torts or other wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business.

5. Innkeepers 🔑11(4)—Statute does not exempt innkeeper from liability for wrongs of servant.

Civ. Code, § 1860, relating to the liability of an innkeeper as a bailee or depositary for hire, does not exempt an innkeeper from liability to third persons for his own wrongs or the wrongs of his servant committed in and as a part of the transaction of the business of the principal.

Action by Carl A. Muehlebach against the Paso Robles Springs Hotel, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Byrne & Lamson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

H. S. Young and F. A. Denicke, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. This is an action by a guest against an innkeeper to recover damages in the sum of $2,100, the alleged value of jewelry deposited for safe-keeping, stolen by innkeeper's servant, who was specially intrusted with the care and safeguarding of the property.

The complaint contains three counts: The first charges defendant with conversion; the second charges defendant with employing a dishonest clerk who wrongfully converted the property to his own use; and the third charges that defendant undertook to keep the property safely, guaranteed the honesty of the servant, and was guilty of gross negligence in the premises. The answer denied these charges. Trial was had before the superior court without a jury. The trial court found, in part, as follows:

That on or about the first day of March, 1920, plaintiff was the owner of and entitled to the possession of certain personal property (jewelry described).

That on or about March 1, 1920, plaintiff was a guest of said defendant at the hotel conducted and operated by it at Paso Robles, Cal.; that in a conspicuous place in the room which he occupied and to which he was assigned in said hotel by the said defendant, was posted by the said defendant a sign in the words following, to wit: "The management of this hotel has provided a safe for the protection of guests and will not be responsible for any valuables unless deposited therein," and that pursuant to said notice plaintiff delivered said personal property to said defendant through the clerk employed for that purpose for safe-keeping to be deposited in said safe, and the said clerk thereupon so deposited said personal property in said safe.

That said defendant employed one Charles E. Ingersoll to whom it intrusted, among other duties, the duty of safeguarding personal property deposited in said safe; that said employee was given the key to said safe and had access thereto and to the personal property placed in the same; that it was the duty of the said employee to safeguard said personal property by keeping same in said safe, and to deliver the same to the plaintiff upon demand; that said personal property was, on the third day of March, 1920, taken from said safe by Charles E. Ingersoll, the said clerk employed by said defendant, and placed in charge of said safe with access thereto, who thereupon wrongfully converted the said personal property to his own use and absconded therewith; that the whereabouts of the said Charles E. Ingersoll is now and ever since said March 3, 1920, unknown to this defendant; that said property has never been returned to this defendant and this defendant has never had possession thereof since the same was so taken from said safe as aforesaid.

That prior to the commencement of this action plaintiff demanded of said defendant the return of said personal property, but that said defendant not having the same was unable and failed to deliver possession thereof or any portion thereof to plaintiff.

These findings are supported by undisputed evidence. The trial court further found that defendant did not convert said property to its own use; that plaintiff had not been deprived of said personal property by the gross or any carelessness, or gross or any negligence or any improper conduct of the defendant. The court made no finding relative to the value of the property.

Upon such findings the trial court gave judgment in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff for costs of suit. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

Counsel for appellant says in the "foreword" of his opening brief that the first question presented to this court for decision is:

> "Does the purported restriction of the innkeeper's liability by section 1860 of the Civil Code apply only to the innkeeper's common-law insurer's liability, or does it protect the innkeeper from the torts of his employees acting in the course of their employment?"

Argument presented in the briefs shows some confusion in the minds of counsel relative to the liability of an innkeeper for the loss of valuables deposited in a hotel safe. It therefore seems necessary to refer to the common-law rule and also the history and effect of the legislation upon the subject in this state. In 1850 our Supreme Court, in Mateer v. Brown, 1 Cal. 221, 52 Am. Dec. 303, said:

> "An innkeeper, like a common carrier, is the insurer of the goods of his guests, and is bound to keep them safe from burglars and robbers without, as well as from thieves from within, his house; but he can be held to this strict liability only for such goods as are brought into his house by travelers in the character of guests."

In Pinkerton v. Woodward, 33 Cal. 557, 600 (91 Am. Dec. 657) the Supreme Court said:

> "But the preponderating weight of authority, from the time of the decision in Calye's Case, 8 Coke, 32, to the present time, is in favor of the rule that he [innkeeper] is liable as an insurer."

In Wilkins v. Earle, 44 N. Y. 172, 4 Am. Rep. 655, the court said:

> "His liability extends to wearing apparel, jewelry, money, and even to the horses, wheat, butter and other articles of bulk belonging to the guest, if received by the innkeeper into his care and within his place of entertainment. This is the rule of the common law, enforced in the days of Lord Coke, and long prior, and ever since, as well in England as in this state." Churchill v. Pacific Improvement Co., 96 Cal. 490, 31 Pac. 560.

When the California Codes were adopted on March 21, 1872, the Civil Code contained, as it does now, an article entitled "Innkeepers." Section 1859 then read:

> "An innkeeper is liable for all losses of or injuries to personal property placed by his guests under his care, unless occasioned by an irresistible superhuman cause, by a public enemy, by the negligence of the owner, or by the act of some one whom he brought into the inn."

In construing this statute, in Churchill v. Pacific Improvement Co., 96 Cal. 490, 492, 31 Pac. 560, 561, the Supreme Court said:

> "The rule stated in section 1859 is simply declaratory of the common law."

As originally enacted section 1860 read:

> "If an innkeeper keeps a fireproof safe, and gives notice to a guest, either personally or by putting up a printed notice in a prominent place in the room occupied by the guest, that he keeps such a safe, and will not be liable for money, jewelry, documents, or other articles of unusual value and small compass, unless placed therein, he is not liable, except so far as his own acts contribute thereto, for any loss of or injury to such articles, if not deposited with him, and not required by the guest for present use."

In Deering's Annotated Codes and Statutes (Civ. Code, 1886) we find the following code commissioner's note under section 1860 of the Civil Code as it appears in its original form:

> "This section affords an opportunity for innkeepers by their own acts, to relieve themselves to a certain extent from what might be termed the extreme stringency of the rule in the text of the preceding section (section 1859), and from the rigor with which it was always enforced as seen from the decisions quoted there. This means of defense is afforded by and rests alone in the statute. The cases of Purvis v. Coleman, 1 Bosw. 322, 21 N. Y. 110, and Gile v. Libby, 36 Barb. 70 (N. Y.), are on this point."

Both of these sections, as originally enacted, are based upon sections of Field's Draft, Civil Code, and the citations contained in the code commissioner's note are early New York decisions construing the New York law of 1855 (Laws 1855, c. 421) entitled "An act to regulate the liability of hotel keepers," which law contains provisions somewhat similar to those contained in section 1860 of our Civil Code. In passing upon the law of 1855, the New York Court of Appeals, in Wilkins v. Earle, supra, at page 179, says:

> "The rigorous rule of the common law has been to some extent modified in this state by statute. The proprietor of a hotel may now provide a safe, to be kept at the office, and notify his guests of the fact, and that they may deposit their money, jewels or ornaments therein, by posting a notice in the room of the guest; and his neglect to deposit such articles, relieves the proprietor from liability for loss."

This provision of the New York law still exists in an amended form in section 200, General Business Law; Consolidated Laws,

c. 201 (Birdseye C. & G. Consolidated Laws of New York), and it is well to keep in mind that the New York statutes do not purport to create the fundamental law or even to declare it, but they assume the strict rule of the common law; nor have the New York statutes changed or attempted to change the common-law liability of the innkeeper.

The Legislature of California amended both sections 1859 and 1860, and both amendments went into effect March 12, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 49). Section 1859 was amended to read as follows:

> "The liability of an innkeeper, * * * for losses of or injuries to personal property, other than money, placed by his guests, * * * under his care, is that of a depositary for hire; provided, however, that in no case shall such liability exceed the sum of one hundred dollars for each trunk and its contents, fifty dollars for each valise or traveling bag and contents, and ten dollars for each box, bundle, or package and contents, so placed under his care, unless he shall have consented in writing with the owner thereof to assume a greater liability."

Section 1860 was amended to read:

> "If an innkeeper * * * keeps a fireproof safe, and gives notice to a guest, * * * either personally or by putting up a printed notice in a prominent place in the office or the room occupied by the guest, * * * that he keeps such a safe and will not be liable for money, jewelry, documents, or other articles of unusual value and small compass, unless placed therein, he is not liable, except so far as his own acts shall contribute thereto, for any loss of or injury to such articles, if not deposited with him to be placed therein, nor in any case more than the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars for any or all such property of any individual guest * * * unless he shall have given a receipt in writing therefor to such guest."

Both sections 1859 and 1860 were again amended in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 149); but the text, so far as concerns the basic liability of innkeepers, remains unchanged.

[1] It is quite clear that by the amendment of 1895 the strict rule of the common law, which declares that an innkeeper is an insurer of the property of his guest, has been changed in this state, and that, as now stated in section 1859, the liability of an innkeeper is that of a depositary for hire. And as to such liability the provisions contained in the proviso attached to section 1859, and likewise the provisions of section 1860, are but modifications or limitations of the new rule.

[2] Admittedly, then, under the facts and the law, the respondent here became a bailee or depositary for hire. A depositary for hire must use at least ordinary care for the preservation of the thing deposited. Section 1852, Civ. Code. The question of negligence of respondent in the hiring of Clerk Ingersoll is disposed of by the trial court's negative finding in that regard, which finding is not attacked on appeal. This brings us to the crucial point, the one upon which the decision in this case must turn. Appellant presents the proposition in this wise:

> "If he [respondent] puts a servant in charge of the property and delegates to that servant the duty of keeping the property locked up and of safeguarding it, and delegates to him the duty 'to take care of those boxes and see that nobody gets in there' (Tr. fols. 112–114), and that servant then steals the property himself, thereby breaching the master's duty which has been delegated to him, it necessarily follows as a legal conclusion that the master is liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior as set forth in section 2338 of our Civil Code."

It is respondent's contention that "it is settled law that a master is not liable for the willful or malicious torts of a servant because a servant so acting 'steps aside' from his employment, performing an act for his own gain and not related to the employment."

[3] In the briefs of respective counsel, particularly in the authorities cited therein, there is much discussion and argument as to the meaning of the term "scope" or "course of employment." It would seem that the term is not capable of precise definition, although many attempts have been made to define it. The question of what is within and what is without the "scope" or "course of employment," what is and what is not an independent tort of the servant, cannot be referred to any very definite rule.

The facts in the case at bar relative to the point under discussion are, as shown by the findings, clear and undisputed. They bring this case fairly within the rule of those cases holding that, if a duty of the master be violated, he is liable alike whether he or his servant was guilty of the breach, and this, it appears, is so even though the servant acted contrary to instructions, without his master's consent fraudulently or criminally. "The rule is based on the fact that as to the particular transaction the agent had exceeded his authority, actual or apparent. Whether in doing so the agent has been guilty of a breach of faith with his principal, or has committed a crime, is of no controlling moment as affecting the responsibility of the principal to third persons injured thereby." Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 40, 124 Pac. 704, 708 (41 L. R. A. [N. S.] 529).

Respondent cites the following California cases as supporting his contention: Walsh v. Hunt, 120 Cal. 46, 52 Pac. 115, 39 L. R. A. 697; Rahmel v. Lehndorff, 142 Cal. 681, 76 Pac. 659, 65 L. R. A. 88, 100 Am. St. Rep. 154; Riordan v. Gas Consumers' Association, 4 Cal. App. 639, 88 Pac. 809; Baker v. Kinsey, 38 Cal. 631, 99 Am. Dec. 438; Hopkins v. Western Pacific R. Co., 50 Cal. 190; Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Co., 93 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. 234, 15 L. R. A. 475, 27 Am. St. Rep. 223;

In Walsh v. Hunt, the Supreme Court was considering the act of an agent to whom an executed note and mortgage had been left for delivery. The agent altered the figures evidencing the principal sum and the rate of interest. The court held that the agent was a mere bailee for delivery. The Supreme Court mentions this case in Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, supra, and says that it is not "at all in point on this matter." In Rahmel v. Lehndorff it was held that an innkeeper was not liable for an assault and battery committed by a waiter in a dining room upon one of his guests. This case is distinguished in Ruppe v. City of Los Angeles, 186 Cal. 400, at page 403, 199 Pac. 496, 497, where the Supreme Court says:

> "Something, perhaps, should also be said as to the statement in the second sentence quoted from Rahmel v. Lehndorff, that 'the wrongful act must be one which the servant is empowered under some circumstances to do.' If this be taken to mean that the act must be one which the servant is authorized under some circumstances to do, the statement is undoubtedly too narrow."

A simple illustration is given, and the court goes on to say:

> "In other words, while the master has not empowered the servant to break the law in the sense that he has authorized him to do so, he has empowered him in the sense that he has intrusted him with the performance of a duty in whose performance it is possible for him to break the law."

In Riordan v. Gas Consumers' Association the District Court of Appeal, at page 643 (88 Pac. 811), uses this very significant language:

> "The question, generally, is whether the servant at the very time of the alleged act of negligence, had departed from his employment, or whether he departed from or neglected a duty in the line of his employment. In the first case the principal is not responsible for the servant's acts, and in the second case he is responsible."

In Baker v. Kinsey the court held that an action to recover damages for the bite of a vicious dog belonging to the toll keeper cannot be maintained against the owner of the bridge if it appears that the defendant did not keep or harbor the dog in person, and did not authorize or require him to be kept, and did not know that the dog should be kept for the conduct or protection of the business in which the owner of the dog was employed. Hopkins v. Western Pacific R. Co. was an action for damages for construction of a railroad. In the syllabus to the decision appears this statement:

> "A railroad company is not responsible for the acts of its employees in creating a nuisance by using a culvert under its railroad near the residence of the plaintiff, for the purposes of a privy."

Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Co. was a case where an engineer backed his engine toward a street car crossing the railroad track with the simple intent to frighten passengers on the street car. A frightened passenger, believing herself in danger, jumped from the street car and was injured. Held that the act of the engineer was not done in the scope of his employment. In Copelin v. Berlin Dye Works & Laundry Co., jewelry was left in a suit of clothes delivered to the driver of one of the defendant's wagons for the purpose of having the clothes cleaned. The jewelry disappeared. It was held that the cleaning company was not chargeable as an involuntary or gratuitous bailee so as to be liable for the theft of the jewelry. The court pointed out that the cleaning company assumed no duty of safekeeping the jewelry and delegated no such duty to its servants, and hence the court held that the theft was not within the scope of the employment.

Respondent also cites a number of cases from other jurisdictions. We will review only the leading ones. Merchants' National Bank v. Guilmartin, 88 Ga. 797, 15 S. E. 831, 17 L. R. A. 322, was a case involving the question of whether a bank was liable for a theft of a safe deposit by a cashier. It was a gratuitous bailment. The bailee owed only a slight degree of care to the bailor. Apparently the cashier of such a deposit was not intrusted with the property or charged with any such duty in respect to it, for the court said:

> "The cashier had nothing to do about it except suffer it to remain in a safe place of deposit."

As some of the authorities put it, he had access to it but was not intrusted with it. Therefore the principal was not liable. The court further said upon the degree of care:

> "The law as disclosed by the authorities seems to consider that, in the case of a gratuitous special deposit, there is consideration enough in the bare custody of the property to insure its being kept without gross negligence, but not enough to bind the bank as an absolute insurer of its servant's honesty."

Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 478, 9 Am. Dec. 168, was another case of gratuitous bailment. It was held that the bank was not liable for stolen goods where due care has been used. The deposit was kept under the supervision of the depositor, he having the key.

Davis v. Hotel Chelsea (Sup.) 186 N. Y. Supp. 75, was a case where a hotel clerk stole valuables, and it was held that there was no showing of negligent employment by the master. The facts stated in the opinion of the court show that the chief clerk was not in the hotel at the time of the theft and "that the clerk who did the stealing had no key to either the safe or the inside compartment" and there was no negligence "in view of the uncontradicted testimony that said clerk had no keys whatever to the safe."

The case of Firemen's Fund Insurance Co. v. Schreiber, 150 Wis. 42, 135 N. W. 507, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 314, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 823, is interesting. The opinion was given by a divided court, four to three. The main opinion denied the liability for damage to an automobile taken out by an employee after he had left work for the day, upon the ground that he was not acting within the scope of his employment. In the main and dissenting opinions numerous authorities are quoted and discussed upon the subject of the master's liability for the servant's wrong done in the course or period of his employment. The majority opinion seems to indicate that the rule adopted by our Supreme Court in Otis Elevator Company v. First National Bank of San Francisco, 163 Cal. 31, 124 Pac. 704, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529; Kohn v. Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Co., 168 Cal. 1, 141 Pac. 626; Johnson v. Monson, 183 Cal. 149, 190 Pac. 635, and Ruppe v. Los Angeles, 186 Cal. 400, 402, 199 Pac. 496, is not deemed applicable to the facts under consideration. But in discussing Merchants' National Bank v. Guilmartin, supra, the court says:

> "The idea of absolute responsibility for the act of the servant, as if done by the master, or liability at all, except based on some fault as regards trusting the bailment to the control of the servant * * * was repudiated. * * * The court held, for liability, the wrongful act must be attributable to some negligence of the master, or some negligence or some other fault of the servant in doing the act the master employed him to do."

In the vigorous dissenting opinion is found this language by Mr. Justice Kerwin:

> "No one would claim but that the bailee himself would be liable had he done the acts complained of here. And it is settled in this state and many others, and is not disputed in the majority opinion, as I understand it, that the agent, when charged by the bailee with the duty of protecting property, stands in the place of the bailee and his acts are chargeable to the bailee"—citing authorities from Wisconsin, North Carolina, Illinois, Maine, Alabama, Indiana, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Tennessee, New York, Minnesota, Texas and Ohio.

The facts in all of the cases cited by respondent are wholly different from the facts in the instant case. It might well be argued that none of them called for the application of the doctrine of agency followed in this state. None of them contained such a showing as this (quoting from the finding of the trial court):

> "That said defendant employed one Charles E. Ingersoll to whom it intrusted among other duties the duty of safeguarding property deposited in its safe; that said employee was given a key to said safe, and had access thereto and to the personal property placed in the same; that it was the duty of said employee to safeguard said personal property by keeping same in safe, and of delivering the same to the plaintiff upon demand."

[4] A principal is liable to third parties not only for the negligence of its agents in the transaction of the business of the agency, but likewise for the torts, or other wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as part of the transaction of such business. This statement is a paraphrase of section 2338 of our Civil Code, which reads:

> "Unless required by or under the authority of law to employ that particular agent, a principal is responsible to third persons for the negligence of his agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, including wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business, and for his willful omission to fulfill the obligations of the principal."

In Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, 163 Cal. 31, at page 39, 124 Pac. 704, 707 (41 L. R. A. [N. S.] 529) it was the duty of the agent to do the banking for his principal, that is, to deposit checks and cash checks for him and to make out checks and to present them to him for his signature. The agent forged checks and cashed them at the bank. It was held that the principal was liable to third parties for the act of the agent. The court said:

> "It is the general doctrine of the law, as it is our statutory rule, that a principal is liable to third parties not only for the negligence of its agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, but likewise for the frauds, torts or other wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as part of the transaction of such business. Story on Agency, § 452; Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 65; Civ. Code, § 2338. After declaring this to be the rule Story says: 'In all such cases the rule applies respondeat superior;' and it is founded upon public policy and convenience, for in no other way could there be any safety to third parties in dealings either directly with the principal or indirectly through the instrumentality of agents. In every such case the principal holds out the agent as competent and fitted to be trusted; and thereby, in effect, he warrants his fidelity and good conduct in all matters within the scope of his agency."

In Kohn v. Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Co., 168 Cal. 1, 141 Pac. 626, the doctrine of estoppel was invoked. A case where bonds of a corporation, secured by a trust mortgage, each on its face being made payable to bearer and bearing the certificate of the trustee that it was one of the series of bonds secured by such mortgage, were feloniously taken by an officer of the trustee and pledged for his individual purposes, while the same were in the custody of the trustee upon a special trust. Our Supreme Court cited the case of National Safe Deposit, etc., Co. v. Hibbs, 229 U. S. 391, 33 Sup. Ct. 818, 57 L. Ed. 1241, and quoted with approval the following language from the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Day:

> "The qualification of the rule, as not applying when the instrument is stolen, is not based upon the name of the agent's crime, but upon the fact that, in the ordinary and typical case of theft, the owner has not intrusted the agent with the document, and therefore is not considered to have done enough to be estopped as against a purchaser in good faith. He certainly has not done enough if the estoppel is based upon the principle that, when one of two innocent persons is to suffer, the sufferer should be the one whose confidence put into the hands of the wrongdoer the means of doing the wrong. But in the case like the present, the agent has been intrusted with the converted property, and it is totally immaterial whether, by a stretch which extends largely beyond the true field of trespass, his wrong has been brought within the criminal law or not. The ground of the estoppel is present, and the estoppel arises. The distinction is not new. On the one side are cases like Knox v. Eden Musee American Co., 148 N. Y. 441, 31 L. R. A. 779, 51 Am. St. Rep. 700, 42 N. E. 988, where an agent or servant simply had access to a document remaining in the possession of the owner; on the other cases like Pennsylvania R. Co.'s Appeal, 86 Pa. 80, where possession is intrusted to the agent for one purpose and he uses it for another. It cannot matter in the latter class that the agent intended the fraud from the outset."

Again the doctrine of estoppel was applied by our Supreme Court in Green v. Caribou Oil Mining Co., 179 Cal. 787, 178 Pac. 950. A case where a secretary of a corporation who was the transfer officer of stock and who was intrusted with the duty of issuing valid stock certificates, forged and issued certain stock certificates for his own private gain. The corporation was held liable for damages, and the court said, in speaking of the case of Havens v. Bank of Tarboro, 132 N. C. 214, 43 S. E. 639, 95 Am. St. Rep. 627, and after citing that case with approval:

> "It was added that where the secretary issued the certificate and delivered it to a third party who acted without knowledge and in good faith, paying value for it, such party had the right to act upon the presumption that the representations of such certificate were truthful and not false and fraudulent, and the company having confided to him the trust of executing the business, the agent was held out to the public as competent, faithful, and worthy of confidence; and that though he deceived both his principal and the public by forging and issuing false certificates, it is but reasonable that the principal, who placed him in the position to perpetrate the wrong should suffer the loss."

Johnson v. Monson, 183 Cal. 149, 151, 190 Pac. 635, cites Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, supra, with approval, as does also the recent case of Ruppe v. City of Los Angeles, 186 Cal. 400, at page 402, 199 Pac. 496. Quoting from the opinion in the latter case:

> "The rule is elementary that a master is responsible for the acts of his servant done in the course of his employment, even though those acts be unauthorized or contrary to the master's explicit instructions. As between the master and third persons, the acts of the servant done as a part of the doing of that which he is employed to do are as if done by the master himself, and the question of authority as between the master and servant to do the particular acts is quite immaterial. Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) vol. 2, pp. 1016–1030; Civ. Code, § 2338; Rounds v. Delaware, etc., Co., 64 N. Y. 129, 21 Am. Rep. 597; Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 39, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529, 124 Pac. 704; Johnson v. Monson, 183 Cal. 149, 190 Pac. 635."

[5] Further discussion or citation of authority seems unnecessary. We are convinced, under the findings and the law, that the respondent in the instant case is clearly liable for the tortious act of its servant. We do not wish to be understood as construing section 1860, Civil Code, or interpreting its language. However, we will say in passing that we think it is obvious, whatever bearing said section may have upon the innkeeper's liability as a bailee or depositary for hire, the statute was never intended to, nor does it, exempt the innkeeper from liability to third persons for his own wrongs or the wrongs of his servant committed in and as a part of the transaction of the business of the principal.

At the risk of becoming tiresome we reiterate that our conclusion herein is reached by applying the law as we find it to the particular facts of the case.

KOHN v. KEMPNER et al. (Civ. 2652.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California March 1, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 28, 1924.)

Costs ⚷254(1)—Respondent cannot recover cost of copy of transcript on appeal.

Cost of copy of transcript on appeal cannot be recovered by respondent, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1027, as a necessary disbursement.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by Morris Kohn against Philip Kempner and others. From an order striking out an item of costs on motion to tax costs, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

Louttit & Stewart, of Stockton, F. I. Lemos, of Hayward, and Rose, Silverstein & Collier, of Oakland, for respondents.

GLENN, Justice pro tem. In the above action, as originally prosecuted, plaintiff secured judgment in the trial court. An appeal was taken under the alternative method, but the judgment was affirmed. Kohn v. Kempner et al., 59 Cal. App. 621, 211 Pac. 805. Subsequently plaintiff herein (respondent on the original appeal) filed a memorandum of costs, included in which was an item for the sum of $32, paid by him to the stenographic reporter and the clerk of the court for a copy of the transcripts on appeal in said cause. Upon motion to tax costs this item was stricken out. The appeal is from said order.

The costs of the transcript on the original appeal was incurred and paid by appellant therein (respondent here); but it is now claimed in support of this appeal that:

> "It was just as necessary for the respondent on that appeal to have these transcripts before him in defending the judgment and resisting the contention of the appellants herein as it was for the appellate court to have the same transcripts before it in determining the sufficiency and validity of the judgment attacked."

In support of this position appellant relies upon that portion of section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure which provides that:

> The party entitled to costs * * * may recover all amounts actually paid out by him in connection with said appeal. * * *"

Reliance is also placed on Estate of Prager, 167 Cal. 737, 141 Pac. 369, wherein the remittitur had issued without providing for the respondent (who had prevailed on the appeal) recovering costs. The remittitur was recalled for the insertion of this provision. No other question was involved, and none decided. In referring to that portion of section 1027, Code of Civil Procedure, above quoted, the court said:

> "We shall not attempt, at this time, a definition of the items covered by this comprehensive language."

We assume that it is upon this that appellant relies. It is apparent, however, that the court expressly left the matter open for future consideration.

Doubtless it is convenient for each party to an appeal to have a copy of the transcript before him in preparing his briefs to be presented to the appellate court, but the fault with appellant's argument lies, not in the lack of necessity, but in the lack of provision in the statute for reimbursement, therefor. The statute determines the necessity, not the individual. Presumably, each side has a copy of the pleadings, and, having participated in the trial, must be fairly acquainted with the evidence in the case, and herein lies the difference between the position occupied by a litigant and that of the appellate court. While the item here involved is small, it must be remembered that there are cases where the transcript covers many hundreds of pages, and, if one of the litigants, of his own volition, may order, and have furnished to him for his individual use, a copy of the transcript on appeal, then it follows that all the other parties to the action must be accorded the same right, and where there are numerous conflicting interests involved, each represented by different counsel, the expense would be of some considerable moment. So far as we are advised, such an item has never been recognized as a necessary disbursement, allowable as costs to be taxed against the opposing side. The case of Sime et al. v. Hunter, 55 Cal. App. 157, 202 Pac. 967, seems to be conclusive on the point.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

LANNING v. TALMAGE. (Civ. 2750.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 29, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹1011(1)—Findings of trial court, supported by evidence, though conflicting, must be held supported by evidence.

It is for the trial court to consider all the conflicting evidence, as well as the admitted facts and circumstances, and make its findings thereon, and if on appeal such findings are supported by evidence, even though that evidence is in conflict with evidence introduced by the opposite party, it is the duty of an appellate court to hold such finding properly supported.

2. Specific performance ⟹97(1) — Changing manner of possession and making improvements, without readiness and ability to pay purchase price, does not justify specific performance.

The mere fact that plaintiff changed his manner of holding land after the execution of an alleged oral agreement with defendant for its purchase, and made improvements on the land, held not to justify specific performance, in the absence of payment of the purchase price, or readiness and willingness and ability to pay, in the event of a decree for specific performance.

3. Appeal and error ⟹1011(1) — Appellate court will uphold finding based on conflicting evidence, if testimony on which it is based is not inherently improbable.

Where the trial court found on conflicting testimony that an alleged oral agreement for sale of land did not exist, and there was nothing in the record to show that defendant's testimony was inherently improbable, the appellate court could not hold that the finding was not supported by the testimony, notwithstanding its opinion that the trial court should have accepted the statement of plaintiff.

Suit by W. T. Lanning against Frank Talmage. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James D. Fairchild, of Yreka, for appellant.

Taylor & Tebbe, of Yreka, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff appeals from an adverse judgment of the superior court of Siskiyou county in an action prosecuted by him for specific performance of an alleged oral contract to convey real property situated in the town of Dunsmuir, in the county of Siskiyou.

The complaint alleges that on or about the 26th day of February, 1921, the plaintiff and defendant entered into an oral contract whereby the defendant promised and agreed to sell plaintiff certain described lots for the sum of $2,800; that thereafter a certain portion of said lots was sold for the sum of $700, and the money was received by the defendant; and that the balance due on said lots as the purchase price thereof was the sum of $2,100. It is further alleged that thereafter, and on or about the 12th day of April, 1921, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract for the erection of a building to cost in the neighborhood of $15,000, and that the purchase price of the lots herein referred to, to wit, the sum of $2,100, was to be counted in as a part of the payment by the defendant to the plaintiff for the erection by the plaintiff of the building just referred to. It further appears from the allegations that said building was partly erected, that certain payments were made thereon, and that on or about the 7th day of August, 1921, when said building was partly completed, it was destroyed by fire.

On the part of the plaintiff it is contended that the $2,100 is the purchase price of the lots alleged to have been bought by the plaintiff from the defendant, and was counted in as part of the payments made by the defendant to the plaintiff on account of the erection of the building agreed to be erected by the plaintiff for the defendant prior to its destruction by fire, and on the part of the defendant it is claimed that no such item was considered in the matter of payment, but that the defendant had paid to the plaintiff a sum considerably in excess of the amount which was due from the defendant to the plaintiff on account of his work and material furnished on the building being erected by the plaintiff for the defendant at the time of its destruction by fire. It is further claimed on the part of the plaintiff that the oral contract for the purchase of the lots and premises from the defendant by the plaintiff, and for which specific performance of the contract and conveyance of said premises by the defendant to the plaintiff herein is sought, was fully executed; that the plaintiff had gone into possession of the premises under said oral contract, and had made valuable improvements thereon with the knowledge and consent of the defendant. On the part of the defendant it is contended that the plaintiff had gone into the possession of the premises in controversy under a lease some years previously at the rental of $20 per month, and that whatever improvements were made upon said premises were made by the plaintiff upon his own responsibility, and without the knowledge, consent, or acquiescence of the defendant whatsoever. The value of the improvements made by the plaintiff was also controverted.

The transcript shows that the action involved an ascertainment of the standing of the account between the plaintiff and the defendant by reason of the contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant for the erection of the $15,000 building hereinbefore referred to. The testimony goes into and has to do with the different items of payment made from time to time on the $15,000 building erected by the plaintiff for the defendant from the date of the beginning of the work up to the time of its destruction by fire. In casting this account, and ascertaining the amount due from the defendant to the plaintiff, and the amount paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, the trial court came to the conclusion that the defendant had paid to the plaintiff, and for and on account of the plaintiff's use and benefit, the sum of $1,992 in excess of the amount of money due and owing from the defendant to the plaintiff for and on account of the work and materials furnished by the plaintiff in the erection of the said $15,000 building, not counting in items of credit for and on account of the alleged purchase by the plaintiff from the defendant of the premises involved in this action; in other words, that the defendant had paid to the plaintiff in cash the sum of $1,992 in excess of the amount due to him from the defendant at the time of the destruction of the building which the plaintiff was erecting. It is further found by the court that, if the improvements made by the plaintiff upon the premises occupied by him and belonging to the defendant did amount in value to the sum of $1,500, there was still due in cash from the plaintiff to the defendant the sum of $492 on account of excess payment.

[1] The plaintiff controverted some of the payments claimed to have been made by the defendant for the use and benefit of the plaintiff; but, such findings being supported by the evidence, it is not the province of an appellate court to hold to the contrary. The plaintiff also contends that the value of the building at the time of its destruction was in excess of that admitted by the defendant and found by the court; however, as the court has found payments in excess of the value of the building upon sufficient testimony to support the finding, we are not at liberty to disregard the same.

The appellant begins his argument by the following statement:

> "By eliminating all the evidence in which there is a direct conflict, and considering the substance of the admitted facts and circumstances this is a case which calls for equity to grant us the relief prayed for."

This is exactly what an appellate court is not permitted to do. It is for the trial court to consider all the conflicting evidence, as well as the admitted facts and circumstances in the case, and make its findings thereon, and if upon appeal such findings are supported by evidence, even though that evidence be in conflict with evidence introduced by the opposite party, then and in that case, it is the duty of an appellate court to hold such finding properly supported.

[2] In the case at bar the defendant in his testimony introduced fully all the items constituting the different payments made by him, the purposes for which they were made, and the aggregate amount thereof is simply a matter of calculation. The trial court had a right to accept such testimony, and upon a review thereof we cannot find anything inherently improbable in the testimony so introduced by the defendant, and therefore no reason why the findings of the court in such particulars are not based upon sufficient evidence. If the findings of the court in this particular are true, that the plaintiff at the time of the beginning of his action owed the defendant between $400 and $500 on account of excess payments made in cash by the defendant for the uses and purposes of the plaintiff, not counting in the alleged purchase price of the premises involved in this action, then and in that case, irrespective of the existence or nonexistence of an oral contract of sale by the defendant to the plaintiff and purchase by the plaintiff of the defendant of the premises so claimed to have been purchased by the plaintiff from the defendant, a conveyance thereof could not and would not, at the present time, be decreed by a court of equity, for the simple reason that the payment of the purchase price thereof by the plaintiff to the defendant has not been made. The mere fact, if it be a fact, that the plaintiff changed his manner of holding such premises after the alleged oral agreement, and made improvements thereon, would not be sufficient to justify a court of equity in upholding such an agreement and decreeing full specific performance, unless it also appears that the plaintiff has paid the purchase price agreed upon, or at least is ready and willing, and prepared upon specific performance being decreed, to pay to the defendant the amount of such purchase price.

[3] It further appears that the contract for the erection of the $15,000 building referred to in this opinion was a written contract, in which no mention is made of the oral agreement set out in plaintiff's complaint. The making of the oral agreement herein referred to is denied by the defendant, and the testimony set forth in the transcript upon that question is conflicting. On the part of the plaintiff it is testified that the oral agreement was made for the sale of said property in controversy by the defendant to the plaintiff for the sum of $2,800, and that subsequent thereto a certain portion thereof was sold for the sum of $700, leaving $2,100 still due. On the part of the defendant it is testified that no such agreement was made, that he did on his own account sell a certain portion of said premises for $700, and that at one time he did tell the plaintiff that he would sell him the premises in controversy for the sum of $2,500. Upon this conflicting testimony the court finds that there never was any oral agreement between the plaintiff and defendant for the sale and purchase of the premises involved in this action; that the defendant "did at one time state to plaintiff that plaintiff could purchase said property for the sum of $2,500, but the plaintiff never agreed to purchase said property or to pay the defendant the sum of $2,500, or any other sum." Upon this question it was the duty of the trial court to make its finding, and the trial court having found that there never was any oral agreement of sale and purchase, and there being nothing in the record to show that the testimony of the defendant is inherently improbable, this court cannot on appeal hold that the finding of the trial court is not supported by the testimony, even though we were of the opinion that the trial court should have accepted the statement of the plaintiff in preference to the testimony of the defendant.

It is not the province of the appellate court to weigh the evidence, but only to decide whether as a matter of law it is sufficient to support the findings; and if there was any substantial evidence to support the findings, it is the duty of the appellate court to uphold them. Southern Cal. Co. v. Amalgamated Assn, 186 Cal. 604, 200 Pac. 1; West v. Visalia Abstract Co., 53 Cal. App. 467, 200 Pac. 351. A long list of cases might be cited to this effect, but this principle of law is so thoroughly settled that further citations are unnecessary.

No legal reason appearing why the judgment of the trial court should be disturbed, it is hereby ordered that the same be and it is hereby affirmed.

WRIGHT v. SERIMIAN et al. (Civ. 4616.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 4, 1924.)

1. Work and labor ⚷9—Facts held to entitle plaintiff to judgment for reasonable value of labor and materials furnished.

Where, in an action for value of services and materials, undisputed facts showed that plaintiff, with knowledge and consent of defendants, performed labor and furnished materials upon and for defendant's building, and had not been paid, though defendants promised to pay, a judgment for plaintiff was proper.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1039(13)—Variance if it existed held not prejudicial where defendants knew entire transaction from beginning.

A variance between the pleading and proof, in that the complaint proceeded on a quantum meruit, and the proof showed an express agreement to pay for portion of labor and materials, was not prejudicial to defendants, where the entire transaction was known by them from the beginning.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Leslie T. Wright against Martin Serimian and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. K. Bonestell, of San Francisco, for appellants.

W. B. Good, of Selma, and Johnston & Jones, of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued and recovered judgment for $1,421.20 upon a complaint alleging that at the special instance and request of the defendants he had performed labor and furnished materials in the reconstruction and repair of a building owned by the defendants, and that the reasonable value of such labor and materials was the sum for which he recovered judgment. The complaint contains a great many more words than are necessary, but the essential allegation of employment, performance, reasonable value and failure to pay are present. The answer denies all these allegations. Upon the trial the defendants admitted the falsity of their denials, and the trial court found them to be untrue.

[1] The only excuse for the appeal from the judgment is that some of the work was performed by the respondent under an express agreement made with him and one Stone, who was the original contractor or superintendent of construction in the employ of the appellants. It is pointed out that during the course of the work Stone, owing to some dispute with the appellants, stopped the work and instructed respondent to do the same; that thereafter, upon the urgent request of the appellants and their express promise to pay to him the reasonable value of all the work and materials which he had performed and used under Stone's direction, the respondent continued with the work to its completion. It was shown, however, by the respondent that before he performed any labor on the premises a bid was submitted to the appellants for their approval and that it was only upon their solicitation that he entered upon the work.

Aside from the technicalities of the manner of employment and the authority of Stone—that is, as to whether he was an agent of the appellants or an independent contractor—the undisputed facts remain that the respondent, with the knowledge and consent of the appellants, performed labor and furnished materials upon and for the building of the appellants and for which he has been paid nothing, that the judgment represents the reasonable value of the labor and materials; and that the appellants on numerous occasions promised to pay, but that they have not done so. These facts are all conceded upon this appeal.

[2] There is some argument on the part of the appellants that there is a variance between the pleading and proof, in that the complaint proceeded upon a quantum meruit, whereas the proof showed an express agreement to pay for a portion of the labor and materials furnished. But in this case, where the entire transaction was known by the appellants from the beginning, it is clear that, if there was any variance between the pleading and proof, it was not of such a nature as to mislead the appellants, and thus, if any error occurred, it was not prejudicial to them.

Judgment affirmed.

PETERSON v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF SOLANO COUNTY. (Civ. 2734.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 21, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 21, 1924.)

1. Drains ⚷13—Reclamation district is not special commission or municipal corporation within Constitution.

A reclamation district created by special act which includes a part of a city is a public agency or arm of the state, and is not a special commission given jurisdiction of municipal affairs in contravention of Const. art. 11, § 13.

2. Drains ⚷1—City of sixth class not authorized to reclaim private lands.

Neither under Deering's Gen. Laws, Acts 2371, 2372a, nor Municipal Corporation Bill, § 862, subd. 11, has a city of the sixth class any authority to reclaim private lands, but this power is vested in the state as part of its police power, and the creation of districts is the means of exercising this power of assessment; Pol. Code, § 3488, not being applicable.

3. Drains 🔑13—How reclamation district created stated.

Reclamation districts in cities of the sixth class may be created as provided by Pol. Code, § 3446, or by act of Legislature; section 3488 relating to cities of the first class and certain tide lands containing no inhibition against the creation of a reclamation district by special act.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑57—Functions of cities of sixth class stated.

The municipal functions of cities of the sixth class relate to public safety, public health, maintenance of streets, lights, and the enforcement of general police powers, and they do not in any sense embrace the reclamation or improvement of private property.

5. Drains 🔑2(1)—Defining boundaries of reclamation district by streets of municipality held not to affect validity of special act.

The validity of a special act creating a reclamation district is not affected by the fact that it defines the boundaries by streets and alleys of a municipality or that it includes the streets and alleys within its exterior boundaries; the defining of boundaries not conferring on the district any political or police power over such highways.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑64—Cities of sixth class not immune from general laws.

Cities of the sixth class are not immune from the effects of general laws passed by the Legislature.

7. Statutes 🔑97(3)—No constitutional limitation on creation of reclamation districts by special act.

There is no constitutional limitation on the creation of reclamation districts by special legislative act.

8. Municipal corporations 🔑73—Reclamation of private property held not "municipal purpose" within Constitution.

Const. art. 11, § 12, providing that the Legislature shall have no power to impose taxes on a municipality or on the improved property thereof for municipal purposes does not inhibit the Legislature from establishing a reclamation district within the exterior boundaries of a city; the reclamation of private property not being a municipal purpose, even though the city may be benefited thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal Purposes.]

9. Drains 🔑73—Assessment not vitiated by failure to assess all lands within exterior boundaries of district.

Failure to assess all lands within the exterior boundaries of a reclamation district does not vitiate the assessment.

10. Drains 🔑76—That opportunity to appear at hearing not embraced held not to affect validity of proceeding.

Where notice and opportunity was duly given to appear at proceedings for the assessment of benefits for a reclamation district established by special act, the fact that the opportunity to appear was not embraced did not affect the validity of the proceedings.

11. Statutes 🔑61—Conclusively presumed Legislature took all necessary steps and gave fair opportunity for hearing.

It is conclusively presumed that the Legislature, in passing a special act establishing a reclamation district, took all necessary steps and gave all parties the opportunity to be heard.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Application by Isabelle Peterson for writ of review of the proceedings of the Board of Supervisors of the County of Solano, confirming assessment for reclamation purposes. From a judgment denying the writ, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Leo J. McEnerney, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, both of Woodland, and Brantley W. Dobbins, Dist. Atty., of San Francisco, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is an appeal from the judgment of the superior court of the county of Solano, denying a writ of review of the proceedings of the board of supervisors of the county of Solano, whereby assessment No. 1 for reclamation purposes was confirmed and authorized to be levied upon certain real property in the city of Benicia, including the property owned by the petitioner.

By an act of the Legislature approved June 3, 1921 (St. 1921, p. 1611), a reclamation district was created, to be called and known as the Benicia reclamation district. The boundaries of said district are described as follows:

> "All those lots and portions of lots, streets and alleys and portions of streets and alleys lying within and being a part of the city of Benicia, county of Solano, state of California, as such city is shown and delineated on a map of said city of Benicia filed in the office of the county recorded of the county of Solano on the tenth day of March, 1921, and recorded in Book four, page 45 of Maps which said lots and portions of lots, streets and alleys and portions of streets and alleys, all lie within a territory bounded as follows: [Here follows description of the property referred to, which includes something over 25 blocks lying within the exterior boundaries of the city of Benicia]."

By section 2 of the act just referred to the management and control of said Benicia reclamation district is made subject to the provisions of article 1 of chapter 1 of title 8 of part 3 of the Political Code, relating to swamp and overflowed lands and reclamation districts and the amendments thereto. Three trustees were provided for. The principal place of business was designated as the city of Benicia. The funds of the district were to be deposited in the county treasury of the county of Solano. Provision was made for the adoption of by-laws by the district. All the rights and powers conferred by law upon reclamation or swamp land districts were conferred upon the district organized by said act; in fact, it appears to be the intent and purport to confer upon the Benicia reclamation district all and singular the powers conferred by law upon and exercised by other reclamation and swamp land districts.

By reason of the conclusion at which we have arrived upon the main issues presented for consideration in this cause, the preliminary objection urged by respondent, that certiorari is not the proper proceeding to test the validity of the acts of the board of supervisors of the county of Solano in levying an assessment upon the property included in the district, will neither be considered nor passed upon herein.

It is insisted by the appellant that the act creating the Benicia reclamation district vests in the district functions and powers conferred upon the city of Benicia by the Municipal Corporation Bill and by the General Laws of the state:

> "That the jurisdiction over reclamation within the city of Benicia is vested in the municipal authorities; that the act creating the Benicia reclamation district vests in a special commission jurisdiction over the municipal functions of the city of Benicia in contravention of section 13, art. 11, of the Constitution; that the act creating the Benicia reclamation district delegates to a special commission the power to levy assessments for a municipal purpose and therefore is in contravention of section 12, art. 11, of the state Constitution; that the act creating the Benicia reclamation district is an act attempting to regulate the affairs of the city of Benicia by a special law and hence in violation of section 6, art. 11, of the Constitution of California; that the act creating the Benicia reclamation district is in violation of subdivision 33, § 25, art. 4, of the state Constitution in that it is a special and local law relating to and dealing with a subject wherein the general law can be made applicable; that the assessment levied by the supervisors places the entire cost of reclamation upon only a part of the land benefited, and it is therefore confiscatory and in violation of section 13 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of California, and section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States; that, if the act creating the Benicia reclamation district be construed as giving to the board of supervisors the power to determine the benefits, then the assessment is unconstitutional in that it was levied without giving petitioner a hearing or opportunity of hearing as to the inclusion of her lands within the assessment district."

As some of the foregoing objections apparently overlap, we shall not attempt to consider them seriatim.

[1] Many definitions have been given of the kind and character and the appellation properly applicable to a reclamation district, but in no instance has such an organization ever been called a special commission or a municipal corporation, but it is now generally spoken of, and we may therefore assume legally known and designated, simply as a public agency or an arm of the state. From which it follows that the contention of the appellant that a special commission or person or superbody has been created to interfere with or exercise control over the municipal affairs of the city of Benicia is wholly untenable. Whatever is done is the act of the state of California, and is not the act of a special commission by a corporation, company, association, or individual within the meaning and intent of those words as they appear in section 13 of article 11 of the Constitution of the state.

[2, 3] Nor can we follow the argument of the appellant in the interpretation sought to be given to section 3488 of the Political Code. As we read that section it vests no power in municipal corporations of the sixth class to reclaim private lands. That section, as amended, specifies that the provisions of the Political Code therein enumerated shall be applicable to any land situated within the limits of municipalities of the first class only and to tide lands within two miles of other incorporate cities or towns which are subject to overflow.

There are two methods of creating reclamation districts—one as provided by section 3446 of the Political Code, and the other by act of the Legislature. It may be further observed that there is nothing contained in section 3488, supra, preventing or inhibiting the creation of a reclamation district by special act of the Legislature. It is only when the district is organized under section 3488 that the municipality has the same power over it as is exercised by county officers over districts organized under the other provisions of the Political Code.

Subdivision 11 of section 862 of the Municipal Corporation Bill (Sts. 1883, p. 93, as amended), relied upon by appellant, does not, as we read the subdivision, vest cities of the sixth class with any power to assess city lots or improve the same by raising the level thereof, filling up depressions therein, or conferring any power whatever, save and except the building of breakwaters, jetties, seawalls, or embankments to protect the city from the incursion of outside waters. There is nothing in the subdivision conferring the authority to make the costs of the improvements and the filling up of the lots a burden to be borne by the lots and premises improved. The limitation of the powers conferred by this subdivision are set forth in the case of City of San Pedro v. Railroad Co., 101 Cal. 336, 35 Pac. 993. They are therein defined as being the same as the powers possessed by a natural person, which do not include the powers of levying and collecting special assessment for local improvements.

Nor do we find anything in the Act 2371 or in 2372a (Deering's Gen. Laws) which carries in the Municipal Corporation Bill or the laws creating cities of the sixth class any power to do or perform the work sought to be accomplished by the special act of the Legislature creating the Benicia reclamation district. Those acts relate to public improvment work or utility or improvements necessary or convenient to carry out the objects, purposes, and powers of the municipalities. There is nothing in either one of these acts vesting the town of Benicia with the power to reclaim private lands. We agree with respondents that this power is vested in the state of California. The creation of districts is the means of exercising this power of assessment. That the city of Benicia is vested with the same powers as the reclamation district finds no support either in the statute, codes or decisions.

[4-6] We do not need to enter upon a discussion of the municipal functions pertaining to cities of the sixth class. Suffice to say that those functions relate to public saftey, public health, maintenance of streets, lights, and the enforcement of general police powers. They do not in any sense embrace the reclamation or improvement of private property. Again, in considering whether the act in question trenches upon the municipal powers of the city of Benicia, it must be borne in mind that there is nothing in the act which purports to give the district any power whatever to change the grades of streets, interfere with the grades of streets, laying out streets, abandon streets, or exercise any political or police power within the boundaries defined as the reclamation district created by the act. The defining of boundaries is not a conferring of power. If the exterior boundaries of the district created had been set out by metes and bounds so as to indicate the territory included within the district, it would have sufficed and conferred exactly the same power upon the officials of the reclamation district as is conferred by the description chosen to be given by the Legislature. Contrariwise, the description chosen by the Legislature confers no more power than if the district had simply been described by giving the metes and bounds of the exterior lines thereof. Within every reclamation district, whether organized under the provisions of the Political Code or by special act of the Legislature, are public highways (which we may now say are both improved and unimproved), and it can scarcely be contended that the creation of these districts are invalid because there are public highways within their exterior boundaries. If this is true, the validity of the act creating the Benicia Reclamation District is not affected by the mere fact that there are or may hereafter be streets, lanes, or alleys within its exterior boundaries. It may also be stated that cities of the sixth class are not immune from the effects of general laws passed by the Legislature. See Ex parte Braun, 141 Cal. 208, 74 Pac. 780.

[7] Neither is there any constitutional limitation to the creation of reclamation districts by special acts of the Legislature. This statement of the law has been definitely and firmly established in our jurisprudence by the many decisions of our courts having to do with this question. People v. Levee District No. 6, 131 Cal. 30, 63 Pac. 676; Reclamation District No. 70 v. Sherman, 11 Cal. App. 399, 105 Pac. 277. On pages 406 and 407 of the volume just cited (105 Pac. 277) will be found a very full and careful analysis of what constitutes a reclamation district, of what it is, of what it is not, and of the power of the Legislature to create such districts, and also many answers to the constitutional objections urged by appellant against the act creating the Benicia reclamation district. The opinion in the Sherman Case, supra, is such a complete answer that a mere reference thereto is sufficient. To the same effect is the case of People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 103 Pac. 207.

[8] What we have said answers in part the contentions of the appellant that the act creating the Benicia reclamation district is violative of the provisions of section 12 of article 11 of the state Constitution. That section provides that the Legislature shall have no power to impose taxes upon counties, cities, towns, or other public municipal corporations or upon the improved property thereof for county, city, town, or other municipal purposes, etc. If the reclamation of private property within the exterior boundaries of the city of Benicia were a municipal purpose, then and in that case the objection would be good, but it is not a municipal purpose; as we have shown, a reclamation district is not a county, a city, a town, or a public municipal corporation. That part of the section has no application, but the remainder of the section simply prohibits the levying of taxes upon the inhabitants or property thereof for county, city, town, or other municipal purposes.

That the improvement of private property within the city of Benicia may be a benefit to the municipality does not render the reclamation or improvement thereof a municipal purpose. As the private property is reclaimed, its value will be increased and may, through taxes levied thereon, correspondingly inure to the benefit of the municipality, but that in no wise changes the purpose of the act in question, to wit, reclamation pure and simple. As we read the act, we do not see that it in any way interferes or authorizes any interference with any municipal improvement, money, property, or effects whatever. The money raised by assessment on the district does not belong to the municipality, nor is it raised with the intent and purpose of being devoted to anything coming within the powers of the municipality. Section 13, of article 11 does not, as we read the section, in any manner create a barrier to the provisions of the act creating the Benicia reclamation district. The act in question, as we have heretofore shown, does not delegate to any special commission, private corporation, company, association, or individual power to make, control, appropriate, supervise, or in any way interfere with any improvement, money, or property of the city of Benicia, nor does it give the Board of supervisors of the county of Solano or the trustees of the Benicia reclamation district any power to trench upon or interfere with any of the things mentioned in said section 13. The Legislature by said section 13 is given power to provide for the supervision of reclamation and conduct in such a manner as it may direct the affairs of reclamation districts, irrigation districts, and drainage districts organized or existing under any law of the state. These provisions are entirely separate. The Legislature, in providing for the Benicia reclamation district, is only doing what it is empowered to do under and by virtue of the powers conferred by section 13 of article 11 of the state Constitution herein considered. If the act in providing for the regulation of said Benicia reclamation district infringed upon any of the prohibitory provisions contained in said section 13, then, of course, to that extent the act of the Legislature would be void, but in view of the fact that the Benicia reclamation district is an entity, and agency or arm of the state, as distinct and separate from the city of Benicia, as a municipality, as though they were in separate and distinct parts of the state of California, it is readily perceived that their powers do not conflict, even though they do actually cover and include a portion of the same territory. Their identities are distinct and their constitutional powers and limitations are also distinct and separate.

[9] We may state again that the reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands of the state of California, whether privately or publicly owned, is a state work and comes within its general police powers. The power of the state to provide for the reclamation of lands by imposing special assessment or creating machinery through which special assessments are imposed and collected is so firmly established by the decisions of this state that we do not need to give this question further consideration. The objection that all the lands within the exterior boundaries of the Benicia reclamation district have not been assessed, whether benefited or not benefited, is fully answered by the following decisions: Reclamation District No. 3 v. Goldman, 65 Cal. 640, 4 Pac. 676; Los Angeles County F. C. District v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 126, 169 Pac. 1028; In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106; Miller & Lux v. Sacramento & San Joaquin Drainage District, 182 Cal. 252, 187 Pac. 1041.

[10, 11] Objection was also made that the assessment is void in that private property is taken without an opportunity to be heard. A reference to the transcript, folios 100 to 119, shows that notice was given and opportunity afforded to appear and make objections to the proceedings taken and had for the assessment of the lands included within the district just as provided by the various sections of the Political Code incorporated into and made applicable for the government of the district in question by the act creating the same. The petitioner was given the full opportunity to be heard upon the question of benefits and, as provided by law, an opportunity to have her objections thereto heard by the board of supervisors and also by action in the superior court. The fact that such opportunity was not embraced does not affect the validity of the proceedings. The district was created by an act of the Legislature, and, as stated by the court in the case of People v. Sacramento Drainage District, supra, it is conclusively presumed that the Legislature took all necessary steps and gave full opportunity to all parties to be heard. As stated by respondent, the matter of fixing the boundaries was a legislative matter, and the hearing as to the apportionment was had before the board of supervisors. The opportunity to be heard was given. No further requirement is necessary. Being of the opinion that no constitutional reasons have been shown why the act of the Legislature creating the Benicia reclamation district should be held void or that any of the acts of the board of supervisors of the county of Solano in relation thereto are other than as authorized by law, it follows that the judgment of the trial court should be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

Waters and water courses ⚷227—Irrigation district not "political subdivision" within election law authorizing contest.

Irrigation district, organized under St. 1897, p. 254, and amendments thereto, is not political subdivision of county, and contest of right of person elected director thereof is not authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1111.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Political Subdivision.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Election contest by Frank W. Huck against Charles Rathjen. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Levinsky & Jones, of Stockton, for appellant.

Crittenden & Hench, of San Francisco, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an election contest instituted under the provisions of section 1111 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine whether the plaintiff or the defendant was elected to the office of director of an irrigation district organized under the provisions of the California Irrigation District Act. Stats. 1897, p. 254, and amendments thereto. The defendant's demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment was entered in favor of defendant for costs. Plaintiff has appealed from the judgment.

The parties are agreed that the only question raised by the appeal is whether a contest of the right of a person declared elected to the office of director of an irrigation district is authorized by section 1111. That section provides:

> "Any elector of a county, city and county, city, or of any political subdivision of either, may contest the right of any person declared elected to an office to be exercised therein."

The question is whether an irrigation district is a "political subdivision" of a county. Respondent relies on the case of Hertle v. Ball, 9 Idaho, 193, 72 Pac. 953, which held that such a contest would lie. The Idaho statute provided that "the election of any person to any public office, the location or relocation of a county seat, or any proposition submitted to a vote of the people may be contested." This language is much more comprehensive than that of section 1111. In considering the provisions of the California Water Storage District Act (Stats. 1921, p. 1727) in Tarpey v. McClure (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 983, 989, it is said:

> "The act does not violate section 24 of article 1 or section 1 of article 2, in that it denies to any but landowners the right to vote at district elections. * * * 'By this and like provisions, the Legislature is not dealing with elections, with suffrage, or with the ballot, within the meaning of the Constitution and the election laws of the state. The formation of this and similar districts is a function pertaining purely to the legislative branch of the government. * * * Wherefore, it may do so by giving such persons as it may think best an opportunity to be heard.' Potter v. Santa Barbara, 160 Cal. 349, 355, 116 Pac. 1101, 1103. The decisions of the Idaho court to the contrary, based upon the view that these districts are political subdivisions of the state, are out of harmony with the decisions of this state."

Appellant cites the Tarpey Case, and argues that, because not a political subdivision of the state, "an irrigation district must be and is a political subdivision of a county." It is clear from the context, however, that what was meant by the language used is that an irrigation district is not a political subdivision at all.

Section 23 of the California Irrigation District Act provides that precinct election officers shall count the votes cast and execute certificates showing the result thereof, in a manner similar to that provided by the general election laws of the state, and deliver the returns, including the ballots, to the secretary of the board of directors; "and if any person be of the opinion that the vote of any precinct has not been correctly counted, he may appear on the day appointed for the board of directors to open and canvass the returns, and demand a recount of the vote of the precinct that is so claimed to have been incorrectly counted." The complaint alleges that at the time of canvassing the returns the "board of directors counted the ballots cast at said election." Respondent contends that, even if it be conceded that section 1111 authorizes a contest in a case of the character here involved, the superior court under that section and the board of directors under section 23 of the irrigation act would have concurrent jurisdiction, and that, since the board of directors has exercised jurisdiction by recounting the ballots and declaring the result, such determination is a bar to plaintiff's contest herein. In support of his contention respondent cites McGregor v. Board of Trustees, 159 Cal. 441, 114 Pac. 566. Such contention need not be considered, however, because it clearly appears that an irrigation district is not a political subdivision of a county, and that a contest of the right of a person declared elected to the office of director thereof is not authorized by the provisions of section 1111.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by E. D. McGrath against Joseph R. Kaelin and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dutton, Seccomb & McDonough, of Oakland, for appellant.

Edward R. Eliassen, of Oakland, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This action is one brought by plaintiff to establish an interest in certain real property by reason of an alleged judgment lien.

The amended complaint sets forth the following facts: On the 19th day of August, 1915, one J. H. W. Riley recovered a judgment of foreclosure and sale of certain real property against one Wallace Clark and his wife, Illma. This judgment was entered on the 23d day of August, 1915. Thereafter, on the 16th day of September following, a deficiency judgment in said cause was entered and docketed in the office of the clerk of the court in favor of Riley and against the Clarks for the sum of $711.05, which judgment, it is alleged, has never been paid or satisfied and has been in full force and effect continuously up to the time of the commencement of the action. Thereafter, on or about the 10th day of September, 1917, and while such judgment was enforceable, Wallace Clark purchased and became the owner in fee of the real property here in question, with full knowledge by defendants in the instant case. It is then alleged that the judgment against Clark and his wife became and was on said 10th day of September, 1917, a lien against said real property. Further allegations are to the effect that defendants herein claim an estate or interest adverse to the plaintiff which is inferior to and subject to the judgment lien. The mode or manner of the acquisition of such interest is not pleaded. The assignment by Riley of his interest in said judgment to plaintiff is then alleged, and the complaint prays for the usual relief.

Defendant Kaelin and his wife demurred to the amended complaint upon various grounds. The demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered in favor of respondents. The plaintiff appeals.

In paragraph V of their demurrer respondents urged that the deficiency judgment is defectively pleaded, since it cannot be ascertained from the recitals how it was continued in full force and effect, and in paragraph VII thereof they alleged that the cause of action upon which plaintiff and appellant relied was barred by the provisions of section 336, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. This brings us to the controlling issue raised by the pleadings, namely, whether or not a lien existed at the time this proceeding was instituted.

The judgment against the Clarks upon which the alleged lien is based was, as above recited, docketed September 16, 1915. The present action was commenced on March 3, 1921. It is the contention of the appellant that the lien continued for five years from the time of the acquisition of the after-acquired property by Clark on December 10, 1917. Respondent, on the other hand, insists that it expired or ceased to exist at the expiration of five years from the docketing of the judgment, namely, September 16, 1920, some six months prior to the filing of the complaint. It is conceded that the declaration in the amended complaint to the effect that the judgment had up to the time of the commencement of the action been in force and effect is based upon the construction which appellant claims should be given to section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Unless it can be said, therefore, that the section warrants such construction, the lien is barred and extinguished. That section provides as follows:

> "Immediately after filing the judgment roll, the clerk must make the proper entries of the judgment under appropriate heads, in the docket kept by him (noting thereon the hour and minutes of the day of such entry), and from the time the judgment is docketed it becomes a lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor not exempt from execution in the county, owned by him at the time, or which he may afterwards acquire, until the lien ceases. The lien continues for five years. * * *"

Appellant argues that under this section a judgment lien once attaching continues for five years, and that, as the lien could not attach to after-acquired property until its acquisition by the judgment debtor, the lien should continue for five years after such acquisition.

[1-3] We do not consider this the proper interpretation to be given to the section. Even assuming that it is susceptible of such construction, it is a rule of statutory interpretation that the intention of the Legislature controls if it can be reasonably drawn from the language used, to the rejection of a more literal construction which would result in inconsistency or absurdity. To find such intent is the object of all interpretation. A statute will be construed, therefore, with reference to the whole system of which it is a part, and all statutes which relate to the same subject-matter, briefly called statutes in pari materia, are construed together. They are all compared, and harmonized if possible, to ascertain the legislative intent and to give them effect accordingly.

Other Code sections deal with the subject in question. Section 685, Code of Civil Procedure, provides, in substance, that a judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, by leave of the court, upon motion, or by a judgment for that purpose founded upon supplementary pleadings; but nothing in this section is construed to revive a judgment for the recovery of money which shall have been barred by limitation. Section 2911 of the Civil Code declares that a lien is extinguished by the lapse of time within which, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, an action can be brought upon the principal obligation. By section 336 of the Code of Civil Procedure an action upon a judgment or decree must be commenced within five years.

Reading all the sections together, it appears manifest that the lien attaching to specific property by virtue of a judgment is extinguished and ceases to exist at the end or five years from the docketing of such judgment, unless the latter has been kept alive and is enforceable. A judgment becomes a lien simply by force of the statute, and depends for its existence upon the statute. It ceases to operate as a lien five years after rendition, where no valid execution has been issued within that time; it being only enforceable as long as the debt remains a valid and enforceable obligation. A purchaser, therefore, from a judgment debtor after the expiration of five years from the entry or docketing of the judgment, or such other period of limitation as the statute may prescribe, takes the land discharged from the lien unless it has been preserved by some exception in the statute.

For the reasons given, we are of the opinion that the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

CARROLL v. POLICE COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.
(Civ. 4836.)

Bail ⚷75 — Forfeiture in misdemeanor case held proper, though counsel appeared.

Forfeiture of bail was proper in a misdemeanor case, where defendant did not appear, though his counsel, who furnished bail, did appear, where the district attorney duly applied for and obtained an order requiring defendant's attendance for identification, under Pen. Code, §§ 977, 1043, 1148, 1193.

Application by James M. Carroll for certiorari to review an order of the Police Court of the City and County of San Francisco forfeiting bail. Writ denied.

James A. Himmel, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

George Lull, City Atty., and Maurice T. Dooling, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Application for writ of certiorari. From the petition it appears that on or about April 22, 1923, one Charles Johnson was arrested in San Francisco, charged with the commission of a certain misdemeanor. Thereafter, and on the following day, he was admitted to bail in the sum of $100, and petitioner herein furnished and deposited this amount with the bond and warrant clerk of such city. On April 25th the case was called for trial, and defendant appeared with his counsel and answered ready. The matter was continued on such day, and thereafter and from time to time until the 18th day of May, 1923, when, the defendant having failed to appear, the police judge, over the objection of petitioner herein, declared the bail forfeited, and ordered that a bench warrant issue for the arrest of the defendant.

It is claimed that the judge exceeded his jurisdiction and authority in ordering the bail so furnished by the petitioner to be forfeited, for the reason that he was defendant's counsel, and that he represented him when the case was called for trial, and, the charge being a misdemeanor, it was not incumbent upon defendant to be personally present; the court having full authority in such case to proceed to trial without him. The sole question, therefore, presented by the petition, is whether the record shows a breach of any of the conditions of the bail justifying the order forfeiting the same.

Section 977 of the Penal Code provides that if the indictment or information be for a felony the defendant must be personally present, but if for a misdemeanor he may appear upon the arraignment by counsel. Section 1148 of the same Code declares that if the defendant is charged with a felony, he must, before the verdict is received, appear in person; if for a misdemeanor, a verdict may be rendered in his absence. Section 1193 permits judgment to be pronounced against him in his absence. In construing these sections our Supreme Court has held that the mere absence of a defendant at the trial charged with a misdemeanor does not constitute a breach of the bail bond, and that a court has no power to enter a default thereon and declare the recognizance forfeited, as such a defendant so charged is not required under the provisions quoted to be present at the trial. People v. Ebner, 23 Cal. 159; People v. Budd, 57 Cal. 349.

In reaching this conclusion the Supreme Court in the Budd Case had under consideration section 1043 of the Penal Code. The portion of the section referring to misdemeanor cases provides in substance that, while the trial may be had in the absence of the defendant, whenever his presence is necessary for the purpose of identification, the court may upon application of the district attorney, by order or warrant, require his personal attendance; but no such application was made in that particular case. Here, however, the return to the writ shows that the district attorney duly and regularly moved and applied for an order requiring the personal attendance of the defendant at the trial for the purpose of identification, and that an order was accordingly made that he appear for such purpose. By the undertaking defendant was required at all times to hold himself amenable to the orders and process of the court, and, if convicted, to render himself in execution of the judgment. The record shows that the defendant failed to comply with the order made, for which reason the bail was forfeited. Under such circumstances, as indicated in the Budd Case, we are of the opinion that the court was justified and had full power to make the order in question.

For the reasons given, the writ is denied, and the writ heretofore issued is discharged.

I concur: ST. SURE, J.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 28, 1924.)

1. Limitation of actions ⟹34(3)—Action by city against former commissioner brought within year after expiration of office held not barred; "action on a liability created by statute."

An action by a city against a former commissioner of public health and safety, brought within a year after the expiration of defendant's term of office, to recover moneys paid him by the county as local registrar of vital statistics, held an action on an obligation created by law within the three-year statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 338), and not barred.

Provisions of the charter of the city of Sacramento that no officer of a city shall hold any salaried office, position, or employment in the national, state, or county government, nor receive any benefit or advantage from or by reason of any dealings or services for the city, fixing salaries, creating a department of public health, providing for its supervision by health officer, prescribing his duties and requiring him to keep all vital records for the city, held not to obligate a commissioner of public health and safety to account to the city treasurer for fees paid him by the county treasurer for discharging the duties of local registrar of vital statistics for the state.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑172—Fees collected by commissioner as local registrar of vital statistics for state not "public moneys" of city.

Fees paid to a commissioner of public health and safety by the county treasurer on certificates of the state registrar of vital statistics for discharging the duties of local registrar, pursuant to St. 1915, pp. 576, 586, §§ 4, 20, held not "public moneys" within the meaning of the Charter of Sacramento, § 96, for which the commissioner was liable to the city treasurer; "public moneys" meaning money or funds belonging to the city, moneys which are owing or payable to the city in its corporate capacity, such as assessments, license fees, or moneys derived from the sales of property, wharfage charges, and such like.

5. States 🔑44—It is within power of state to make local officers state officers for particular purposes, and provide fees for same.

It is within the power of the state to utilize local officers in different localities, and make them state officers for particular purposes, and direct fees to be paid for such services by the respective counties.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑172—Commissioner's want of legal authority to act as registrar of vital statistics held not to entitle city to fees paid him.

That a city commissioner of public health and safety was not legally authorized to act as public health officer or local registrar of vital statistics for the state, or that there was no reason why another acting under him as registrar should have turned the fees over to the commissioner, held not to give the right to the city to recover of him fees paid for such services, or fees so turned over to him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by the City of Sacramento against G. C. Simmons. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Elliott & Atkinson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Robert L. Shinn, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered against him in the superior court of the county of Sacramento in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $3,194.25. It appears from the pleadings and stipulation of facts in this action that the defendant was, from the 1st day of July, 1915, to the 30th day of August, 1920, a duly elected, qualified, and acting commissioner of the city of Sacramento, and during that period of time was the head of the department of public health and safety of said city; that, while acting as the head of such department, there was paid to the defendant for acting as local registrar of vital statistics the sum of $1,659.75, and that between the 16th day of December, 1918, and the 12th day of May, 1920, there was paid to said defendant by W. J. Hanna, the sum of $1,534.50, collected from the county treasurer of the county of Sacramento for acting as local registrar of vital statistics during the said period of time; that none of said money was paid over by the defendant to the city treasurer of the city of Sacramento; that no part of the said money was used by the defendant for personal or individual purposes, but was all expended by him for purposes which said defendant, as commissioner, considered as coming within the purview of his department. These expenditures, however, were unauthorized by any vote of the commissioners of the city of Sacramento and do not appear to have been ratified by them, although such expenditures were from time to time regularly reported by the defendant as such commissioner.

The action by the plaintiff is prosecuted upon the theory that the moneys collected by the defendant while acting as registrar of vital statistics were and are public moneys belonging to the city of Sacramento, and that as such the defendant was not entitled thereto, and that his expenditures of the sum were not in any manner authorized by law. On the part of the defendant it is insisted that the fees collected by the defendant from the county of Sacramento were and are not public moneys; that such moneys belonged to the defendant individually; that the expenditures made by him were for purposes beneficial to the city of Sacramento; and that, if such moneys were in fact public moneys, the city is now estopped from bringing action for their recovery.

[1] As this action was begun within one year after the expiration of the defendant's term of office, and as the defendant would have until the expiration of his term of office to pay over such moneys, if they belonged to the city of Sacramento, we think the statute of limitations has not run in this case.

An obligation to pay money to the city treasurer is an obligation created by law, and section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action upon a liability created by statute is not barred until the lapse of three years. Under the rule laid down in People v. Van Ness, 76 Cal. 121, 18 Pac. 139, the defendant would have up to and including the last day of the expiration of his term of office within which to turn over the funds collected by him, if such funds constituted moneys belonging to the city of Sacramento.

However beneficial the expenditures of the money herein referred to made by defendant were, we do not find anything in the city charter authorizing such expenditures by the commissioner of public health and safety of his own volition. Omitting the smaller items, $803 appears to have been expended for the upkeep of automobiles used in the transportation of employees of the health department; $1,057 expended through the medium of the local department of the American Red Cross; $835 for milk furnished sick and under-nourished children, and $582 for ice to preserve food for the poor of the city. It remains to determine whether the moneys collected and received by the defendant, as aforesaid, should have been turned over by him to the treasurer of the city of Sacramento. This involves a study of the city charter.

The city charter, as it existed during the period of time referred to, provided for the election of five city commissioners. Five departments were established, the third being the department of public health and safety, to which the defendant was assigned. Section 11 of the city charter provided for the appointment of certain officers who should be appointed by and hold office at the pleasure of the city commissioner, under whose supervision the department came. Under this section the defendant was empowered to appoint a health officer.

Section 13 of the charter reads:

> "No salaried officer of the city, elective or appointive, except as in this charter provided, shall hold any salaried office, position or employment in the national, state or county government."

Section 14 specifies that:

> "No officer, clerk, assistant or employee shall receive any commission, money or thing of value, or derive any profit, benefit or advantage, direct or indirect, from or by reason of any dealings with or services for the city by himself or others, except his lawful compensation as such officer, clerk, assistant or employee."

Section 15 of the charter fixes the salary of each commissioner as follows:

> "The salary of each commissioner shall be thirty-six hundred dollars ($3,600) per annum. * * * All salaries shall be payable in equal monthly installments, and shall be in full compensation for all duties and services performed by all officers and employés of the city."

Section 96 of the charter reads as follows:

> "All public moneys collected by any officer or employé of the city shall be paid into the city treasury, without any deduction on account of any claim for fees, commissions or any other cause or pretense; and the compensation of any officer, employé or other person so collecting money, shall be paid by demands on the treasury, duly audited as other demands are audited and paid."

Section 110 reads:

> "There shall be a department of public health and sanitation under the administrative control of the commissioner of public health and safety. Said commissioner and department shall have supervision of all matters pertaining to the sanitary conditions of the city and the health of its inhabitants."

Section 111 is to this effect:

> "The principal officer and executive of said department shall be a health officer who shall be appointed by the commissioner."

Section 114 requires:

> "The health officer shall see to it that the laws of the state and ordinances of the city relative to public health and sanitation and all rules, regulations, orders and requirements of the health department are promptly enforced."

Section 116 of the charter specifies that the secretary of the health department shall keep a record of the transaction of the department, including all vital records, or death or cemetery records, belonging to the city. Also a complete record of all births and deaths within the city, and interments in both public and private cemeteries.

Section 4 of the act of the Legislature, approved May 19, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 575), entitled an act to provide a central bureau for the preservation of records of marriages, births, and deaths, and to provide for the registration of all births and deaths, the establishment of registration districts, and to create the offices of state and local registrars of vital statistics, provided that, in cities having a freeholders' charter, the health officer shall act as local registrar and perform all the duties thereof.

Section 20 fixes the fees of local registrars, and further specifies that the state registrar shall quarterly certify to the treasurers of the several counties the number of births and deaths properly registered, with the names of the local registrars and the amounts due to each at the rate fixed therein.

In pursuance of this act of the Legislature the defendant (so far as the record shows not having been appointed a health officer) from the date the said act went into effect, down to and including a portion of the year 1918, acted as local registrar of vital statistics, and thereafter, and until the expiration of the defendant's term of office, one W. J. Hanna acted as such local registrar.

[2] We do not see that section 13 of the charter, to which our attention has been called, has any application. It is simply prohibitive, in that it is designed to prevent a city officer from holding any office or employment under the national, state, or county government.

Section 14 of the charter, to which our attention has been directed, is confined in its application to dealings with or services for the city, and does not relate to or have any bearing upon acts or services performed by any officer, clerk, assistant, or employee outside of and not connected with dealings or services for the city.

Section 15, in its concluding sentence, which we have heretofore quoted, makes the salaries paid full compensation for duties and services performed by all officers and employees of the city. It does not extend to or include services which are not for the city or within the purview, intent, meaning, or jurisdiction of the municipal functions of the city of Sacramento.

[3] Much of the argument in this case is centered around section 96 of the charter hereinbefore set forth. That section directs that all public moneys collected by any officer or employee of the city shall be paid into the city treasury, without any deduction on account of any claim for fees, commissions, or any other cause or pretense, etc. The question naturally occurs, What is meant by the term of public moneys collected by any officer or employee of the city? In 32 Cyc. 1248, the following definition appears of public moneys:

> "The meaning of the term in any particular case is governed by the context and the intent with which it is employed. As used in the statutes of the United States, money of the government, received from the public revenues or intrusted to its officers charged with the duty of receiving, keeping, or disbursing the same wherever it may be."

In Myers v. Kiowa County Commissioners, 60 Kan. 189, 56 Pac. 11, it is held that the term "public moneys" used in relation to counties, means the same as county funds. In other words, the public moneys of the city of Sacramento, as used in this section, we think, means money or funds belonging to the city of Sacramento, moneys which are owing and payable to the city in its corporate capacity, such as taxes, assessments, license fees, if any, moneys derived from sales of property, wharfage charges, and such like. It does not include fees for services performed in behalf of an agency outside of and distinct from any of the municipal functions of the city of Sacramento. The person designated by the enactment of the Legislature to perform the services of collecting vital statistics and transmitting the same to the state registrar is acting under the authority thereof, and is not in any wise accountable to the municipality of Sacramento for any failure whatever to perform such duties. It is provided by said act that the state registrar shall certify to the county treasurers of the respective counties the number of births, deaths, etc., and the amount of money to be paid to the local registrar. We find nothing in the charter which requires the local registrar to collect this compensation. It is no part of the duties of either the health officer of the city of Sacramento or of the commissioner of public health as the same are set forth in the city charter.

[4, 5] The act in question simply makes different officers in different localities local state registrars of vital statistics, and, to the extent that they are discharging such duties, they are acting as state officers. They are state officers performing state functions, and are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the state registrar of vital statistics. The compensation provided for this service is in no wise connected with any function exercised as a municipal officer. The charter provision, we think, has reference to the performance of duties incident to the municipal office in question, and does not extend to matters which are entirely separate and distinct therefrom. The power of the state to utilize different officers in different localities and make them state officers for this purpose and direct fees to be paid for such services by the respective counties is upheld in the case of Boss v. Lewis, 33 Cal. App. 792, 166 Pac. 843. We find nothing in the city charter which brings this case within the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of County of Humboldt v. Stern, 136 Cal. 63, 68 Pac. 324; County of Kern v. Fay, 131 Cal. 547, 63 Pac. 857; County of Alameda v. Cook, 32 Cal. App. 165, 162 Pac. 405. In the case of County of Humboldt v. Stern, supra, the decision of the court is explicit and particular in limiting the compensation claimed to acts performed for the county. It quotes the act of the Legislature applicable as follows:

> "The salaries and fees provided in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers herein named, either as officers or ex officio officers, their deputies and assistants, unless in this act otherwise provided." St. 1897, p. 572, § 215.

And then says:

> "This provision is a legislative declaration that the officers shall not receive any compensation from the county other than the salaries therein named for any services they may render it, either in the line of their official duty or otherwise."

The court was not considering acts or services rendered to the state of California or to any other municipality, power, or person outside of the county of Humboldt, but was only determining that the compensation provided for covered all acts that should be performed for the county of Humboldt, and the county of Humboldt alone.

In the case of County of Kern v. Fay, Supra, the court had to do with that provision of the law which allowed the sum of $10 to be taxed as costs for fees in suits instituted by the district attorney to foreclose school land certificates. The section relating to salaries of the county of Kern contains the following provisions:

> "The salaries and fees provided in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers therein named, either as officers or ex officio officers, their deputies and assistants, unless in this act otherwise provided." St. 1893, p. 507, § 216.

And then further on, in defining the duties of the district attorney, contained the following language:

> "On the first Monday of each month file, with the auditor, an account, verified by his oath, of all moneys received by him in his official capacity during the preceding month, and at the same time pay them over to the county treasurer." Id. p. 381, § 136.

In bringing the foreclosure suits for the county of Kern, Fay was acting in his official capacity as district attorney of the county of Kern, and under the above provisions he necessarily was required to pay all the fees to the county treasurer collected by him while acting in such capacity.

In the Matter of Dodge, Assessor of the County of San Francisco, v. San Francisco, 135 Cal. 512, 67 Pac. 973, we find such officer acting under a provision of the law which reads as follows:

> "The salaries provided in this charter shall be in full compensation for all services rendered, and every officer shall pay all moneys coming into his hands as such officer, no matter from what source derived or received, into the treasury of the city and county within twenty-four hours after receipt of the same." St. 1899, p. 364, § 34.

The question before the court was as to the right of Dodge to retain fees for collecting poll taxes. The court held that the collection of poll taxes was a part of his official duties as assessor of the city and county of San Francisco, and that under the charter he was required to pay all such fees and moneys into the city treasury.

In the case of County of Alameda v. Cook, supra, which had to do with the fees allowed by act of Congress to county clerks in naturalization proceedings, in holding that the county clerk was not entitled to retain such fees, the court called attention to the fact that Cook was acting as ex officio clerk of the superior court; that section 4232 of the Political Code read that his salary, which was fixed, should be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by him either as county or as ex officio clerk of the superior court, and also to section 4290 of the same Code, which required the clerk to collect for the use of his county and pay into the county treasury on the first Monday of each month the fees " 'now or hereafter, allowed by law in all cases, except where such fees, or a percentage thereof', were allowed to him or were made a charge against the county." The fees allowed by the act of Congress in naturalization proceedings (U. S. Comp. St. § 4372) were held to be fees "allowed by law," and as such the county clerk was required to pay them into the county treasury on the first Monday of each and every month after their collection. The charter of the city of Sacramento contains no such provisions as appeared in the law controlling the decisions of the cases above cited and the cases which follow the rule set forth therein.

We do not see that section 110, in providing that there shall be a department of public health and sanitation under the administration and control of the department of public health and safety, has any bearing upon the issues now being considered. The compilation of figures by the state of California showing the number of deaths has nothing to do with public health, the healing of the sick, or preserving the lives of the living, nor has it to do with sanitary activity. The remainder of the section shows what is meant by the first sentence of section 110 of the charter to which our attention has been called, to wit, the matter of sewage disposal, defective drainage, abatement of nuisances, the correct preparation, manufacture, and sale of articles intended for human consumption, quarantine requirements, and the prevention of the spread of infectious or communicable diseases. It has nothing to do with the compilation of figures which meet either a public need or satisfies a morbid curiosity.

Section 114 of the charter is simply along the same lines in requiring the health officer of the city to see that the laws and ordinances relative to public health and sanitation and the rules of the health department are promptly enforced.

Section 111, as far as it has any bearing upon the issues before us, simply provides that the health officer shall be appointed by the commissioner of public health and safety.

Section 116 of the charter has only to do with municipal duties to be performed by the secretary of the board of health. That the city of Sacramento provides for keeping its own record of vital statistics has nothing to do with the activities conducted along somewhat similar lines by the state of California. The concluding clause of that section sets forth the intent and purpose of the charter in confining the work of the secretary to such other duties "relative to the health and sanitation of the city as may be required of him."

[6] This résumé of the charter shows that matters of public health and sanitation within the city of Sacramento which are matters of general concern to all the people therein were very carefully safeguarded and provided for, and further that there is nothing in the charter as heretofore stated which requires any officer of the city to do or perform any act such as the state seeks to have done under the act of the Legislature of

May 19, 1915. Everything provided for in that act is a state function, wholly dissimilar and unconnected with any act required of any officer by the city charter of the city of Sacramento. The health officer of the city of Sacramento is one position, and that of local registrar of vital statistics of the state of California is another. The fact that one person performs the functions of both officers does not change the situation in any particular or make the two one. That the defendant may not have been legally authorized to act as public health officer (not having been appointed to that position) or to collect money from the county of Sacramento for his services to the state does not give to the city of Sacramento any title to the money so collected, nor does the fact that there has been no reason shown why W. J. Hanna, while acting as local registrar of vital statistics of the state of California, turned over to the defendant the fees collected by him give to the city of Sacramento any title to such moneys. In other words, if the moneys involved in this action were not properly collected or legally payable to the persons who collected the same, that is the concern of the county of Sacramento and not of the city.

Being of the opinion that there was nothing in the city charter during the period involved in these proceedings or in the general laws of the state which required the defendant to turn over to the city treasurer of the city of Sacramento compensation collected by him from the county of Sacramento through the agency of the state of California for discharging the duties of local registrar of vital statistics for the state of California, we conclude that the judgment of the trial court herein should be and the same is hereby reversed.

WEBBER v. BANK OF TRACY. (Civ. 4626.)

1. Warehousemen 🔑45—Ordinary care required of bank as safety depositary.

As to contents of safe deposit boxes in bank's safe deposit vault, bank is bailee for hire, bound to use ordinary care in safeguarding property.

2. Bailment 🔑11—Limit of bailee's obligation stated.

In absence of stipulation between parties, limit of bailee's obligation is exercise of ordinary care, and he is not insurer of property against theft.

3. Bailment 🔑11—Bailee must exercise care of ordinarily prudent person.

Bailee must exercise degree of care which ordinarily prudent person bestows on his own property of like description.

4. Bailment 🔑11—Standard of ordinary care depends on time, place, custom, business, and kind of article.

Standard of ordinary care by bailee depends on time and place, influence of custom and business, and kind of article.

5. Negligence 🔑4—Ordinary care required.

One failing to exercise ordinary care is guilty of ordinary negligence.

6. Warehousemen 🔑47—Burden on owner of contents of safe deposit boxes in burglarized vault to prove bank's negligence.

In action against bank for value of contents of safe deposit boxes in burglarized vault, burden was on plaintiff to prove defendant's failure to use ordinary care in safeguarding property.

7. Warehousemen 🔑45—Bank held not negligent in guarding safe deposit boxes.

Country bank's failure to install burglar alarm or employ night watchman, absence of telephone system, inadequate locks and eye bolts on back door of building, frosted windows, etc., obscuring view of vault door, etc., held insufficient basis for inference of negligence in guarding contents of safe deposit boxes in burglarized vault.

8. Warehousemen 🔑45—Negligence held not proximate cause of burglary of safe deposit vault.

Bank's failure to install burglar alarm or employ night watchman, absence of telephone system, inadequate locks and eye bolts on back door, frosted windows, etc., obscuring view of vault door, etc., held not proximate cause of burglary of safe deposit vault.

9. Negligence 🔑136(9)—Question for court.

Negligence is question of law for court only when facts are, in no event or view of case, susceptible of inference of negligence sought to be deduced.

10. Negligence 🔑119(7)—Fact must be proved as averred.

Negligence is always a question of fact, to be alleged and proved as averred.

11. Negligence 🔑134(1)—Mere conjecture insufficient evidence.

Averment of negligence cannot be supported by mere conjecture or surmise, but must be made referable to some specific cause or defect.

12. Negligence 🔑5—Not imputed from methods in business.

Negligence cannot be imputed from methods in general use in any business.

13. Bailment 🔑11—Standard of care established by testimony on custom and usages of business.

Standard of ordinary care by bailee is established by competent testimony on custom and general usages of business.

14. Negligence 🔑3—Degree of care required.

No one is held to higher degree of care than fair average of his profession, business, or trade.

15. Negligence 🔑4—Standard of care.

Standard of due care is conduct of average prudent man.

16. Bailment 🔑11—Jury cannot say that usual way of caring for property is negligent.

Juries must determine responsibility for individual conduct, but cannot say that usual and ordinary way of caring for property intrusted to bailee is negligent.

17. Warehousemen 🔑45—Negligence held not inferable from failure to keep safe deposit boxes behind stronger door of vault.

Bank's negligence in caring for contents of safe deposit boxes in burglarized vault held not inferable from failure to keep them behind stronger door of vault, especially where bank was accustomed to use boxes for its own money and bonds.

18. Warehousemen 🔑45 — Bank taking precautions of similar banks to guard safe deposit boxes not liable for loss from burglary.

Country bank conforming to practice of all other such banks in state in towns of like population and character in maintaining safe deposit vaults in building as good or better than ordinary country bank building with usual interior arrangement, and protecting vault by doors similar to those of other such banks in similar sized communities, held not liable for loss of contents of safe deposit boxes by burglary, though it had neither night watchman nor burglar alarm, which no such bank in state had up to time of burglary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Charles S. Webber against the Bank of Tracy. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order taxing costs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Crittenden & Hench and Creed, Jones & Dall, all of San Francisco (Esmond Schapiro, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

J. E. Rodgers and A. F. Bray, both of Martinez, for respondent.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck and Edward Hohfeld, all of San Francisco (H. A. Judy, of San Francisco, of counsel), amicus curiæ.

ST. SURE, J. This is an action by plaintiff for himself and as assignee of 21 claims, against the Bank of Tracy, for the value of the contents of safe deposit boxes, kept in the safe deposit vault of the Byron branch of said bank, which were burglarized on January 26, 1920. The complaint alleges that the bank was guilty of negligence and want of ordinary care in the protection of the safe deposit boxes and the preservation of the property contained therein. After trial by jury, a verdict was had in plaintiff's favor on 18 claims, amounting to $12,322.14; from the ensuing judgment for that amount, defendant appeals.

The facts are undisputed. The town of Byron, Contra Costa county, has a population of about 250, and is the center of a peaceful farming community. Its entire business section comprises a single street on the main line of the Southern Pacific Railroad. There is but one 2-story building in the place, and all the buildings, with the exception of the bank, are of wood. Until 1911 there was no bank nearer Byron than at Antioch on the northwest about 14 miles away, and at Tracy on the south, about 15 miles away. In 1911 the Bank of Tracy instituted a branch at Byron and assigned to it $25,000 working capital. The bank building was of concrete, with 18-inch walls, and the vault was constructed of the same material of the same thickness, with iron doors, "fire-proof and thief resisting." The front door and windows were of the ordinary business type. The rear door and window were protected by iron gratings. The grating over the rear door is described as a "barred door." It was made of iron and was a "lattice work hung by two hinges on two steel pins which were anchored in the cement wall. It was fastened * * * with a padlock on the inside of the grating." There was also a heavy wooden door across which on the inside was an iron bar. On either side of the bank building are wooden structures, and in the rear is a high board fence. A vacant lot adjoining the bank premises gave access to the rear of the bank building. Trees near said fence obscured the back door through which entrance to the steel vault doors was effected. No burglar alarm, bell, or other warning device was installed in the bank. There was no watchman for the same; the only peace officer in the community lived on the same street as the bank and within 65 feet of it. From the front of the bank the upper portion of the vault door could be seen by looking through the window, over the top of grill work surmounting frosted glass and wooden base. The whole partition was probably 5 feet high. Several trains passed on the main line during the night, and there was generally some switching there also. The street lighting system of the town was by popular subscription, and as funds were low the lights were used only occasionally. There was no telephone service out of the town after 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening. No one slept in the buildings on either side of the bank. Defendant had rented yearly on an average of 100 safe deposit boxes at an annual rental of $2 per box; the total income therefrom approximating $200 per annum. Defendant was accustomed to, and did, on the night of the robbery, use one of the safe deposit boxes for some of its own coin and Liberty Loan bonds. The safe deposit vault was burglarized by unknown persons by the use of the oxyacetylene torch and flame. With one possible exception this was the first bank robbery accomplished by such means in the United States, but following in the same year there were four other similar bank robberies in California. The oxyacetylene flame will cut through solid steel at least 26 inches thick. The precautions taken by the defendant for the safety of its box renters and the contents of such safe deposit boxes were similar and at least equal to those taken by all other banks in similar and even larger communities in California. Up to the time of the robbery no bank in any community in California with a population of less than 1,000 had a burglar alarm on its safe deposit vault, or kept a private watchman.

Defendant alleges as its first point for reversal that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict on any count.

[1-5] The relation between these parties was that of bailor and bailee. The defendant was a bailee for hire. It devolved upon defendant to use ordinary care in the safeguarding of plaintiff's property. Cussen v. Southern California Savings Bank, 133 Cal. 534, 65 Pac. 1099, 85 Am. St. Rep. 221. In the absence of any stipulation between the parties, the limit of a bailee's obligation is the exercise of ordinary care, and he cannot be said to be an insurer of the property against theft, if he has exercised such care. Perera v. Panama Pacific International Exposition Co., 179 Cal. 63, 175 Pac. 454; Copelin v. Berlin Dye Works, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 715, 144 Pac. 961, L. R. A. 1915C, 712. In general it may be said that a bailee is required to exercise that degree of care which an ordinarily prudent person bestows upon his own property of a like description. The standard of ordinary care must, of necessity, vary with time and place, since what might be ordinary care at certain times and in certain localities might, at different times and at other places, amount to but slight care. The influence of custom and business must also be considered in determining what is ordinary care, as in certain businesses or trades disposition may be made of property or goods by a man of ordinary prudence which, under other circumstances, would certainly be open to the charge of gross negligence. Moreover, what would be the exercise of ordinary care with regard to articles of a certain kind, might be far from such with regard to those of a different sort. When one is wanting in the exercise of ordinary care, he is said to be guilty of ordinary negligence.

It would seem that the ordinary care required of a bank in a case like this is that the construction of the bank building and the methods of protection and the general conduct of its business should conform to those of banks in similar communities. Chilberg v. Standard Furniture Co., 63 Wash. 414, 115 Pac. 837, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1079; Ketterer v. Armour & Co., 247 Fed. 921, 160 C. C. A. 111, L. R. A. 1918D, 798; Battelle v. Mercantile Warehouse Co., 139 App. Div. 649, 124 N. Y. Supp. 135; Jones v. Hatchett & Bro., 14 Ala. 743; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin's Adm'r, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. 869, 70 L. R. A. 999; Pioneer Fire Proof Construction Co. v. Caroline Sandberg, Adm'x, etc., 98 Ill. App. 36; Burns v. Sennett & Miller, 99 Cal. 363, 33 Pac. 916; Hennesey v. Bingham, 125 Cal. 627, 58 Pac. 200; Longuy v. La Société Française, 52 Cal. App. 370, 198 Pac. 1011.

[6-8] Before proceeding with a consideration of the evidence we will advert to the charges made by plaintiff in his complaint against the defendant. It is alleged that the defendant was negligent and failed to use ordinary care in safeguarding the property. It was incumbent upon plaintiff to sustain the burden of proving these charges. As was said in Perera v. Panama Pacific International Exposition Co., 179 Cal. 63, 175 Pac. 454, it was incumbent upon the bailor to introduce evidence from which the jury might legitimately infer that the loss or theft was due to the lack of ordinary care on the part of the bailee. An examination of the record discloses an utter lack of such affirmative proof. Plaintiff's counsel beg the question by arguing that "no care at all appears to have been used by the bank in safeguarding its safe depositors." We look in vain for the proof. Take, for example, the charges of omission made against defendant, such as the failure to install a burglar alarm or employ a watchman; there is no evidence to support the conclusion that either of such omissions was a negligent omission. The same may be said with reference to every other charge made by plaintiff. But, say counsel for plaintiff, "we do not contend that any one of these elements would necessarily in itself be conclusive upon the question of reasonable care, but we do contend that all of them taken together constitute a very strong case of gross negligence." A complete answer to this contention is that the evidence is as barren of any proof which would support any "element" in plaintiff's case as it is with respect to the omission of the burglar alarm or watchman. In this connection counsel call our attention to what they term a combination of circumstances such as no telephone system, inadequate locks and eye bolts on back door, inadequate street lighting system, trees and high board fence screening rear premises from observation, frosted windows, grill work, obscuring the view of vault door, shades on windows, noise of passing trains, and the like. Such circumstances furnish no sufficient basis for any inference of negligence. Furthermore, even though such combination of circumstances be deemed negligence, it cannot be maintained that such negligence was the proximate cause of the burglary; the connecting links between the negligence and the burglary are wholly lacking. Union Investment Co. v. San Francisco Gas & Electric Co., 168 Cal. 58, 141 Pac. 807; Puckhaber v. Southern Pacific Co., 132 Cal. 363, 64 Pac. 480. The view we have herein expressed upon the question of the proof of negligence is fully supported by the opinion of Mr. Justice Myers of the Supreme Court in the recent case of Marovich v. Central California Traction Co. (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 595.

[9] Plaintiff cites a number of cases holding that one doing a safe deposit business is a bailee for hire and is bound to use ordinary care, which is conceded. It is urged that the material facts in this case are in dispute, and therefore the question of negligence was one for the jury. We have gleaned from the record and stated herein all of the facts. We accept the rule as stated in Runkle v. Southern Pacific Milling Co., 184 Cal. 714, 195 Pac. 398, 16 A. L. R. 275, that—

> "It is only when the facts of a given case are not in any event or in any view of the case susceptible to the inference of negligence sought to be deduced therefrom that the question of negligence becomes one of law for the sole consideration of the court rather than one of fact for the determination of the jury."

[10, 11] It is apparent that counsel for plaintiff err in the application of this rule. Negligence is always a question of fact to be alleged and proved as averred. It cannot be supported by mere conjecture or surmise, but must be made referable to some specific cause or defect. As was well said in Perera v. Panama Pacific International Exposition Co., supra, at page 67 (175 Pac. 456):

> "It is true, of course, that evidence of facts and circumstances from which want of ordinary care may reasonably be inferred is sufficient to support a conclusion of negligence, in which event the question of negligence is one for the jury. But the difficulty here is that the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence furnish no sufficient basis for any such inference."

[12-16] Negligence is not to be imputed from methods in general use in any business. The standard of ordinary care is established by competent testimony upon the custom and general usages of the business. Absolute protection against bank burglary, in small communities, is unattainable. Indeed, one witness, a safe manufacturer, said in this case "there is no such thing as a burglar-proof safe. * * * By theft-resisting I mean the safe gives reasonable protection." No man is held by law to a higher degree of care than the fair average of his profession, business, or trade, and the standard of due care is the conduct of the average prudent man. The test of negligence in the bailee is the same, and however strongly they may be convinced that there is a better, no jury can be permitted to say that the usual way and ordinary way is a negligent way, for which liability shall be imposed. Juries must necessarily determine the responsibility of individual conduct, but they cannot be allowed to set a standard which shall, in effect, dictate the customs or control the business of the community. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin's Adm'r, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. 869, 70 L. R. A. 999. Counsel for plaintiff would have defendant an insurer, which most emphatically it is not.

[17] Counsel for plaintiff further insist that negligence is inferable from the fact that the safe-deposit boxes were not kept behind a stronger door of a vault maintained by defendant. Merchants' Bank of Vandervoort v. Affholter, 140 Ark. 480, 215 S. W. 648, is cited in support of such proposition. An examination shows that this was a case where Liberty bond subscription cards designating registered bonds, together with purchase price of bonds were deposited with the bank, the bank having ordered coupon instead of registered bonds, was liable to subscribers for money advanced, upon the theft of the bonds from the bank vaults, whether it was acting as agent of subscribers or as promoter of loan drive, since having accepted funds for purchase of bonds it was responsible to subscribers either for return of money or for delivery of bonds designated in subscription contract. Here the bank had a special duty to perform and was intrusted with the money with which to purchase the bonds. It undertook to purchase the bonds and safely keep them. The case is not at all in point. Besides, in the instant case the facts show that defendant was accustomed to and did use the safe deposit boxes for some of its own coin and Liberty bonds.

[18] While plaintiff has wholly failed to affirmatively show negligence, defendant has shown by undisputed evidence, that in maintaining its safe deposit vaults it conformed to the practice and conduct of all other country banks in California, situated in towns of like population and character. Briefly, this evidence shows, without conflict or contradiction, that the bank building was as good or better than the ordinary country bank building in California; that the interior arrangement of the bank was the ordinary and usual arrangement; that the bank vaults were protected by doors similar in all respects to those in other banking institutions in California in similar sized communities; that no bank in California, up to the time of the robbery, in a community of less than 1,000 inhabitants, had either a night watchman or a burglar alarm.

Believing, as we do, that the evidence wholly fails to sustain the verdict, we are of the opinion that the judgment must be reversed. The order of the trial court taxing costs, made after judgment, from which the defendant also appeals, naturally falls with the main case. We consider it unnecessary to consider other points raised by defendant.

CLIFFORD et ux. v. FLESHMAN et al. (Civ. 2664.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 23, 1924.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⚷299(4)—Promptness in paying installments held not waived by settling suit for those past due.

Vendor held not to have waived, as matter of law, right to forfeit contract for default in payment of installments when due by having started an action to forfeit and having settled the same on payment of installments due to date.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⚷299(3)—Waiver of stipulation making time of essence of installment contract must be pleaded.

In view of Civ. Code, § 3275, waiver of stipulation in installment contract making time of the essence of the contract is a matter of defense, which must be pleaded in an action to forfeit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by D. O. Clifford and another against C. C. Fleshman and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing & Wild and J. R. Fitch, all of Fresno, for appellants.

George Cosgrave, of Fresno, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiffs began this action to quiet title to portions of three lots situated in the Blackstone Park addition to the city of Fresno. The complaint is in the ordinary form of an action to quiet title, the plaintiffs resting upon a certain agreement of purchase held by them with the owners of the property. The prayer of the complaint is that the defendants be required to set forth the nature of their claim to the premises, that it be adjudged that the defendants have no title thereto, and that the title of the plaintiffs to the premises be quieted. The answer filed by the defendants consists of simple denials of the allegation of complaint, and an allegation that the plaintiffs entered into a contract with one C. C. Fleshman for the purchase of the property mentioned in plaintiffs' complaint, and that said Fleshman thereafter assigned and sold all his right, title, and interest therein to the defendant D. Lillian Clark. The action was tried principally upon an agreed statement of facts from which it appears as follows:

That on or about the 18th day of February, 1920, the plaintiffs entered into a contract of sale and purchase with C. C. Fleshman, the grantor of the defendant D. Lillian Clark, for the property mentioned in plaintiffs' complaint; the price agreed upon in the contract being $5,125, payable as follows: $500 in cash; $125 on March 18, 1920; $125 on April 18, 1920; $125 on May 18, 1920; $125 on June 18, 1920; and thereafter $50 per month, payable on the 18th day of each and every month, together with the interest thereon, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable monthly, until the full payment of the contract price mentioned above. These payments appear to have been made up to and including the 18th day of March, 1921; no payments having been made on the 18th day of April, 1921, nor on the 18th day of May, 1921. The plaintiffs on or about the 31st day of May, 1921, wrote the defendants as follows:

"Fresno, California, May 31, 1921.

"Mr. C. C. Fleshman, 1627 Patterson Avenue, Fresno, California—Dear Sir: You are hereby notified that pursuant to the terms of that certain contract dated February 18, 1920, between D. C. Clifford and Maude A. Clifford, as sellers, and C. C. Fleshman, as buyer, for the sale of the real property in the county of Fresno described as the north 50 feet of lots 14, 15, 16, and 17 in block 8 of Blackstone Park addition to the city of Fresno, the said sellers elect to cancel and terminate the same because of nonperformance of the terms thereof, on the part of buyer." Signed by Cliffords and George Cosgrave, attorney for the Cliffords.

It also appears that on or about the 12th day of June, 1921, the plaintiff wrote a second letter to the defendants, stating that they would insist upon prompt payment of the installments as they became due. Thereafter, and on the 22d day of June, 1921, the plaintiffs in this action began suit against the defendants to have the contract herein referred to declared forfeited. The cause was set for trial some time during the early part of November, 1921. On the 15th day of November, 1921, this case was settled by the defendant Clark paying to the plaintiffs all of the payments then due, to wit, seven monthly installments, accumulated interest, street assessment, and taxes. The action herein referred to was thereupon dismissed.

Another monthly installment of $50 became due on the 18th of November, 1921. This installment was not paid, and on the 7th day of December, 1921, the action which is now before this court on appeal was begun by the plaintiffs for the purposes hereinbefore stated. The plaintiffs had judgment, and the defendants appeal.

The stipulation as to the facts, in addition to what we have set forth, recites as follows:

> "At the time set for the trial (of the first action herein referred to) a settlement was made by a payment of all delinquencies and the parties restored to their rights under the contract—the defendant Lillian Clark restored to her rights under the contract. The payment was made by Mrs. Clark on the 15th day of November. The payment due November 18th was not paid. The first installment of taxes on the property for the fiscal year of 1921–1922 was allowed to become delinquent. On December 9, 1921, the sum of $50 was posted by the defendant Lillian Clark and duly tendered by the defendant. The installment of taxes due at the time was $17.17. The $50 was tendered after the beginning of this action, but before summons was served upon the defendant Clark."

The appellants center their attack principally upon findings numbered 6 and 7 of the trial court, which are to the effect, first, that the defendants have not performed the terms thereon, but have failed and neglected to make the payment of the purchase price required by said contract, and that the plaintiffs have at all times duly performed all the terms thereof; and, second, that the plaintiffs have elected to terminate said contract, and that the defendants, by reason of nonpayment, have forfeited their rights to the same and that the contract is terminated and ended. The contract provides that, in the event of a failure on the part of the buyer to keep or perform any of the terms, conditions, or covenants to be performed by the buyer, the sellers shall, at their option, cancel and terminate the agreement, and the sellers shall be relieved from all obligation in law and in equity to convey the premises, and the money theretofore paid shall be kept and retained by the sellers, etc. It is also specified that time is of the essence of the agreement.

[1] The stipulated facts show that the terms and conditions of the contract were not complied with, but the appellants, in their argument before this court, insist that the provision as to time being of the essence thereof was waived by the plaintiffs by reason of their having accepted payment of the amount due on November 15th, and their dismissal on that date of their action theretofore begun, to have the contract canceled and their title to the premises involved quieted. The plaintiffs and respondents insist that no such waiver is shown, but, on the contrary, that their actions show an insistence upon prompt compliance with all the terms and conditions thereof.

At the time of the beginning of the action, in June, 1921, only three installments were due. On the 31st day of May, 1921, when the letter referred to was sent to the defendants, only two installments were delinquent. It thus appears that no considerable time elapsed after the installments became due before the plaintiffs began insisting upon their rights. There is no testimony concerning any of the payments falling due prior to April 18, 1921, but the inference would be that the terms of the contract had been complied with just as agreed upon to that date; in other words, there had been no "course of conduct" by the plaintiffs in accepting payment of installments up to that date from which the trial court might infer a waiver of any of its terms. As above stated, the payment of seven installments was accepted when the suit was finally settled, four of which accrued after the date of the beginning of the action. There was but one payment, however, and only one acceptance. Does this establish a course of conduct justifying this court as a matter of law in holding that the stipulation as to time was waived by the plaintiffs? The leading case in this state on this question, where the subject of waiver is fully considered, is that of Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126. In that case it appears from the statement of facts set forth in the opinion that "14 payments in succession had been accepted after maturity and without objection or protest of any kind." It also appears that there was an allegation in the pleading to the effect that each of these payments was accepted by Templeman without objecting thereto on the ground that plaintiff had not complied with his contract. In the opinion in the Templeman Case we find also the following:

> "We find" no case "that goes so far as to hold that the mere acceptance of one payment after its maturity will waive the right to declare a forfeiture if default occurs in subsequent installments. In Lent v. Burlington, etc., Co., 11 Neb. 201, 8 N. W. 431, the court on this point says: 'The simple act of receiving a payment after the date when the payee was bound to accept it, without more, is no excuse for laches as to future payments. The effect of the acceptance is exhausted upon the payment made, and as to those following the provisions of the contract are left to operate with unimpaired force.'"

To the same effect are a number of cases cited. The court then said that in the Templeman Case much more appears. A payment of $50 was due on the 5th day of every month after November, 1901, and that not one of the payments was made on the day it became due, except the first. Interest fell due each month, but nothing was demanded, nor were any objections raised on that score. After the acceptance of the last sum paid, 24 additional payments of principal and interest fell due and were not paid; Boone remaining in possession and Templeman apparently acquiescing in the continuance of the contract, giving no notice to the contrary, nor doing anything inconsistent therewith for still another period of 14 months. The court held that this laid a foundation for a waiver not necessarily absolute and permanent, yet of such a character as only could be restored by giving a definite and specific notice of an intention to that effect, citing a number of cases adhering to such rule.

In De Bairos v. Barlin, 46 Cal. App. 665, 190 Pac. 188, the Supreme Court, in its order denying a rehearing, reported on page 674 of the same volume of Reports (190 Pac. 192), states the rule as follows:

> "Acceptance of overdue installments of the price, on an executory contract for the sale of land, waives any right to declare a forfeiture on account of the previous failures to pay when due. But such acceptance alone does not change the terms of the contract as to forfeiture for future failures, nor eliminate the provision that time is of the essence of the contract. There may be conduct and acquiescence by the vendor sufficient to justify the inference by a court as a matter of fact that the vendor has waived the conditions of a contract regarding a forfeiture, which he afterward claims the right to enforce, and when in such a case the waiver has continued until after all installments are due, the condition cannot be revived except by notice to the vendee."

It is then further stated that none of these cases claim that such waiver is absolute or that the provision as to forfeiture cannot be revived.

In the case of Stevenson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751, where time was made the essence of the contract, it appears that the weekly payments provided to be paid were accepted a great number of times after they had become delinquent, and that at a date prior to any notice of forfeiture on account of delinquencies in making installment payments as provided for the purchaser had tendered all the money due under the agreement. It was not until that time that the plaintiff refused to accept the same. The plaintiff also had not given any notice of insisting upon the terms of the contract, or of exercising his option of forfeiture on account of delinquency in making the payments as provided for in the contract. Under these circumstances, the court followed the rule laid down in Boone v. Templeman, supra, and held that the condition of the agreement providing that time should be of the essence thereof had been waived and could not be revived except upon notice and an opportunity allowed for making payment of the delinquent sums. In Hoppin v. Munsey, 185 Cal. 678, on page 687, 198 Pac. 398, 402, the Supreme Court uses the following language:

> "The plaintiff seeks to avoid the effect of these principles by the claim that the repeated acceptance of payments, however small, upon the contract price, not only operated as a waiver of all previous defaults, but also constituted a waiver of the provisions of the contract, declaring time of its essence and that the purchase money should be forfeited upon a failure to pay at maturity. His position is that after such waiver the aforesaid provisions cannot be again asserted or enforced until the vendor shall have served the vendee with notice that at the expiration of a stated period, which must be a reasonable time, performance would again become due and would be demanded. In this he relies upon Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126, 110 Pac. 947, and Stevenson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751. These cases do not hold that such stipulation for forfeiture may not be restored and enforced by the vendor in any other manner than by giving a definite and specific notice of the intent to do so. There is a declaration to that effect in Monson v. Bragdon, 159 Ill. 66, 42 N. E. 383, which is quoted in Boone v. Templeman, but the quotation is given in support of the statement that from the facts alleged in the complaint 'a court might infer a waiver of the conditions regarding forfeiture and time,' and that because of such possible inference, 'they supported the general allegation of the complaint that Templeman had waived those conditions.'"

It will be observed that in all these cases there has been an acceptance of partial payments after they have become due, and it is also stated that these cases do not hold that the stipulation regarding forfeiture, even when once waived, may not be enforced in any other manner than by giving a definite and specific notice of the intent so to do. These cases also indicate that the intent to waive the terms of the contract as to time being the essence thereof may as an ultimate fact be inferred by the trial court from the course of conduct on the part of the seller in receiving payment of successive installments after they have become delinquent. In the case at bar there has been but one acceptance of payment. That payment included several installments which had become due after the institution of the suit to declare a forfeiture of the contract for nonpayment and, of course, were necessary to be included in order to effect the full settlement of the amounts due at the time the action was dismissed. It is here that the stipulation as to the rights of all the parties having been restored under the contract must be considered as having a bearing upon the decision of this case. If the parties, as stipulated, were restored to all their rights, then and in that case there was an understanding by and on the part of all the parties thereto that any of the provisions therein might be enforced just as they are written. Again, there was no course of conduct, but simply one act, on the part of the plaintiff in accepting payment of overdue installments and dismissing his action to enforce forfeiture. Whether the trial court might or might not have properly inferred from this the ultimate fact of a waiver of the time provision in the agreement, we do not need to decide but as a matter of law, under the decisions which we have heretofore referred to, we do not think such acts sufficient to justify the conclusion that time was no longer a part of the essence of the contract involved in this case.

[2] Again, there is a matter of pleading involved in this action. Section 3275 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Whenever, by the terms of an obligation, a party thereto incurs a forfeiture, or a loss in the nature of a forfeiture, by reason of his failure to comply with its provisions, he may be relieved therefrom, upon making full compensation to the other party," etc.

No attempt, however, has been made to take advantage of this section of the Code. In this particular the case of Myers v. Williams, 173 Cal. 301, 159 Pac. 982, is applicable. There the court, in considering the Templeman Case, supra, and the Stevenson Case, supra, to which we have referred, said:

> "There can be no doubt of the existence of the rule, and possibly the facts [referring to the facts set out in the opinion] would have supported its application in favor of defendant, but the difficulty which confronts him is that no claim of waiver of the right of forfeiture was made by the answer."

And further on it says:

> "Unless we are to hold, therefore, that the mere fact of receiving the three payments after January 1st necessarily amounted to a waiver of the provision as to time of future payments, and a waiver, too, of which defendant may take advantage without pleading it, defendant may not prevail on the record before us. If a waiver does not appear from the complaint, it is a matter of defense. None is deducible from that pleading. As we have seen, no allegation of waiver of that part of the agreement making time of the essence of the contract is set forth in the answer, and in the absence of any such claim the forfeiture must be held to have taken place."

In Leak v. Colburn, 55 Cal. App. 784 (204 Pac. 249) this court said (we quote from the syllabus):

> "While facts may be shown which would justify a court in relieving a vendee under a contract of sale of real property from a forfeiture even where time is of the essence of the contract, such relief will not be granted in the absence of any request therefor, or any suggestion that the vendee is either able or willing to make payment of the amount due."

In the case of Myers v. Williams, supra, it appears from a statement of the facts that monthly payments had been made for more than a year, but that no installment was paid on time, and that in each instance the vendors accepted tender of the money after it became due.

In the case of Leak v. Colburn, supra, payments were received from October 19, 1917, until July, 1918, of the installments in the sum of $15 monthly. The agreement provided also for the payment of interest which was not paid. There are also some other matters entering into that case not applicable to this. The testimony as to the payments of installments after they had become due was apparently introduced in both of these cases without objection and in that particular is similar to the stipulated facts introduced in this case and if the rule announced in the case of Myers v. Williams, supra, and followed in the case of Leak v. Colburn, supra, is correct, the trial court in the case at bar could not have granted the appellants any relief on the grounds of waiver of any of the terms of the contract because such issue was not tendered for decision. While the findings attacked in this case are a confusion of findings of facts and conclusions of law, they are sustained by the evidence, because the admitted facts show conclusively that payments were not made as provided by the agreement. We are also not unmindful of the fact that the beginning of suit by the plaintiffs to enforce the terms of the contract, as hereinbefore set forth, constituted matters of which the defendants had notice, and which the trial court had a right to consider in determining whether there was any conduct or course of action on the part of the plaintiffs from which it might infer a waiver of the provision as to time, and from which the trial court might conclude that sufficient appeared from such conduct to indicate that the plaintiffs would insist upon prompt payment.

However harsh these contracts may appear, and however reluctant courts may be to enforce forfeiture, under the circumstances as the record of this case is presented, we find no tenable grounds for disturbing the judgment of the trial court. It therefore follows that the judgment of the trial court must be and it is hereby affirmed.

GLOBE INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 10948.)

Master and servant ⚷373—Injury in altercation with coemployee held compensable, as "arising out of and in course of employment."

Injury to cook, while preparing breakfast at a restaurant, in an altercation with the dishwasher, who, when requested to clean dishes, placed them in the sink, which the cook desired to use, held compensable, as "arising out of and in the course of his employment," and being an accident thereof; he not being the aggressor, and there having been no prior or personal quarrel or bad feeling between them arising out of circumstances extraneous to the employment.

Proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act by Ernest Kopp, employee, opposed by Robert A. Gebhardt, employer, and the Globe Indemnity Company, insurance carrier. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Commission, and the insurance carrier petitions for certiorari. Award affirmed.

H. C. Kelsey, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner and Warren H. Pillsbury, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. This is an application for a writ of review for the purpose of determining the lawfulness of an award and certain orders of the Industrial Accident Commission. The petitioner is the insurance carrier of Robert A. Gebhardt, the owner of a restaurant, who had in his employ the respondent Ernest Kopp, a cook, and one Paul Griffith, who was a dishwasher and roustabout. As the result of an altercation between the two men, Griffith struck Kopp on the head, breaking his jawbone, and inflicting other injuries. Kopp, in due time, presented to the Industrial Accident Commission a claim for the injuries thus received. An award was made in his favor, which is the subject of the present inquiry.

It appears that early on a morning in September, 1922, Kopp, the cook, was preparing breakfast at the restaurant. There were many pots and kettles lying around, awaiting washing from the day before, and Kopp requested Griffith to clean them up, which the latter started to do. In doing the work, apparently he placed some of the unwashed dishes in the sink, which the cook desired to use, and an altercation arose between the two men, which resulted in the blow and injury just described.

The record is replete with evidence from which the respondent commission was justified in finding that the injured cook was not the aggressor, and that there was not any prior or personal quarrel or bad feeling between the two men, preceding the incidents of the morning in question, or that arose out of any circumstances extraneous to the employment in which they were at that time engaged. The evidence also shows that neither of the participants in the dispute was unusually quarrlesome, except that the employer testified that he thought Griffith, the dishwasher, had rather a quick temper.

Under these circumstances the commission was justified in allowing compensation to Kopp. The injury was clearly one arising out of and in the course of his employment, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831). Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 706, 151 Pac. 398; Warren Construction Co. v. I. A. C. (Cal. App.) 221 Pac. 381. It was received while Kopp was actually performing a duty in the course of his employer's business, and can fairly be said to be an incident of such employment. San Diego & Ariz. Ry. Co. v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 223 Pac. 972.

The award is affirmed.

In re SPAGNOLI.

Ex parte WOLFGANG.

Criminal law ⟾636(9)—Statute authorizing reimposition of sentence without accused's presence held remedial and applicable to pending proceedings.

The 1923 amendment to Pen. Code, § 1227, authorizing reimposition of sentence on affirmance of the judgment, without accused's presence in court, is remedial, and is applicable to proceedings pending at the time of its enactment; no substantial right of accused being prejudiced thereby.

In Bank.

In the matter of the application of Ernest B. D. Spagnoli for a writ of habeas corpus for Isaac Wolfgang. Writ discharged and prisoner remanded.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and W. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The prisoner was convicted of murder in the first degree and judgment was pronounced imposing the death penalty and fixing the day for the execution thereof, prior to the 1923 amendments to sections 1193 and 1227 of the Penal Code. Thereafter, upon appeal to this court, the judgment was affirmed. People v. Wolfgang, 221 Pac. 907. Upon the going down of the remittitur the trial court followed the procedure prescribed in the amended sections and "reimposed" sentence upon the prisoner without requiring him to be again brought before the court for that purpose.

It is petitioner's contention that the defendant is entitled as of right to be again brought before the trial court for the reimposition of sentence as provided in section 1227 of the Penal Code, as the same existed at the time of his trial and conviction. The statutory provisions are purely remedial and procedural in their nature, and we see no reason why they should not be given application to proceedings pending at the time of their enactment, unless some substantial right of the prisoner should be prejudiced thereby. The requirements of section 1193 of the Penal Code as it existed prior to the amendment were fully complied with.

The prisoner was present in court at the time of the pronouncement of judgment herein. The reimposition of sentence does not constitute the pronouncement or rendition of a judgment. The original judgment herein became final and conclusive upon its affirmance by this court. The reimposition of sentence upon the going down of the remittitur amounted, in effect, to nothing more than the fixing of a date for carrying into execution of that judgment.

It may be conceded that the provisions of section 1227, prior to its amendment, were in the nature of an order to show cause, and that the effect thereof was to place upon the defendant when thus brought before the court the affirmative duty of then and there showing cause, if any he had, why the judgment should not be carried into execution. But it does not follow therefrom that the amendment of the section deprives the defendant of any substantial right. It is not contended herein that any legal ground exists against the carrying into execution of the judgment herein. If any such ground does exist there are ways and means still open to the defendant under the existing provisions of law by which he may effectively avail himself thereof.

The writ is discharged and the prisoner remanded.

RILEY v. HAVENS. SAME v. ROBINSON. SAME v. MATHER. (S. F. 10499–10501.)

1. Taxation 🔑859(7)—Taxability of transfer made in contemplation of death determined by law in effect when transfer made.

The taxability of a transfer, made in contemplation of death, must be determined by the law in effect when the transfer was made, and no subsequent act of the Legislature can thereafter add to, diminish, or otherwise disturb the tax.

2. Taxation 🔑861—Legislative intent to make Inheritance Tax Act of 1913 retroactive by removing defense of statute of limitations.

It was the legislative intent that Inheritance Tax Act 1913, which superseded all prior acts on the subject, and which by section 4 provides that inheritance taxes shall be a lien on the property transferred until paid, and makes the limitation of Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1, inapplicable, should be given a retroactive effect by making the statute unavailable as a defense to the collection of any tax or penalty imposed by prior inheritance tax acts, in view of section 26.

3. Statutes 🔑245—Rule of strict construction of tax legislation should not be applied to defeat evident legislative intent.

The rule that tax legislation must be construed strictly against the state should be applied with due regard to the intention of the Legislature as expressed in the statute, and such intention should not be disregarded or defeated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Separate actions by Ray L. Riley against H. R. Havens, against Mary J. Robinson, and against Ethel M. Mather, to collect inheritance transfer tax on shares of stock. Judgments for petitioner, and respondents appeal. Affirmed.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for appellants.

H. C. Lucas and W. H. H. Gentry, both of San Francisco (Ralph W. Smith, of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. These cases, presenting precisely the same questions of law, have been consolidated by the stipulations of the parties thereto, and are presented as one proceeding.

The actions were brought by the petitioner in his official capacity as state controller.

The appeals are taken by respondents and appellants, adult children of Elizabeth H. Havens, deceased, from judgments holding each respectively liable to the state for an inheritance transfer tax due upon certain shares of the capital stock of the M. K. Blake Estate Company, a corporation, the certificates of which were indorsed, transferred, and delivered February 9, 1911, by said Elizabeth H. Havens as gifts to her said children. The original certificates were canceled upon the books of said corporation October 11, 1912 and other certificates of corresponding values were thereupon issued to said children in lieu of those canceled. Elizabeth H. Havens thereafter, to wit, December 23, 1912, died, a resident of Alameda county, this state. These proceedings were commenced upon the 16th day of December, 1921, approximately nine years after the death of said Elizabeth H. Havens. The state's right to recover the tax is resisted solely upon the ground of the bar of section 338, subdivision 1, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that "an action upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture" must be commenced "within three years." This objection is undoubtedly valid, unless the bar of the statute has in some manner been tolled, or unless it has no force as against the state for the enforcement of the payment of these transfer taxes by virtue of the provisions of the inheritance

> "Sec. 4. Such taxes shall be and remain a lien upon the property passed or transferred until paid, and the person to whom the property passes or is transferred, and all administrators, executors and trustees of every estate so transferred or passed, shall be liable for any and all such taxes until the same shall have been paid as hereinafter directed. The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relative to the limitation of time of enforcing a civil remedy shall not apply to any proceeding or action taken to levy, appraise, assess, determine, or enforce the collection of any tax or penalty prescribed by this article, and this section shall be construed as having been in effect as of date of the original enactment of the inheritance tax law; provided, that unless sued for within five years after they are due and legally demandable, such taxes, or any taxes accruing under any act herein appealed, shall cease to be a lien as against any bona fide purchaser of real property; and provided, that no such lien shall cease within five years from the date of the passage of this act. The tax so imposed shall be upon the market value of such property at the rates hereinafter prescribed and only upon the excess over the exemptions hereinafter granted; and provided, that in determining said market value no deduction shall be made for any family allowance made out of said estate."

[1] It is the settled law of this state that the taxability of such transfers must be determined by the law in effect at the time the transfer is made, which in this case would be by the act of 1905, and no subsequent act of the Legislature can thereafter add to or diminish the tax or otherwise disturb it. Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 55, 204 Pac. 826; Chambers v. Gibb, 186 Cal. 196, 198 Pac. 1032; Nickel v. State, 179 Cal. 126;[1] Estate of Brix, 181 Cal. 667, 186 Pac. 135; Estate of Felton, 176 Cal. 663, 169 Pac. 392; Hunt v. Wicht, 174 Cal. 205, 162 Pac. 639, L. R. A. 1917C, 961. It must be conceded, of course, that statutes of limitation are designed to affect remedies and not rights. Appellants admit that the Legislature may, by a later act, extend the statutory period fixed by a prior act, provided no bar of the statute had been raised before or at the time the later act becomes effective.

[2] Appellants place their resistance to the asserted right of the petitioner to collect the taxes in suit upon the construction which they give to section 4 of the act of 1913. It is their contention that the words "prescribed by this article" (act, law, or statute) control the entire section, and limit the application of the statute of limitations as extended by the act of 1913 solely to transfers made at and subsequent to the time it became effective and not to the act of 1905. We think the language of the act of 1913 discloses a distinct legislative intent quite contrary to the construction given to it by appellants. It was the apparent intention and attempt of the Legislature to give to the act a retroactive effect by removing altogether the bar of the statute as a defense to the collection of any tax or penalty imposed by prior inheritance tax acts. Section 4 of the act of 1913 provides that the "act shall be construed as having been in effect as of the original enactment of the inheritance tax law." This sentence is followed by a clause making provision for any taxes accruing "under an act herein repealed." (Italics ours.) This is the equivalent of saying that the act shall be construed as having been in effect at the time of and continuously since the enactment of the statute of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 193) which was the first legislation had upon the subject. Section 4 of the act of 1913 cannot fairly be construed as applying alone to the tax impositions reincorporated in that act and to none other. Its language is sufficiently clear to disabuse the mind of any confusion in that respect. Transfer taxes were laid upon the same subjects which furnish the basis for the imposition of the same class of taxes under the act of 1905. The enlargement of the statute of limitation has in nowise changed the rate of taxation or the subjects upon which taxes were laid by the act of 1905 or by any prior act. No vested right has been disturbed, as the tax has not become barred during the life of the act that authorized its assessment, but it was a subsisting claim at the time the act of 1913 became a law. The "tax or penalty prescribed by this article" is a tax that was also prescribed by the acts of 1911, 1905 and other prior acts. The subjects of taxation are unchanged. The act of 1913 superseded all prior acts. It was a revision of the general law on the subject as was each one of the acts which it superseded. It was the evident intention of the Legislature to make section 4 of the act of 1913 a part of the general plan or system of inheritance taxation first adopted in 1893. The language of the act cannot be harmonized with any other reasonable theory. The act of 1913 requiring the taxation of transfers is but a continuation of the law that had been in existence during every moment of time for many years prior to its revision in 1913.

We are not here considering the question of the enforcement of a personal obligation or the revival of an action to restore a remedy which had become lost, such as was considered in Chambers v. Gallagher, 177 Cal. 704, 171 Pac. 931, or with the particular question of construction presented in Estate of Potter, supra, which will be hereafter adverted to.

Section 26 of said act of 1913 contained the last expression of the Legislature on the subject at the time the act was passed. After referring specifically to each re-enactment or amendment of the law from the beginning, said section concludes by reserving all prior rights given under repealed acts in the following words:

[1] 175 Pac. 641.

> "That such repeal shall in no wise affect any suit, prosecution or court proceeding pending at the time this act shall take effect, or any right which the state of California may have at the time of the taking effect of this act, to claim a tax upon any property under the provisions of the act or acts hereby repealed, for which no proceeding has been commenced; nor affect any appeal, right of appeal in any suit pending, or orders fixing tax, existing in this state at the time of the taking effect of this act." (Italics ours.)

Thus it will be seen that all rights which had accrued to the state theretofore were by said act expressly reserved.

A law prescribing inheritance and transfer taxes has existed in this state for a period of more than thirty years. This law has been indiscriminately referred to as the inheritance tax act, the inheritance tax statute, and the inheritance tax law. No one has been deceived by the reference made to it. The law has been regarded as a part of our permanent policy in matters of inheritance taxation. With the exception of the added remedial provision as to the statute of limitations, section 4 of the act of 1913 is identical with section 1 of the acts of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 341) and 1911 (St. 1911, p. 713), respectively.

In Estate of Martin, 153 Cal. 225, 94 Pac. 1053, the effect of an express repeal of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1893 by the act of 1905 was considered by the court. It was there said that such re-enactments as the one now before us come within the scope and effect of section 325 of the Political Code, which declares that, when a part of a statute is amended, "it is 'not to be considered as having been repealed and re-enacted in the amended form; but the portions which are not altered are to be considered as having been the law from the time when they were enacted.'" Continuing, it was said:

> "The rule particularly applicable to this case is thus stated in Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed. § 238): 'Where there is an express repeal of an existing statute, and a re-enactment of it at the same time, or a repeal and a re-enactment of a portion of it, the re-enactment neutralizes the repeal so far as the old law is continued in force. It operates without interruption where the re-enactment takes effect at the same time.'"

The opinion gives approval to the following quotation from Bear Lake Irrigation Co. v. Garland, 164 U. S. 11, 17 Sup. Ct. 9, 41 L. Ed. 327, to which we have added the preceding sentences:

> "Upon comparing the two acts of 1888 and 1890 together, it is seen that they both legislate upon the same subject, and in many cases the provisions of the two statutes are similar and almost identical. Although there is a formal repeal of the old by the new statute, still there never has been a moment of time since the passage of the act of 1888 when these similar provisions have not been in force. Notwithstanding, therefore, this formal repeal, it is, as we think, entirely correct to say that the new act should be construed as a continuation of the old with the modification contained in the new act."

This is the precise situation before us. Wood, in his work on Limitations (volume 1, p. 59, 4th Ed.), in discussing the statute of limitations in so far as it affects rights of action in existence when the statute is changed, states the rule as follows:

> "If before the statute bar has become complete the statutory period is changed, and no mention is made of existing claims, it is generally held that the old law is not modified by the new, so as to give to both statutes a proportional effect; but that the time past is effaced and the new law governs. The period provided by the new law must run upon all existing claims in order to constitute a bar. In other words, the statute in force at the time the action is brought controls, unless the time limited by the old statute for commencing an action has elapsed, while the old statute was in force, and before the suit is brought, in which case the suit is barred, and no subsequent statute can renew the right or take away the bar. The question, however, as to whether the statute is to have a retrospective operation is one of construction, to be determined from the language of the act and the intention of the Legislature as gathered therefrom and the subject-matter to which it applies; the rule being, as previously stated, that a statute will not be permitted to have a retrospective operation unless such is clearly the intention of the Legislature."

The early case of Billings v. Hall, 7 Cal. 1, is in point. In reviewing the earlier case of Billings v. Harvey et al., 6 Cal. 381, the court said:

> "We had occasion to examine the sixth section of the Act of April, 1855, limiting the time of commencing actions for the recovery of real estate to five years, and we then held, that the act of 1855 repealed the sixth section of the act of 1850, and that the time only commenced to run from the date of the last act. Now, the first act was passed on the twenty-second of April, 1850, and the last one on the eleventh of April, 1855. The time commenced to run, under the first statute, from the date of its passage, and the full measure of five years had not expired, on the repeal of the old law, by eleven days; so that the bar had not occurred before the repeal of the statute."

See, also, Morris v. DeCelis, 51 Cal. 55.

Neither the Estate of Martin nor the instant case is at variance with anything said in the Estate of Potter. As pointed out in the latter case the changes made in the law were as to matters of substantial rights. They affected both the rate of taxation and the amount to be allowed as exemptions. Further, had the construction contended for been sustained, a manifest injustice would have been done. Former Chief Justice Shaw took the pains to point out many of the points of difference between the act of 1905 and the act of 1913 in the methods of appraisement of the values of inheritance, devise, bequest, or other rights subject to the payment of an inheritance tax. The learned author of that opinion makes the following pertinent observation (188 Cal. 75, 204 Pac. 835):

> "A comparison of the respective sections of the acts of 1905 and 1913 on this subject shows that, while each act provides for an appraisement of all property subject to tax, including that passing by a prior gift as well as that passing at death, and perhaps the imposition of the tax on the whole thereof passing to the same person at the tax rates fixed by the respective acts, the language in which these provisions are expressed is not by any means the same in the two cases. The sections on the subject have been entirely recast; the 1913 section contains many things not included in that of 1905, and the provisions here in question are not couched in the same or similar language. It cannot be truly said that any part of the act of 1905 on this subject has not been altered, at least with respect to words, in the revision of 1913. The rule stated in the Political Code and in Estate of Martin, supra, applies in all proper cases, but, like all other rules of statutory construction, they are subject to the controlling principle that the object and purpose of all interpretation is to arrive at the intent of the Legislature." (Italics ours.)

In the discussion of section 325 of the Political Code and the Estate of Martin, it is said (188 Cal. 74, 204 Pac. 834):

> "This rule, under some circumstances, has been extended so as to apply to a case where the new statute expressly repeals the whole of the former statute. Estate of Martin, 153 Cal. 228, 94 Pac. 1053. In the Martin Case the Inheritance Tax Act of 1905 had expressly repealed the act of 1893 (Stats. 1893, p. 193) on that subject. In the latter act, however, there were two sections, one of which was a literal copy of a section of the prior act, and the other was the same as another section of the prior act, save a few words of trifling importance. These sections provided the mode of collecting the tax and were strictly remedial in character." (Italics ours.)

The question before us is also strictly one of remedial character. The act of 1905 contains all that is to be found in section 4, Act 1913, excepting the remedial provision.

[3] The rule contended for by appellants that all tax legislation must be construed most strictly against the state and most favorable to the taxpayer must be conceded. But this does not mean that the language of a statute must be given an unnatural construction to defeat tax legislation or that the evident intention of the Legislature in this particular may be disregarded.

> "The doctrine of the strict construction of revenue statutes, however, should be applied with due regard to the intention of the Legislature as expressed in the statute, and with a view to promoting the object of the statute; and especially those provisions of the statute which are intended to prevent fraud should receive a liberal construction." 36 Cyc. 1190.

The ease with which transactions such as are in the inheritance tax laws dealt with may be successfully concealed for long periods of time from official notice and the collection of the transfer thereby defeated doubtless furnishes the reason for the removal of the bar of the statute of limitations.

The crux of appellants' claim is that the act of 1913 is not the act of 1905. An examination of the decisions of this court construing the several inheritance tax acts, whether they purport to be revisions or amendments, will show that it has been uniformly held that said acts have been regarded as continuous in effect, and that there has been no moment of time since 1893, when some such act has not been in force, and that no one act has been construed or considered as an unrelated or isolated piece of legislation. The intent of the Legislature undoubtedly was that the bar of the statute should not be available to those who had not paid the tax as prescribed by law.

The orders and judgments appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CHAMPION. (Cr. 2625.)

1. Criminal law 🔑644—Arrest of witnesses for perjury after adjournment of court in murder prosecution not misconduct on part of district attorney.

In a murder prosecution, the arrest of witnesses who testified for defendant for perjury did not constitute misconduct on the part of the district attorney, who caused their arrest, where the arrest was made in the corridor of the courtroom after court adjourned, there being no showing that the jurors standing in the corridor heard the conversation between the deputy sheriff and the witnesses or that the arrest of witnesses was knowingly made in the presence of jurors for the purpose of influencing them adversely to defendant.

2. Criminal law 🔑706—Prosecuting attorney's charge that one of defendant's witnesses was signaling to testifying witnesses in murder prosecution held not misconduct.

In a murder prosecution, that the prosecuting attorney charged a witness for defense. who was a spectator, with having signaled another witness for defense who was testifying, did not constitute misconduct, where the charge was made in good faith and witness did not positively deny that she had shaken her head, though denying it was a signal to the witness.

3. Witnesses 🔑383—Witness who testified to nothing material could not be impeached by former testimony.

An affidavit of a witness used upon extradition proceedings or the transcript of his testimony at the preliminary examination could not be resorted to for impeachment purposes, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2049 and 2052, where nothing material or immaterial, favorable or unfavorable, to defendant's case was elicited from witness, on the trial.

4. Criminal law 🔑687(2)—No error in reopening case when objection waived.

The court did not err in permitting the reopening of the case during the closing argument to permit the introduction of testimony of a medical expert, where the objection to the reopening of the case for that purpose was expressly waived by defendant.

5. Criminal law 🔑1170½(1)—Admission of testimony that witness possessed weak memory held harmless error.

It was harmless error for the court to permit a physician to testify that a witness for defendant was possessed of a weak and uncertain memory, where the witness impeached had not testified to a single fact material to any issue.

6. Witnesses 🔑328—Testimony of witness may not be impaired by other witnesses that he is affected with weak memory.

The testimony of a witness may not be impaired by the opinion of other witnesses that he is afflicted with a weak memory, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2051, 2052, since such fact may and perhaps must be done by cross-examination.

7. Criminal law 🔑1169(2)—Requiring defendant's attorney to testify that he had given defendant his gun prior to homicide held not reversible error.

In a murder prosecution, where the evidence was in conflict whether a witness had been defendant's attorney, that such witness was compelled to state that he had given defendant his gun, prior to the homicide, did not constitute reversible error, where the fact that he did have a gun was testified to and established by three eyewitnesses, and the fact that he received it from the attorney was already in evidence as an independent piece of evidence in the form of a declaration made by defendant, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2.

8. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—Refusal to permit officer to testify to inconsequential matter held not reversible error.

In a murder prosecution, the court's refusal to permit an officer to testify whether he had seen a witness who had testified for defendant at a hospital the night of the homicide did not constitute reversible error, where such evidence would not probably have changed the verdict.

9. Criminal law 🔑829(9)—Refusal to give duplicate instruction on corpus delicti in murder prosecution held not reversible error.

In a murder prosecution, the refusal to give an instruction requested by defendant that the burden was upon the prosecution to prove the corpus delicti was not erroneous where the court at the request of the defendant and on the request of the people gave other full and complete instructions on the subject.

On Petition for Rehearing.

10. Criminal law 🔑1133—Points presented on rehearing for first time on appeal not considered by appellate court.

Ordinarily, appellate court pays no attention to points presented for first time on a petition for a rehearing in a criminal case.

11. Criminal law 🔑823(6)—Instruction on degree of proof of alibi held not error in connection with other instructions.

In a murder prosecution, an instruction on degree of proof to establish defense of alibi was not erroneous, when read with two other instructions immediately following it, which correctly stated the law.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

A. F. Champion was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

S. S. Hahn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Edwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal from a final judgment of conviction, carrying with it the death penalty, following and based upon a verdict of a jury finding the defendant guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree. Three eyewitnesses to the homicide testified in detail and without material variation to the killing of the deceased, and each positively identified the defendant as the person who shot the deceased.

The story of the homicide so narrated is as follows: On the evening of January 10, 1922, a crap game was in progress in a room in an apartment house located at 309 West Ninth street in the city of Los Angeles, in which a number of persons were participating. The party included Goldy, the deceased; Champion, the defendant; Doyle, Sidenstricker, Smith; a girl who was merely an onlooker; and Reebs, who joined the game about a half an hour after it started. The defendant Champion and the deceased Goldy were winning all the money. Champion kept urging Goldy to play for higher stakes, but Goldy refused, saying that he did not know enough about the game to play for big stakes. Champion got up from the floor where the dice were being rolled, walked over to a little table, and took from a newspaper wrapping a revolver which he loaded with cartridges which he took from his pocket. The deceased asked him, "What is the idea of all the firearms, Slim?" to which the defendant replied, "Some one is getting too lucky." A few more passes were made with the dice when the defendant threw a bunch of bills on the floor, saying, "Fade it," or words to that effect. Goldy refused to shoot for more than $10 of it. Without a word Champion rose from his chair, and, taking a step toward the deceased, shot him through the shoulder just as the deceased started to rise from his chair. The defendant was standing not farther than a foot and a half or two feet from the deceased, and the bullet, taking a downward course, plowed through his chest and abdomen. He pitched forward on his face. The defendant then declared that the first one who moved would get the other bullet, and, turning toward Doyle, said, "Doyle, if you move, I will blow your head off." The defendant turned and kicked the deceased and then, pressing his gun to the deceased's forehead, proceeded to rifle his pockets. He started to see how badly the deceased was injured, but desisted, telling Doyle to look at him and see. Upon Doyle saying that the deceased was shot in the shoulder the defendant said, "I guess I had better get out of here," and immediately left by the back door.

This is the story of the shooting as testified to by Doyle, and it is corroborated in detail by the testimony of other witnesses for the prosecution, who were also participants in the crap game. All of the eyewitnesses to the killing testified that the deceased was not armed; that there had been no quarrel of any kind between the deceased and the defendant, and that there was no conduct on the part of the deceased which might have warranted or justified the shooting of the deceased by the defendant. The deceased was taken to the Clara Barton Hospital. He was accompanied there by four of the participants in the crap game. The deceased was dead when they left the hospital a half an hour later. The defendant was arrested and returned to Los Angeles upon extradition proceedings from Cleveland, Ohio. At the trial of the case the defendant interposed the defense of an alibi, claiming that he was in Fort Worth, Tex., on the day of the shooting. He produced three witnesses—his father, his mother, and his cousin—in support of his defense. Evidently the jury disbelieved the testimony of the alibi witnesses and accepted the testimony of the prosecution's three witnesses, who testified that they were eyewitnesses to the shooting and saw the defendant kill the deceased.

No contention is made, and, indeed, none could successfully be made, that the evidence as a whole is insufficient to support the verdict and judgment. It is contended however, among other things, in support of the appeal, that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct during the course of the trial in (1) that he sought and secured the arrest of certain witnesses for the defense upon a charge of perjury in the presence of the jury, and (2) that he wrongfully charged a witness for the defense, who was a spectator in the courtroom, with having signaled another witness for the defense who was then upon the witness stand testifying.

[1] The record does not show that the arrest of the witnesses referred to was made in the presence of the jury. In this behalf the showing is that the court had adjourned; that the spectators were leaving the courtroom when the arrest was made, and that the witnesses in question were arrested outside of the courtroom in the corridor of the courthouse and not in the presence of the jury while it was still assembled as a body in the active operation of the trial of the case. True, there is in the record affidavits, one from a juror and one from a spectator, presented in support of a motion for a new trial, which aver, in substance, that the affiants were present in the corridor of the courthouse when the witnesses in question were arrested by the deputy sheriff. It does not appear, however, from the affidavit of the juror that she heard the officer say that the witnesses were being arrested upon a charge of perjury, and conceding, as the affidavit of a spectator avers, that the arrest and the statement that the arrest was made upon the charge of perjury, were made in the presence of some of the jurors, still it does not necessarily follow that the jurors heard the deputy sheriff assert the cause of the arrest. In any event, there is no affirmative showing that the jurors standing in the corridor heard the conversation between the deputy sheriff and the witnesses. That the juror who made the affidavit did not hear such conversation is evidenced by the fact that her affidavit makes no mention of the cause of the arrest, nor does it say or purport to say that she heard the deputy sheriff say that the arrest was being made upon a charge of perjury. Moreover, there is no showing, either affirmatively or by implication from the facts contained in the affidavits offered in support of the motion for a new trial, that the arrest of the witnesses was knowingly made in the presence of the jurors, as they were leaving the courtroom, for the purpose of influencing the jurors adversely to the case of the defendant and the defendant's witnesses. There is no contention made that the arrest was not rightfully made. The arrest had to be made somewhere, and it was proper to make it outside of the courtroom. The fact that some of the jurors sitting upon the trial of the case happened to be in the vicinity of the arrest will not suffice as a foundation for a charge of misconduct against the district attorney upon the theory that he was endeavoring to improperly influence the jurors in the case.

[2] It is evident from the record that the district attorney believed in the utmost good faith that Mrs. Hughes, one of the alibi witnesses for the defense, had been guilty of signaling to Mrs. Champion, another witness for the defense, while the latter was upon the stand testifying. Immediately after Mrs. Champion retired from the witness stand the district attorney called Mrs. Hughes to the stand and asked her:

> "It is a fact, is it not, a moment ago just preceding the time that I jumped up that you were shaking your head to the witness upon the stand."

The witness denied that she had been communicating with the witness upon the stand and explained that she had been talking to her other aunt, who was likewise a spectator. She did not positively deny, however, that she had shaken her head. What she did deny was that she had any intention of making any impression upon the witness who was upon the stand, and this was shown by her answer. The district attorney having asked her if she had not been looking at the witness on the stand at the time she was shaking her head, her reply was:

> "Well, if I was, I didn't know it. Certainly I didn't intend to have any impression on her."

In the interest of justice, the district attorney was entitled to an explanation of the conduct of the witness sitting in the courtroom, and if, as the district attorney evidently believed, the witness was attempting to communicate with a witness testifying upon the stand, he was not required to sit passive and permit such communication. Having acted in good faith, he cannot be charged with misconduct, even though he failed to fully substantiate the claim that the witness sitting in the courtroom was willfully signaling to the witness upon the stand.

[3] The court did not err in sustaining the objection of the prosecution to the defendant's attempt to read in evidence the affidavit of a witness for the defense, one Harry A. Smith (referred to in the record as Harry A. Smith No. 1) used upon extradition proceedings, nor did the court err in refusing to permit the defense to read in evidence the transcript of the testimony given by said witness at the preliminary examination of the defendant. The entire testimony of this witness as given upon the trial of the instant case, was confined to statements made in response to questions propounded by the defense, which were substantially that he did not know or could not remember anything concerning the making and signing of the affidavit used for extradition purposes and that he did not know whether or not he had testified at the preliminary examination of the defendant. Nothing material or immaterial, favorable or unfavorable, to the defendant's case was elicited from the witness. In short, it may be said that he utterly failed to testify to anything at all. Therefore, neither the affidavit nor the transcript in question could be resorted to for impeachment purposes as provided in sections 2049 and 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure. People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 532, 75 Pac. 101; People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 83 Pac. 43; People v. Spencer, 58 Cal. App. 197, 225, 208 Pac. 380.

[4] There was no error in the ruling of the court permitting the reopening of the case during the closing argument of the district attorney in order to permit the introduction in evidence of the testimony of Dr. Parkin, a medical expert. The record shows that the objection to the reopening of the case for the purpose of permitting Dr. Parkin to testify was expressly waived by the defense.

[5, 6] It was error, however, for the trial court to admit, over the objection of the defense, the testimony of Dr. Parkin. Apparently it was the theory of the trial court that the testimony of the witness was admissible for the purpose of assailing the credibility of the witness Harry A. Smith No. 1. This was the announced purpose of the district attorney. The testimony of Dr. Parkin was to the effect that the witness was not insane at the time he was called to the witness stand, and the major portion of the doctor's testimony tended to show no more than that the witness was possessed of a weak and uncertain memory. A witness not affected by mental disease or mental derangement may be impeached only in the manner and for the reasons provided in sections 2051 and 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure. People v. Harrison, 18 Cal. App. 288, 296, 123 Pac. 200. His testimony may not be impaired by the opinion of other witnesses that he is afflicted with a weak memory. That fact, if it be a fact, may and perhaps must be done by cross-examination. Ah Tong v. Earle Fruit Co., 112 Cal. 679, 682, 45 Pac. 7. Conceding the error in this behalf, the defendant could not have been prejudiced thereby because the witness Harry A. Smith No. 1, as previously indicated herein, had not testified to a single fact material to any issue in the case. Therefore, Dr. Parkin's testimony as to the weakened and uncertain memory of the witness could not have harmed the defendant.

[7] Conceding, without deciding, that it was error to require Hale Day, a witness for the prosecution and an attorney at law, to testify against the defendant, still the error, if any, was without prejudice to the defendant. It is doubtful whether the fact that Day was the attorney for the defendant at the time in question was sufficiently shown in evidence. In one breath he said that he was the attorney for the defendant at that time and in the next breath he said that he was not. In such a situation there was a conflict in the evidence as to the fact of the existence of the relationship, and therefore the ruling of the trial court made at one stage of the case as to the nonexistence of the relationship might well have been placed upon that ground. Day was called as a witness for the prosecution after one of the witnesses for the prosecution had already testified that upon the afternoon of the homicide the defendant had told him that he had just "brought" his gun from his attorney, Day, who had been minding it for him while he was in San Francisco. Day was called to the stand and compelled to testify that he had delivered the gun to the defendant, Champion, the last time he had seen him, which was shortly before the homicide. The question of where the defendant got the gun was not an essential link in the prosecution's chain of evidence. The material thing to know was that he did have a gun and that he used it to kill the deceased. This was testified to and established by three eyewitnesses. Moreover, the fact that the defendant had received the gun from his former attorney was already in evidence as an independent piece of evidence in the form of a declaration made by the defendant. Code of Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2. The testimony of the witness Day that he had delivered the gun to the defendant a short time before the homicide in question was not, therefore, prejudicial to the defense and will not suffice to warrant a reversal of the judgment.

[8] Complaint is made of the trial court's refusal to permit Officer Cline, a witness for the prosecution, to testify as to whether or not he had seen Harry A. Smith No. 1 at the Clara Barton Hospital on the night of the murder. This is not a closely balanced case on the evidence, and the value of the evidence sought to be elicited from Officer Cline was so slight and inconsequential that we have no doubt but that the verdict would have been the same had the witness been required to testify in response to the question put to him.

[9] The refusal of the court to give an instruction requested by the defense to the effect that the burden was upon the prosecution to prove the corpus delicti was not error, inasmuch as the record shows that the court did give another instruction at the request of the defendant which was substantially the same as that requested which was refused. Furthermore, the trial court gave full and complete instructions at the request of the people upon the subject of corpus delicti. The trial court did not, therefore, err in refusing what was practically a duplicate instruction.

A reading of the entire record convinces us that there has been no miscarriage of justice.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [10, 11] In the petition for a rehearing in this case the point is urged for the first time that a certain instruction requested by the people and given by the trial court erroneously stated the rule relating to the measure of proof required for the establishment of an alibi which was the defendant's defense. No mention was made of this point in the original briefs presented in support of the appeal, and therefore the point was not discussed in the opinion affirming the judgment. Ordinarily we pay no attention to points presented for the first time upon a petition for a rehearing, but in view of the fact that the judgment affirmed in this case involves the death penalty we feel constrained to notice the point, and say that the instruction complained of contained an erroneous statement of the law.

The instruction should not have been requested by the district attorney and should not have been given by the trial court. If that instruction had been permitted to stand alone, it may well have constituted prejudicial error. The record, however, shows that immediately following the instruction complained of the trial court, at the request of the counsel for the defendant, gave two separate, particular, and pertinent instructions, which clearly and correctly stated and reiterated the law relative to the degree of proof required to establish the defense of alibi, and when the instruction complained of is read, as it must be, in conjunction with the two instructions immediately following it, it cannot be said that the jury was not fully informed of the law which covered and controlled the defendant's defense of an alibi. It was doubtless for that reason that the instruction now complained of in the petition for a rehearing was not complained of and commented on in the briefs filed upon the original hearing.

The rehearing is denied.

LOWRY v. COMMON COUNCIL OF CITY OF SAN DIEGO. (Civ. 4002.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 29, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 28, 1924.)

Municipal corporations 🔑918(4)—Bond issue defeated unless two-thirds of those voting on several bond issues voted for such issue.

Where several bond issues are submitted at a special election, each proposed issue must receive two-thirds of all those voting at the election, under Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, No. 2371.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Mary Clarke Lowry against the Common Council of the City of San Diego. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

S. J. Higgins, City Atty., and Arthur F. H. Wright, Deputy City Atty., both of San Diego, for appellants.

C. C. Pease, of San Diego, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. With the general municipal election held in the city of San Diego on the 5th day of April, 1921, the common council of said city consolidated a special election, at which there were submitted to the voters of the city of San Diego six bond issues. Five of said issues received a two-thirds majority of all the votes cast at said special election, and were declared carried by said common council, but the other bond issue, known as "Proposition Six," while it received a two-thirds majority of all the votes cast upon said proposition six, failed to receive two-thirds of all the votes cast at said special election. The common council for this reason declared that proposition 6 was defeated, and refused to issue or sell the bonds therein provided for. The plaintiff, as a taxpayer of said city, instituted this proceeding for a peremptory writ of mandate, directed to said common council, to compel them to issue and sell the bonds called for in said proposition six. The trial court gave judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendants have appealed therefrom.

There is but one question involved in this appeal, and that is, Was it necessary, in order to carry said proposition 6, that two-thirds of all the voters voting at said special election should vote in favor of said proposition, or was it sufficient, in order to carry said proposition, for two-thirds of all the voters voting on said proposition to vote in favor thereof? Counsel on each side of this controversy have ably presented their respective views in their exhaustive briefs filed in this court. At the time of the filing of these briefs, this question was no doubt open to debate. Since that time, however, the Supreme Court has decided the identical question involved herein in the case of the City of Pasadena v. Chamberlain (Cal. Sup.) 219 Pac. 965. The opinion in this case was written by Chief Justice Wilbur, and was concurred in by all the other justices, and we think it conclusive upon the subject. The court in this case followed Law v. San Francisco, 144 Cal. 384, 77 Pac. 1014, and City of Long Beach v. Boynton, 17 Cal. App. 290, 119 Pac. 677, and held—

> "That under this statute, where two bond issues were submitted at the same election, a separate proposed bond issue was defeated, unless two-thirds of all of those voting at the special election voted for the particular bond issue in question."

The statute referred to in this opinion is the statute of 1901, as amended in 1915 (Deering's Stats. 1915, p. 1151), and is the same statute under which the common council of the city of San Diego proceeded in the calling and holding of the special bond election, out of which this action arose.

In the Pasadena Case four bond propositions were submitted to the voters of said city at a special bond election, which special bond election had been consolidated with the general municipal election. Bond proposition No. 4, at such election, received a two-thirds majority of all the votes cast on said proposition, but failed to receive two-thirds of all the votes cast at said special election, and the Supreme Court held that it was defeated.

It follows that the judgment in this action should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

1. Wills 🔑506(2)—Distribution among heirs "as provided by the laws of the state" construed to mean laws as existing at time of execution of will.

Provision that, upon death of life tenant without issue, property should be distributed "among my heirs, as provided by the laws of the state of California, the same as if I had died intestate," held to refer to laws in force at time of execution of will and not as changed some years later, before testatrix's death, making blood relatives of a deceased spouse her heirs as regards separate property of the deceased spouse, especially in view of rule that court should prefer a lesser degree of uncertainty to a greater degree of uncertainty unless language is clearly to contrary, and should accept as beneficiaries of a contingent estate those who are so designated by a lesser contingency, and in view of Civ. Code, § 1327, and notwithstanding section 1336.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, As Provided by Law.]

2. Wills 🔑493—Rule stated for ascertaining devisee of contingent estate.

Where an estate is given to a person described by relation either to testator or to other devisees on contingency that may or may not happen, and a person is in being at time of execution of will to whom on happening of the contingency description would apply, it is a safe general rule to hold such person as intended to be the devisee.

3. Wills 🔑452—Interpretation of law adopted which prefers those of the blood.

Where law is capable of two interpretations, one should be adopted which prefers those of blood of testator to strangers, intent of testator being doubtful.

4. Wills 🔑493—Rule stated for ascertaining identity of beneficiaries.

Where there is any doubt as to identity of beneficiary or class of beneficiaries, intent of testator should be interpreted in light of known conditions surrounding him and presumably influencing him at time he executed will.

5. Wills 🔑493—Identity of beneficiaries determined in light of law pertaining to them at time of execution of will.

Where there is an ambiguity of expression by testator as to identity of objects of his bounty, his real intent and meaning will be sought for in light of the law pertaining to such objects in force and existing at time testator formed and expressed his intent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Ellen M. Wilson, deceased. From a decree of distribution in favor of Thomas McConnell and others as against E. Phœbe Doolittle and others, the latter appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Grove L. Johnson, Butler & Van Dyke, Ben P. Tabor, and George Hinsdale & Pigott, all of Sacramento, for appellants.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, Irving D. Gibson, and Elliott & Atkinson, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

BUCK, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a decree of distribution involving the construction of a will and the ascertainment of the intention of the testatrix as expressed in her will regarding which of two classes of persons should be the beneficiary of a certain contingent remainder created by the will.

On behalf of the appellants who comprise 19 nieces and nephews of the testatrix it is contended that it was the intent of the testatrix to designate as the objects of her contingent bounty that class of persons who under the law as she knew it to be at the time of the execution of her will were her heirs as provided by law in the event of intestacy and the failure of issue, while on behalf of the respondents who are the collateral relatives of her predeceased husband it is contended that it was the intent and purpose of the testatrix as disclosed by her will to have her property go to that class who would be her heirs in the event of intestacy under the law as the law might be at the time of the vesting of the contingent remainder.

By her will dated April 30, 1896, which was prepared by "an attorney of recognized standing and ability throughout the state of California," the testatrix provided as follows:

"All the real property of which I may die seized, and all in which I may at the time of my death have any interest, wheresoever situated, I give and devise unto my said son, to have and to hold the same for and during the term of his life; and at his death the same shall go and be the property of his then living children,—it being my intention to devise unto him a life estate in the whole of said realty, with remainder over at his death, to his then living children; and if he leaves no issue, then upon his death, all of such real property shall be distributed among my heirs, as provided by the laws of the state of California, the same as if I had died intestate."

"If my said son shall die before me, leaving issue, then all my property and estate, of every kind, shall go to such issue, to whom I hereby give, devise and bequeath the same; but if he shall die before me without issue, then I give, devise and bequeath the whole of my property, and estate, of whatsoever kind and wheresoever situated, unto my heirs—the same to be distributed among them according to the California laws of succession in cases of intestacy."

The son was designated as executor without bonds. The first codicil, dated February 14, 1898, which was not prepared by the attorney referred to, gave $4,000 and a diamond ring to her "beloved niece," Carrie Doolittle.

On June 2, 1899, she executed a second codicil which merely revoked the legacy of $4,000 to Carrie Doolittle, the amount of the same having been given her that day in money, and confirmed and ratified her previously executed will in other respects.

At the time of the execution of the will the deceased was a widow 60 years of age and had then living several brothers and sisters and numerous nieces and nephews. In 1861 she had married one Thaddeus McConnell, who died intestate in 1863, leaving property of the value of $24,661, all of which was his separate property and one-half of which was distributed to the testatrix and the other one-half to her infant son Thaddeus. At the time of her death the value of her estate was $94,822, a greater portion of which was found by the court to be the proceeds of the separate property of her deceased husband distributed to her from his estate. After the death of her husband, Thaddeus McConnell, the testatrix married one William T. Wilson, whom she subsequently divorced. At the time of her death in 1907 she left as her sole heir her son, Thaddeus McConnell. She also left surviving her a brother and numerous nieces and nephews. Subsequent to her death her brother and one of her nieces, Ellen Flanagan Purchase, died, leaving certain heirs at law. On April 10, 1919, her son, Thaddeus McConnell, died testate without living issue and left as his sole heir at law and devisee his widow, Etta McConnell. In 1896, at the time testatrix made her will, it was provided by law that the property of a person, irrespective of the source from which it may have been derived, should, in the event of intestacy, and the failure of issue, spouse, or parent, go upon his death to his brothers and sisters and the children of deceased brothers and sisters. Not only at the time the testatrix made her will, but from time to which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, it had been in substance so provided by law. But in 1905, two years before her heath and nine years after she made her will, the statute of succession of this state was amended to provide that, upon the death of an intestate without spouse, or issue, that portion of his estate which had been the separate property of a predeceased spouse would go to the relatives of the predeceased spouse.

After the death of her son without issue in 1919, the appellants herein and the widow of the son Thaddeus each claimed to be entitled to the estate of the testatrix herein and opposing petitions for distribution were filed. And in the lower court the property was ordered to be distributed to the widow, but upon appeal to the Supreme Court by the appellants herein this order was reversed. Estate of Wilson, 184 Cal. 63, 193 Pac. 581.

The respondents herein filed no petition for distribution in the lower court and made no appearance in the Supreme Court until after the opinion of the court was filed. Then one of them applied to the Supreme Court for a modification of the language of the opinion "in order that he and others similarly related may not be prejudiced by anything stated in the opinion," and the opinion was accordingly amended to read as follows:

> "If the heirs are to be determined as of the date of the termination of the life estate as we think is the proper construction of the will, in so far as the record before us shows such claimants constitute the whole of the heirs to whom such realty is given."

By "claimants" the court referred to the appellants herein. All of the foregoing amendment and some other language of like import was a part of the original opinion except the words "in so far as the record before us shows." After the rendition of this decision in the Supreme Court the respondents petitioned the superior court for distribution of the estate to them, claiming that the estate left by the testatrix, being the proceeds of the separate property of her predeceased spouse who died in 1863, was by her will devised and bequeathed to them by virtue of the contingent remainder provided for in the will. And that it was her intention, as expressed in her will made in 1896, that the beneficiaries of the contingent remainder should be not the class indicated by the statute in effect in 1896, but should be the class to be indicated by whatever statute might be in effect upon the vesting of this contingent remainder.

Respondents and appellants herein each rely in their respective behalfs upon different language in the opinion rendered by the Supreme Court on the previous appeal as conclusive of the present controversy. But the only suggestion made in the opinion that the court had before it any facts indicating the origin or nature of Mrs. Wilson's estate appears from the following language in the opinion:

> "Mrs. Wilson's estate consisted entirely of the property derived from her first husband's estate and additional property acquired through her own subsequent investments."

But it does not appear that the court at the time of the filing of this opinion had any knowledge from the record that Mrs. Wilson's first husband had left any relatives or that such relatives were making any claim as against the appellants or any one to any of the property in her estate "derived from her first husband's estate." The court, however, in construing the will, did mention the following fact which was evidently a potent surrounding circumstance when she executed the will:

> "At the date of the execution of the will she had several brothers and sisters still living, and numerous nieces and nephews and the relations between her and her relatives were very friendly."

In this connection the court stated that—

> "The question presented is, of course, as to the intention of the testatrix as disclosed by the language she has used in her will, taking into view, in case of any uncertainty arising upon the face of the will, the circumstances under which it was made, exclusive of her oral declarations."

And in its conclusion the court used the following language, upon the first portion of which the appellants herein especially rely and upon the latter portion of which the respondents rely:

> "Considering the will in its entirety, the scheme of the testatrix is perfectly clear to our minds. If her son died before her leaving issue, she desired such issue to have all her property, and if he died before her without issue surviving, she desired her own relatives to have all the property, to the utter exclusion of any person or persons taking solely under the son. If he survived her, she desired him to have all her personal property as his own, and a life estate only in her realty, with remainder to any of his children who survived him, but if, surviving her, he died without issue surviving him, she desired the real property to go to her next of kin, other than her son. The case is one where 'the context clearly indicates' (Civ. Code, § 1327) that the word 'heirs' was not used in the strict technical sense as designating the person or persons who would have succeeded under our succession statutes to the estate of deceased had she died intestate, but was intended to designate only those who would have been her heirs at law but for her son, either at the time of her death or at the termination of the life estate by the death of the son.

"Whether in view of the language of the will such heirs are to be determined as of the date of the death of the deceased or as of the date of the death of the life tenant is a matter of no great moment to the respondent, who was not entitled to any of the real property in dispute in either event; but we think it clear that the intention was that they should be determined as of the date of the termination of the life estate."

In the controversy which preceded the foregoing expression from the court there was no occasion for the court to consider the fact that the predeceased spouse of the testatrix had left any kindred. Nor does it appear that the court had any occasion to consider the fact that the statute relied upon by the respondent McConnell herein did not come into effect until nine years after the time of the making of the will. Consequently, as between the litigants in this proceeding, it does not appear that any of the language used by the court in its opinion precludes a determination by this court of the question of construction presented herein, to wit, the question whether or not it was the intent of the testatrix when she created the contingent remainder herein to constitute as the beneficiaries thereof her own blood relatives whom the law, at the time she made the will, "provided should be her heirs in the event of intestacy and the failure of issue."

In the cases of Estate of Watts, 179 Cal. 20, 175 Pac. 415, Estate of Page, 181 Cal. 537, 185 Pac. 383, and Estate of Simonton, 183 Cal. 53, 190 Pac. 442, relied upon by respondents herein, it was held that when a testatrix used the words "heirs" or "my heirs" or "my lawful heirs" or heirs at law, as provided by the laws of succession of the state of California, "she adopted for the purposes of her testamentary disposition the statute of succession" (Estate of Watts), and that by such adoption she is presumed to have intended to make the blood relatives of her deceased spouse the objects of her bounty. But in each of the cases cited the statute adopted was, as a matter of fact, the statute in existence at the time the testatrix made her will and at the time she conceived and executed her intention to so adopt the statute. As already noted, the testatrix was a twice married widow of the age of 60 years, and had been a school teacher in Vermont in her youth. Up to the time of the making of her will and for many years thereafter she was actively engaged in attending to the details of the management of a large business of farming, stock raising, buying and selling property and the loaning of money on mortgages; and was a woman, as shown by the evidence, of considerable business ability, self-reliant, self-assertive and always responsive to the human ties of blood and family. In the drafting of her will she had the advice and counsel of a competent attorney. But irrespective of such advice and irrespective of any mere fiction of the law under which it is sometimes presumed for the purposes of accomplishing justice that a person is familiar with the law and the changes in the law, in this case it can be conclusively, as a matter of common reason, presumed that at the time testatrix made her will in 1896 she actually knew and was influenced by the knowledge that her numerous kindred with whom she was very friendly, were the persons who were her "heirs as provided by the laws of the state of California the same as if I had died intestate."

And there is no evidence that at the time she made her codicils, or at any time before her death, that she was aware of any change in the statute, nor is there any presumption of law or of common reason that she would be aware or be made aware of such a change in the statute. It would therefore seem that where there are two statutes of succession invoked, one of which was in existence and known to the testatrix at the time she deliberately adopted the statute and the other of which did not come into existence until nine years after her act of adoption was performed, we should scrutinize the language of the will for the purpose of seeing whether the testatrix by the use of any language in her will expressed any intent or purpose to adopt the unknown and nonexisting statute and repudiate the known and presumably satisfactory one for the purpose of designating the objects of her contingent bounty.

When she used the words "as provided by the laws of the state of California," if it was her intention to include with the existing provisions of which she presumably approved future possible provisions as well, there was very apt and convenient language by which she could so have expressed herself by inserting after the word "as" the words "may be," "will be," or "might be," or the word "then," of which latter word she had just before made apt and discriminating use when, in order to avoid any ambiguity, she twice referred to "his then living children." The word "then" following the words "if he left no issue," and preceding the words "upon his death," was evidently used not in its chronological but in its sequential sense, and clearly implies "in that event," etc. Brown v. Higgins, 180 Wis. 253, 193 N. W. 84; Behrens v. Bauman, 66 W. Va. 56, 66 S. E. 5, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092.

[1] Therefore, if the testatrix herself has not by any apt or convenient term stated that she intended to refer to any possible future statutory enactments to designate the objects of her bounty it would seem in reason that she meant by the use of the words "as provided by the laws" to refer to the laws already in existence.

Furthermore, by the same token that the court will prefer a vested estate to a contingent estate it should prefer a lesser degree of uncertainty to a greater degree of uncertainty and should, unless the language is clear to the contrary, accept as beneficiaries of a contingent estate those who are so designated by a lesser contingency. In the contingent remainder which she created there were already three contingencies: First, the contingency of the death of the son; second, his death without issue; and, third, the contingency that at the time of his death when the contingent estate vested there would be any one of the designated class alive. But, if the construction of the respondents is accepted, there would be in addition to those contingencies, the biennially recurring contingency of a change in the statute which would create a further contingency to determine the class that would be provided by law to be heirs in the event of intestacy; whereas, if the construction of appellants be accepted, the intent of the testatrix would be made more certain and would be responsive to the conditions and circumstances of her environment.

[2] As stated in In re Solms' Estate, 253 Pa. 293, 296, 98 Atl. 596, at page 597, quoting Anshutz et al. v. Miller, 81 Pa. 212, 215:

> "Where an estate is given to a person described by relation either to the testator or to other devisees, on a contingency that may or may not happen, and a person is in being at the time of the execution of the will, to whom, on the happening of the contingency, the description would apply, it is a safe general rule to hold such person as intended to be the devisee."

See, also, Quick v. Quick, 21 N. J. Eq. 13, where the court distinctly held that in the event of failure on the part of the testatrix to indicate some future law for the purpose of ascertaining the objects of her bounty, such as the words "as the law may direct," and where she made use of the present tense by using the words "as the law directs," it will be presumed that she intended to control the division of the property among certain contingent heirs "not by the law as it might stand at the death of Ezekiel, but as it then stood." But in the case at bar the testatrix, by the use of the past tense, was certainly further from using the future tense than was the testatrix who used the present tense in the case of Quick v. Quick.

[3] Furthermore, from the terms of the will and codicils and the close family relations existing between the testatrix and her own blood kindred, if from her language her intent may be deemed to be doubtful there is "the well-settled rule that, where a will is capable of two interpretations, the one should be adopted which prefers those of the blood of the testator to strangers." In re Edie, 117 App. Div. 310, 102 N. Y. Supp. 424, citing Wood v. Mitcham, 92 N. Y. 375.

[4] The rule is well established that where there is any doubt as to the identity of the beneficiary or class of beneficiaries the intent of the testator should be interpreted in the light of the known conditions surrounding him and presumably influencing him at the time he executed the will. And where he has made an ambiguous reference to the law to designate his beneficiary it will be presumed, in the absence of differently expressed intent, that he referred to the law existing at the time of the expression of his intent. Schouler in his work on Wills has stated the rule as follows (Schouler on Wills [6th Ed.] vol. 2, pars. 844 and 938–939):

> "On questions of construction a testator is presumed to speak as of the time of executing his will, but the date of a will must be considered in construing it, and the will speaks from its date on a question of identity of the beneficiary, and the conditions existing at the time of execution may be considered in construction. * * * In general, the intent of a testator must be gathered not merely from the language used in the will, but from that language in connection with the law of the land, whether of state or nation, and his personal environment including the state of the law at the time in view of statutes in force at the date of the will. * * * It is also presumed that the testator knew what disposition would be made of his property in case of intestacy and intended a different disposition by will and that a testator made his will with knowledge of the well-settled law of the state. The maxim that every one is presumed to know the law, applies to existing but not to future enactments. In construing a testator's will as executed by him the court may ascribe to the testator, so far as his language permits it, the common impulses of human nature."

Among the authorities relied upon to sustain the foregoing conclusions are the following cases: In re Crozer's Estate, 257 Pa. 241, 101 Atl. 801, where the court held that—

> "A testator's legal intention is to be gathered from the state of the law at the date of the will, regardless of what it was at the date of his death."

Also the case of In re Peterson's Estate, 242 Pa. 330, 338, 89 Atl. 126, at page 128, where the court uses the following language:

> "The doctrine of the case just cited [Neal's App., 104 Pa. 214] agrees with that which now generally prevails, to the effect that the rule making a will to speak as though executed immediately before the death of the testator relates to the effect and operation of the instrument rather than to its construction, and, as regards the intention of the testator, the will is to be construed as of the date of the execution. Another way of stating the rule is that, where it appears in the will that a testator intended the will to be confined to the state of affairs existing when the will was made, the construction must be such as to conform to such intention."

Also Matter of Hoffman's Will, 201 N. Y. 247, at page 255, 94 N. E. 990, 993, the court used the following language:

> "In considering the effect of the codicil, we do not look to what happened, when it became operative; we seek for what the testator intended by it when arranging the disposition of his residuary estate. * * * The intention of the testator in disposing of his residuary estate is to be ascertained not by what occurred long after the execution of his will, but by what was, apparently, or presumably, in his contemplation, at the time he was making it. A testator is presumed to speak as of the time of executing his will and to base his calculations upon his dispositions taking effect. McLean v. Freeman, 70 N. Y. 81; Morris v. Sickly, 133 N. Y. 456."

In the case of Morris v. Sickly, cited above (133 N. Y. 456, 31 N. E. 332), the court uses the following language:

> "While a will is in some sense ambulatory as to the objects and subjects with which it deals, yet it is not ambulatory as to the meaning of the language used by the testator and the intention and purpose which controlled the disposition of his property. That intention and purpose must be found to exist at the time of the execution of the will, and cannot be varied or changed by any after occurring events."

And in the case of Houghton v. Hughes, 108 Me. 233, 79 Atl. 909, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1287, the court, referring to the testator, stated:

> "Levi W. Houghton lived and died in Maine. His will was made and executed in Maine. It is not probable that he was familiar with the laws of any other state, but he is presumed to know the laws of Maine, and it should be assumed, we think, that he used the words 'heirs at law' in his will in the sense which those words then had according to the laws of the state of Maine, and as judicially construed by the courts of Maine, there being nothing in the language used which repels or controls such conclusion."

In the foregoing case the court quoted the following language of Mr. Justice Story in the case of Harrison v. Nixon, 9 Pet. 483, 9 L. Ed. 201:

> "The language of wills is not of universal interpretation, having the same precise import in all countries and under all circumstances. They are supposed to speak the sense of the testator according to the received laws or usages of the country where he is domiciled, by a sort of tacit reference, unless there is something in the language which repels or controls such a conclusion."

Also, in the case of Webb v. Webb, 111 Ark. 54, 163 S. W. 1167, the court uses the following language:

> "As to the effect and operation of the will, as a general rule, in the absence of language showing a contrary intention, it speaks from the death of the testator. But when the purpose is to ascertain what the intention of the testator was from the construction of the language used by him in the will, then the will should be construed as of the date of its execution. See 40 Cyc. 1424 B."

Also, in the case of In re Swenson's Estate, 55 Minn. 300, 56 N. W. 1115, the court held as follows:

> "The rule that a will speaks as of the date of the decease is not an unyielding one, especially when by a change of statute, the words would have had a different meaning if used in a will executed under the new law. * * * The testator would have no reason to suppose that his manifest intent could or would be affected by legislative enactment, and that if, when he executed the will, certain persons were clearly intended and sufficiently designated as the recipients of his bounty, future legislation could interfere with or control that intention and designation. The words 'heirs at law,' found in the residuary clauses of the will, must be construed as of the date of its execution, and not with reference to the statute as it existed when the testator died."

Such words as heirs, or legal heirs, though their technical significance is not to be overlooked, may, to give effect to the intent of the testator, be held to refer to others than those who are technically heirs, or to exclude those who are technically heirs. See, also, In re Anderson's Estate, 148 Minn. 44, 180 N. W. 1019.

And in the case of Radford v. Fidelity, etc., Co., 185 Ky. 453, 215 S. W. 285, the following language was used by the court:

> "It is contended by appellants that in ascertaining the intentions and meaning of the testatrix, as expressed in the instrument, and in construing it in order to determine the rights of the parties under the will, we must be guided by the laws upon those subjects which prevailed in the state of Indiana at the time of the execution of the will. This contention seems to be sound, as, in accordance with the general rule of interpreting and ascertaining the meaning and intentions of a testator as expressed in his will, reference must be had to the law of his domicile at the time the will was executed, and such law will govern, unless it appears from the will that the testator had in mind and made his will with reference to the law prevailing in some other country or jurisdiction." See, also, Williamson v. Williamson, 58 N. C. 142–145; Lavender v. Rosenheim, 110 Md. 150, 72 Atl. 669, 132 Am. St. Rep. 420.

[5] The foregoing cases illustrate the principle that, where there is an ambiguity of expression by the testator as to the identity of the objects of his bounty, his real intent and meaning will be sought for in the light of the law pertaining to such objects under the law in force and existing at the time the testator formed and expressed his intent.

On behalf of the respondents, however, it is argued in substance that there is no ambiguity existing in the will as regards the identity of the beneficiaries of the contingent remainder because the law has given a fixed and stable meaning to the words "my heirs" used by the testator. Therefore, respondents—

> "earnestly contend that those entitled to share in the distribution of the estate are those who can qualify as heirs of decedent under the law which was in force at the time of the death of the life tenant. It is true that testatrix is presumed to have known the law at the time of the execution of the will. The law was, and she knew it, that the Legislature had exclusive control over the laws of succession and could amend or repeal such laws at any time; that the Legislature met every two years. She is also presumed to have known that the law was amended in 1905. She knew that her will did not take effect until her death, and that, as to the contingent remainder provided by the will, the shares therein given to a class did not vest in them until the termination of the life estate."

In support of their contention respondent relied upon the following authorities: Lincoln v. Perry, 149 Mass. 368, 21 N. E. 671, 4 L. R. A. 217; Van Tilburgh v. Hollinshead, 14 N. J. Eq. 32; Kohler's Estate, 199 Pa. 455, 49 Atl. 286; McGunnigle v. McKee, 77 Pa. 81, 18 Am. Rep. 428; Gilliam v. Guaranty Trust Co., 186 N. Y. 127, 78 N. E. 697, 116 Am. St. Rep. 536; Butterfield v. Sawyer, 187 Ill. 598, 58 N. E. 602, 52 L. R. A. 75, 79 Am. St. Rep. 246; Smith v. Hunter, 86 Ohio St. 106, 99 N. E. 91.

These were cases where the testator provided simply and directly that the remainder in question should vest in the heirs at law or in the children of a specified life tenant. And the courts held that there being no ambiguity in designating the remaindermen and the estate in remainder not vesting until the death of the life tenant that, therefore, if there were any change in the statutes either of adoption or succession after the making of the will and before the vesting of the estate in remainder that those statutes should be effective in determining the persons who should share in the estate in remainder. But in the case at bar it will be noticed that, though the life tenant was clearly designated, there was no attempt, as in the cases cited, to confine the remainder to the heirs of the said life tenant by the use of the word "heirs" as a technical word; in fact, in the case at bar, the first remainder attempted to be created was in favor of "his then living children." And in the case at bar the construction of the words "to his then living children" is not involved, as it was involved in some of the cases relied upon by counsel wherein was involved the question as to whether the word "children" would include illegitimate children or children by adoption and whether statutes of adoption or of legitimization enacted since the making of the will could be considered. And, furthermore, in the case at bar, unlike in the cases relied upon by counsel, the word "heirs" was not used in a technical sense by the testator, and, furthermore, the word "heirs" was qualified by the clause "as provided by the laws of the state of California, the same as if I had died intestate." In other words, in the case at bar the language of the will as used by the testatrix involves and invites a wider scope of interpretation than did the language used in the cases cited by counsel involving the wills therein construed. Consequently in the case at bar the construction on the question of time involved cannot be settled by determining first that the contingent remainder did not vest until the death of the life tenant and then by suggesting that the testator knew that the Legislature could amend or repeal the law in the light of which she made her will, and that she knew that the Legislature met every two years and is presumed to have known that the law was amended in 1905, and knew that her will did not take effect until her death, and knew that as to the contingent remainder the shares therein given to a class did not vest in them until the termination of the life estate.

In the first place, as to the use of the words "my heirs," on the previous appeal referred to (184 Cal. 63, 193 Pac. 581) our Supreme Court stated:

> "Obviously, this language referred simply to the manner of distribution among the persons constituting 'my heirs' 'among' whom the property was to be distributed."

Also:

> "The case is one where 'the context clearly indicates' (Civ. Code, § 1327) that the word 'heirs' was not used in the strict technical sense as designating the person or persons who would have succeeded under our succession statutes to the estate of deceased had she died intestate."

And, furthermore, as stated by counsel for respondents in their brief on this appeal:

> "Of course, neither appellants nor respondents are strictly heirs at law of the testatrix. They take shares in her estate under a suppositional condition of affairs surmised by testatrix as possible of occurrence, and which actually came about. They take shares in the estate by analogy to the statute of successions and distributions, and under the supposition made by testatrix that they would have been her heirs at law if she had survived all her issue and had died subsequent to the date of the termination of the life estate."

From all this it is evident that this will which does not use the word "heirs" in a technical sense, as it was used in the case relied upon by counsel, and where it further appeals that the whole clause "upon his death all such real property shall be distributed among my heirs as provided by the laws of the state of California, the same as if I had died intestate," was indicative "simply of a suppositional condition of affairs surmised by testatrix as possible of occurrence," it would seem that we should, in order to obtain a fair construction of testatrix's intent, place ourselves so far as we can in her actual situation as regards knowledge, motive, and surrounding conditions at the time she indulged in these suppositions.

In the first place, we must assume that the words "as provided by law of the state of California, the same as if I had died intestate" were inserted after the words "my heirs" for the purpose of adding to or qualifying the meaning already expressed by the words "my heirs." And this is a fair presumption irrespective of the fact that the will was drawn by an attorney of high standing. At least one of the effects of the clause added would be to control the disposition of her personal property in the event of a change of domicile by applying thereto the laws of the state of California. It seems also equally clear that the laws she intended to refer to and apply were the laws existing at the time she made the will, "the same as if I had died intestate." For since these words, as suggested by counsel, were used in an entirely suppositional sense, then the only time she could reasonably be supposed to have died intestate would have been some time immediately before the time she made her testament or will. And it was evident, in view of her approval of the laws as they existed at that time, conforming as they did to her natural instincts and actual feelings towards her own blood, that she meant to have the objects of her bounty designated by the laws as they then provided.

Counsel also cite the cases of In re Nichols' Estate, 102 Wash. 303, 172 Pac. 1146, L. R. A. 1918E, 986, and Will of Kopmeier, 113 Wis. 233, 89 N. W. 134, wherein it is stated that "a will is ambulatory during the life of its maker and subject to his control." In each of these cases, unlike the case at bar, it was not the mere intention of the testator that was involved, but the validity and effect of the will as to whether or not it was contrary to public policy. So it was properly held in each of those cases that the law or the condition existing at the time of the taking effect of the will would control the situation as to whether the effect of the will was in accord with the law. The intent or purpose that the testator might entertain as to the identity of the objects of his bounty was not in those cases a subject of construction or interpretation. The invalidity of the will would be determined by the status of the law and fact at the time the will became effective at the death of the decedent. Barber v. Brown, 55 Okl. 34, 154 Pac. 1156; Carter v. Whitcomb, 74 N. H. 482, 69 Atl. 779, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 733; Schouler on Wills, vol. 2, par. 840.

Counsel also refers to the case of Hardy v. Gage, 66 N. H. 552, 22 Atl. 557, wherein he claims "the facts of the case are almost identical with the facts at bar." In that case the facts do differ from the facts in the other cases cited by counsel and are similar to the facts in the case at bar to the extent that both wills provide for contingent remainder which does not directly and specifically vest in the heirs or children of the life tenant, but does go to the "heirs at law of the testator"; but the case cited does materially differ from the case at bar in that in the case at bar the testatrix specifically and further prescribes that "my heirs" shall be those "as provided by the laws of the state of California the same as if I had died intestate." And, as already noted, these words under a proper construction should be given some meaning for the purpose of explaining and qualifying the words immediately preceding them. They should not be so construed as to insert "as may be" or "as shall be" or "as to be" or "as then provided," when the testatrix herself did not make use of or evidently intend to make use of any such further qualifying words, but did evidently use the words "as provided" to express a present and existing situation and status of the law with which she was content "the same as if she had died intestate." Also counsel refers to section 1336 of the Civil Code, which provides that "words in a will referring to death or survivorship, simply" relate to the time of the testator's death, etc. But in the case at bar the words in the will do not refer "to death or survivorship simply." Estate of Briggs, 186 Cal. 351, at page 356, 199 Pac. 322. In the case at bar the immediate words which are the subject of construction are not the words which are determinative of the vesting of the estate but are the words determinative of the intent of the testatrix in regard to whether she desired to have the objects of her contingent bounty determined by the law existing at the time she expressed her intent and made the will or by any law that might be in effect at the time of the vesting of the estate. And since "judicial construction is the process of applying natural methods of finding and weighing evidence to discover the fact of intention" (Peet v. Peet, 229 Ill. 341, 82 N. E. 376, 13 L. R. A. [N. S.] 780, 11 Ann.

Cas. 492) it would seem that such intention in the case at bar should not be determined by assuming a knowledge on the part of the testator of technical words pertaining to the time of the vesting of an estate in heirs, when, as has been held, she did not use the word "heirs" in any technical sense and when she used no apt words to indicate that it was her intent to be so governed. Such a construction as is contended for by respondents herein is not responsive to the spirit of the rule which makes the existing lawful intent of the testator as expressed by our Supreme Court the polar star of construction,

> "Of whose true, fixed and resting quality
> There is no fellow in the firmament;
> The skies are painted with unnumbered
> sparks,
> They are all fire and every one doth shine;
> But there's but one in all doth hold his place."

In the language of Wigmore in his monumental work on Evidence (2d Ed.) vol. 5, par. 2461:

> "The history of the law of interpretation is a history of progress from a stiff and superstitious formalism to a flexible rationalism."

And paragraph 2462:

> "So long as men are allowed to grant and contract freely, and so long as the law undertakes to carry out those acts by enforcement, just so long must the standard of interpretation continue to be mobile, subjective and individual."

The construction of the will contended for by the appellants will therefore be accepted as being more in accord both with the language of the will as well as being in more accord with the intent of the testatrix interpreted in the light of all the surrounding circumstances.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be reversed and the lower court be directed to make distribution of the property of the estate to appellants.

65 Cal. App. 727

PALLADINE et ux. v. IMPERIAL VALLEY FARM LANDS ASS'N et al.

1. Appeal and error 🔑930(1)—Testimony of prevailing party assumed true, where evidence is conflicting.

Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the appellate court must assume the testimony of the prevailing party to be true, and construe it as favorably to him as possible, even when the law requires clear and convincing proof.

2. Fraud 🔑11(1)—Representation land was free of alkali held not opinion.

Vendor's representation, made as the affirmation of an existing fact, that the land was free of alkali, was not a matter of opinion on which purchasers, who were ignorant of conditions in the locality, had no right to rely.

3. Fraud 🔑64(1)—Whether representation land was free of alkali was one of fact question for jury.

Vendor's representation to purchasers, who were not familiar with conditions, that the land was free of alkali, if not a representation of a fact as a matter of law, could at least be so construed by the jury, and in such case the question was for the jury.

4. Fraud 🔑64(1)—Representations of fact or expressions of opinions question for jury.

When it is impossible to determine as a matter of law whether a statement is the expression of an opinion or a representation of a fact which the defendant intended to be understood as true of his own knowledge, the question is one for the jury.

5. Fraud 🔑11(1) — Representations as to adaptability of soil for grape culture held actionable.

Where general manager of land company was held out as one who would give prospective purchasers expert advice as to what lands were best adapted to their purposes, and where purchasers had no knowledge of the conditions, and relied on his representations, the manager's misrepresentation as to the adaptability of soil for the culture of grapes was an actionable misstatement of fact, and not merely an expression of opinion.

6. Fraud 🔑58(2)—Direct and positive proof of knowledge of falsity of representation not required.

In purchaser's action for damages for fraudulent representations, direct and positive proof of knowledge of falsity of the representation is not required; the question being one for the jury to determine from all the circumstances.

7. Fraud 🔑18—Representation land had not been covered by salt water held material.

Statement by vendor's manager that the land had not been covered by waters of the Salton Sea held a material representation as to purchasers, who in their negotiation with vendor emphasized the fact that they would not purchase alkali land.

8. Fraud 🔑58(1)—Evidence held to prove injury to land from salt water.

In purchaser's action for damages for fraudulent representation that the land had not been covered by the waters of the Salton Sea, evidence held to prove injurious effect on the land of such water.

9. Fraud 🔑23—Purchaser visiting property held not precluded from relying on representations.

That purchaser drove onto the land, and saw it prior to purchasing it, did not necessarily charge him with knowledge of the facts or establish that he relied upon his own judgment and not upon representations made by vendor's manager as to freedom of land from alkali and adaptability for grape culture, where purchaser was an elderly man with defective eyesight, and trusted the manager because a member of his own secret order.

10. Estoppel 🔑78(1)—Purchaser held not estopped from claiming damages because of fraudulent representation by reason of provision in contract.

Provision in contract that vendor shall not be responsible for any representation not set forth therein did not estop purchaser from recovering damages for fraudulent representations as to the character of the land, since the fraud affected the validity of the entire contract, including such provision.

11. Fraud 🔑58(4)—Direct and positive evidence of continuing effect of fraudulent representations unnecessary.

In purchasers' action for damages sustained because of vendor's fraudulent representations, they were not required to show by direct and positive evidence the continuing effect of the fraudulent representations as the inducing cause of the final contract embracing more land than originally contracted for.

12. Fraud 🔑52—Refusal to strike evidence of representations not actionable held not error.

In purchaser's action for damages from vendor's fraudulent representations, court's refusal to strike out the evidence of those representations which were not actionable held not error.

13. Fraud 🔑34 — Purchaser may withhold payments after discovery of fraud pending action for damages.

Purchaser induced by fraud to enter into the contract for the purchase may withhold payments after discovery of fraud and pending the action for damages to recoup such damages as may be recovered.

14. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Admission of preliminary documents in purchaser's action against vendor for fraudulent representations held prejudicial error.

In purchaser's action for damages from misrepresentations, the erroneous admission of preliminary documents, preceding signing of final contract, calculated to create a suspicion that the vendor was fraudulently seeking to impose upon purchasers a contract other than the one the parties had agreed to, held prejudicial error.

15. Evidence 🔑378(3)—Letter from vendor's secretary not admissible without showing writer's authority.

In purchaser's action against corporate vendor for fraudulent representations, letter to purchaser from vendor's secretary, written prior to execution of final contract, held not admissible to show vendor's acceptance of the final contract without proof of secretary's authority.

16. Evidence 🔑135(2)—Testimony of neighboring farmers as to meager crops raised on their land held not admissible in purchaser's action for misrepresentations.

In purchaser's action for fraudulent representations as to the character of the land, testimony of neighboring farmers as to the meager crops raised by them on their lands held not admissible, in the absence of showing of similarity of conditions.

17. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Testimony of neighboring farmers as to crops in purchaser's action for misrepresentations held prejudicial.

In purchaser's action for misrepresentations as to character of land, testimony of neighboring farmers as to meager crops raised on their lands, admitted without a showing of similarity of conditions, held prejudicial to vendor.

18. Fraud 🔑58(3)—Intent may be inferred from circumstances.

In purchaser's action for misrepresentations, the intent to deceive can be inferred from circumstances, and need not be proven by direct or positive evidence.

19. Fraud 🔑23—Purchaser without expert knowledge may rely on vendor's representations.

Where vendor holds himself out as an expert possessing superior knowledge of the subject-matter, and the vendee does not possess such expert knowledge, and expressly reposes confidence in the vendor's supposed superior knowledge, and leads vendor to understand that he is relying on the truth of his representations, vendee may safely rely thereon, though there is no legal fiduciary relation between them.

20. Fraud 🔑59(2)—Measure of damages to purchaser stated.

In purchaser's action for fraudulent representations, the measure of damages is the difference between the actual value of the property and the value which it would have possessed if it had been as represented.

21. Fraud 🔑59(2) — Jury, in ascertaining purchaser's damages, should deduct unpaid portion of price.

In purchaser's action for misrepresentations, the jury, in ascertaining the damages, should deduct therefrom any unpaid portion of the purchase price.

22. Fraud 🔑65(4)—Instruction on purchaser's duty to make inquiry held objectionable.

In purchasers' action for misrepresentations as to the character of the land, instruction that purchasers could not recover if they did not investigate or make any inquiry, unless they were induced to refrain from investigation, held objectionable for failure to describe the nature of the acts or statements which would excuse inquiry or examination where inquiry or examination would otherwise be essential.

23. Fraud 🔑22(1)—Purchaser's duty to investigate stated.

Where parties stand upon an equal footing, and have equal means of knowing the truth, and the vendee's suspicions are not lulled by the nature of the representation, an examination by the buyer will be excused only when he is fraudulently induced to forego examination, or where trick or artifice has prevented him from doing so.

24. Fraud ⟹65(4)—Instruction authorizing jury to consider whether purchaser was "lulled" into reliance on vendor's representations held not erroneous.

In purchaser's action for misrepresentations, instruction authorizing jury to "consider whether plaintiff was put upon inquiry, or whether he was lulled into a reliance upon any representations," held not objectionable, in view of the fact that one of the consequences of the misrepresentations was to disarm purchaser's vigilance and to lull his suspicions.

25. Evidence ⟹142(2)—Prices of lands in other localities not standard for ascertaining actual value of land misrepresented.

In purchaser's action for misrepresentations as to the character of the land, the prices at which lands in other localities of like quality and adaptability and similarly situated could be purchased did not constitute a proper standard for ascertaining the actual value of the land.

26. Appeal and error ⟹882(9)—That evidence was brought out on cross-examination did not justify refusal to charge jury not to consider it.

In purchaser's action for misrepresentations, refusal to instruct jury not to consider whether land of similar character could have been purchased at lower price in other localities held error, though evidence as to such other lands was brought out on cross-examination.

27. Evidence ⟹558(8)—Witnesses testifying as to value of land properly cross-examined as to prices at which other similar land could be bought.

In purchaser's action for misrepresentations, admission of testimony as to prices at which other similar lands could be bought was proper on cross-examination for the purposes of testing the witnesses' knowledge and impeaching their opinions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by A. C. Palladine and wife against the Imperial Valley Farm Lands Association, H. H. Clark, and another. From judgment for plaintiffs against named defendants, they appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Luther G. Brown and Leon R. Yankwich, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hickcox, Crenshaw & Trude, of El Centro, and L. B. Stanton, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for fraudulent representations made in the sale of a section of land in the Imperial Valley, hereafter referred to as section 13. The case was tried before a jury. A judgment of nonsuit was entered in favor of the defendant Janss Investment Company. A verdict in the sum of $25,000 was returned against the defendants Imperial Valley Farm Lands Association and H. H. Clark, both of whom have appealed from the judgment.

The following outline of some of the principal facts will suffice for an understanding of the points to be discussed: The defendant Clark is the general manager at Calipatria of the Imperial Valley Farm Lands Association—hereafter referred to as the association. The association owned some 47,000 acres of land in the Imperial Valley which it desired to sell. It inserted an advertisement in a Los Angeles newspaper advertising the lands for sale. It likewise caused to be published a printed folder which contained a map of the lands and certain information respecting the properties. In this folder the association made certain representations, of a more or less general nature, respecting the character of Imperial Valley lands, as, for example, that they are the choicest farm properties in the world—marvelous lands that frequently pay for themselves in 1 year, and that many of the valley's record-breaking crops were grown on the lands of the association.

Plaintiffs are husband and wife. They purchased section 13 from the association. The negotiations with defendants were carried on by the husband, A. C. Palladine, whom we shall refer to as the plaintiff, using the plural, plaintiffs, only when referring to both husband and wife. Plaintiff, a man of 68 years and of impaired eyesight, had been a viticulturist in Fresno county for more than 30 years prior to purchasing section 13. His attention was attracted to the newspaper advertisement of the association's Imperial Valley lands, and early in March of 1920, in company with his wife and their two sons, he called at the office of the Janss Investment Company, which was acting as sales agent for the association, and had a talk with a Mr. Link, an employee of the sales agent, whose office was in Los Angeles. Link told plaintiff that the association had large tracts of land for sale; that the soil is of greater fertility and depth; that it is suitable for the growth of citrus fruits and vegetables, and that no better land can be found in the world. Link showed plaintiff the folder published by the association. Mrs. Palladine read it to her husband. Plaintiff asked Link about alkali. Link stated that there was no alkali on the association's lands. Thereupon plaintiff said that it was well—that it would be useless for him to go to the Imperial Valley to look at alkali land. Plaintiff informed Link that he was looking for grape land and general farming land. Link gave to plaintiff, or to one of his sons for him, a letter of introduction to the defendant Clark, at the same time telling plaintiff that Clark, the association's general manager at Calipatria, was an honorable gentleman upon whose judgment plaintiff could rely. The next evening plaintiff, his wife, and two sons took the train for Calipatria, arriving there the following morning. Plaintiff was a stranger in the Imperial Valley. He had never previously visited that section of the state. On the morning of their arrival plaintiff, his wife, and sons, with other prospective purchasers, accompanied by Clark and Link, were taken in automobiles to see the association's lands.

[1] Though there is a sharp and irreconcilable conflict in the testimony with regard to the representations claimed to have been made during the time that Clark was showing plaintiff the association's properties, we shall state the events substantially as they were narrated by plaintiff and his witnesses. This we do in view of the well-known rule that, where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the appellate court must assume the testimony of the prevailing party to be true, and construe it as favorably to him as possible. And this is the rule even in those cases where the law requires clear and convincing proof. Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 686, 96 Pac. 357.

What occurred after Clark took charge of the party is described by plaintiff and his witnesses substantially as follows: Plaintiff and the other members of the party, including plaintiff's wife and their two sons, were first shown the Clark ranch—a half section of land owned by the defendant Clark, and situated some five or six miles south of section 13. Growing upon the Clark ranch were fine specimens of olive, fig, apricot, peach, pomegranate, and citrus trees, as well as grapevines, alfalfa, and garden truck. Clark told plaintiff that the lands which would be shown him during the day would grow anything that would grow on the Clark ranch, and that the soil was the same. From the Clark ranch the party was driven to section 19. While motoring toward section 19 one of plaintiff's sons saw a patch of white substance on the bank of a ditch. He asked Clark if it was alkali. The latter assured the son, in his father's hearing, that it was not alkali, but that it was chalk washed down from the Colorado river. During the course of the trip, and before arriving at section 13, plaintiff informed Clark, with whom he was riding, that he had spent his life in vineyards, and was acquainted only with viticulture; that he was in the Imperial Valley for the purpose of looking for land on which to grow grapes; and that, as he and Clark were members of the same fraternal order, he wished Clark would assist him in finding such land, telling the latter that he was wholly unfamiliar with conditions in the valley.

From section 19 the party was driven to section 13, where the automobiles were stopped in the road which passed through the section. While seated in the automobile during the time that the party halted somewhere near the center of section 13, Clark told plaintiff that the section was fine, level land, gently sloping to the west, thus making it easy to irrigate; that the southeast quarter had been recently planted to barley; that the northeast quarter had been in cultivation the previous year; that it was perfectly level and could be planted to cotton, and that, though the west half had not been cleared, it was good, level land, and not hard to clear and border. One of the plaintiff's sons asked Clark if the Salton Sea had ever been over the land. Clark replied that it had not—that the sea never rose higher than a certain line shown on the map which the association had published as a part of the folder that had been given to plaintiff by Link. Plaintiff asked Clark if he could especially recommend section 13 for grape land and for general farming purposes. In reply Clark said that it is the best section in the north end of the Imperial Valley; that it is the same sort of land as that which constitutes the Clark ranch; that it will grow anything that can be grown on the Clark ranch; and that it is especially adapted to the growing of grapes and general farming. One of plaintiff's sons then asked Clark if there was any alkali in the section. To this query Clark replied: "I told you once before there is no alkali in the Imperial Valley."

At no time while on section 13 did plaintiff get out of the automobile in which he was riding. He made no examination of the land other than such as could be made by one of his impaired eyesight while sitting in the automobile as it traveled along, or stopped for a short time in the road which passed through the section. Instead of making a careful examination of the land, plaintiff, so he says, relied entirely upon Clark's judgment. He testified that the only reason why he did not make a personal examination of the land to see if it was suitable for his purpose—the raising of grapes and general farming—was that he relied entirely upon Clark, and that but for the latter's recommendation and representations he would not have purchased the property. After the very cursory view of the land made by him as he sat in Clark's automobile, and as the automobile started to leave the spot where the party had stopped to glance over the section, plaintiff, who had discovered that he and Clark were members of the same fraternal order, said:

> "Mr. Clark, if all the representations that you make of this place are true, and if you give me your word as a Mason, I will take this section."

To this Clark replied that, not only were his representations true, but that the land was even better that he had represented it to be.

In 1908 the Salton Sea overflowed a very considerable territory in the vicinity of this land. The waters of the sea covered all of section 13 for a period of about 5 years. As a consequence the land is heavily impregnated with alkali—so much so that only such plant life will thrive thereon as is very resistant to alkali. Witnesses for plaintiff testified that the land in its present condition is not suitable for the growth of grapes or for general farming purposes. In addition to the alkali left on the land during the 5 years that it was covered by the Salton Sea, much alkali has been brought down to it by a ditch which drains upper parcels of land.

On the return trip to Calipatria, after their visit to section 13, plaintiff changed his mind about buying the entire section and concluded to purchase only the east half. He so informed Mr. Clark. A few days later plaintiff and his wife signed a contract to purchase the east half of the section. At the same time they made a part payment on the purchase price. A few days later, about March 26, 1920, being persuaded thereto by Clark, so plaintiff says, the Palladines, husband and wife, executed a new contract—a contract to purchase the whole section—and, at the same time, made a further payment. For some reason, perhaps due to a mistake on the part of the scrivener, the written instrument fixed the 18th day of March of the succeeding years as the dates upon which the deferred annual installments of the balance of the purchase price should be paid. In their preliminary negotiations the parties had agreed that the deferred payments should be due on the 1st of July of each year. Accordingly, another written contract for the purchase of the entire section was prepared and signed by the parties. In this last instrument July 1st was substituted for March 18th. Not until some time after this last instrument was signed did plaintiffs discover the fraud of which they complain.

The principal misrepresentations, as set forth in the complaint, are: (1) That there is no alkali on section 13; (2) that the section is excellant land for the raising of grapes and for general farming purposes; and (3) that the section has never been covered by the Salton Sea.

The grounds of appeal are: (1) That some of the representations are but expressions of opinion, and that such as are statements of fact do not constitute actionable fraud; (2) that plaintiffs waived the fraud; (3) that error was committed in the admission of certain evidence; and (4) that the court erred in giving and in refusing certain instructions and in modifying one of defendants' requested instructions.

Three or four of the assignments of error—errors in the admission of evidence, and in giving and refusing certain instructions—are not only well taken, but involve errors so prejudicial to appellants' substantial rights as to necessitate a reversal of the judgment and a remanding of the cause. A consideration of these errors would be sufficient to dispose of the appeal, but, as the case must go back for a new trial, it is expedient that we should pass upon and determine all questions of law presented by counsel which are likely to arise upon the retrial; for sooner or later they must be decided in order to settle this controversy. We shall proceed to an examination of the points substantially in the order of their presentation by counsel.

[2] 1. The representation that the land is free of alkali is not a matter of opinion upon which the purchasers had no right to rely. It was not given in the form of an opinion, but was made by Clark as the affirmation of an existing fact upon which the purchasers, who were ignorant of conditions in the Imperial Valley, could safely rely. It not only was the affirmation of one who held himself out as an expert in such matters, but was made under such circumstances as to warrant the jury in inferring that Clark's unequivocal affirmation involved the necessary implication that he was acquainted with facts which justified his statement.

> "If the facts are not equally known to both sides, then a statement of opinion by the one who knows the fact best involves very often a statement of a material fact, for he impliedly states that he knows facts which justify his opinion." Lord Bowen, in Smith v. Land, etc., Corp., 28 L. R. Ch. Div. 15, quoted in McDonald v. Smith, 139 Mich. 211, 102 N. W. 668, and in Olston v. Oregon Water Power, etc., Co., 52 Or. 343, 96 Pac. 1095, 97 Pac. 538, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 915, 926.

See, also, Armstrong v. Rachow, 205 Mich. 168, 171 N. W. 389.

It is said in Hall v. Mitchell, 59 Cal. App. 752, 211 Pac. 857, that—

> "Where the statement of the opinion is necessarily based upon a fact, or carries such inference that it must be regarded as the statement of a fact and is known to be false and made with intent to deceive, it may be actionable."

In Como Orchard L. Co. v. Markham, 54 Mont. 438, 171 Pac. 274, the court said:

> "We think the following rule is sustained by reason and the authorities: If the party expressing the opinion possesses superior knowledge, such as would reasonably justify the conclusion that his opinion carries with it the implied assertion that he knows the facts which justify it, his statement is actionable if he knows that he does not honestly entertain the opinion because it is contrary to the facts."

See, also, Henry v. Continental Building, etc., Ass'n, 156 Cal. 680, 105 Pac. 960; Edward Barron Estate v. Woodruff, 163 Cal.

Moreover, the representation falls within the rule enunciated in Herdan v. Hanson, 182 Cal. 546, 189 Pac. 444, that—

> "When a statement concerning a subject-matter of a transaction, which might otherwise be only an expression of opinion, is affirmed as an existing fact material to the transaction and reasonably induces the other party to consider and rely upon it as a fact, the statement then becomes an affirmation of fact within the meaning of the general rule as to fraudulent representations."

See, also, Crandall v. Parks, 152 Cal. 772, 93 Pac. 1018; Edward Barron Estate v. Woodruff, supra; 2 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 878.

In Scott v. Delta Land, etc., Co., 57 Cal. App. 320, 207 Pac. 389, the representations set out in the complaint were that the land "was of the best quality, fertile in every respect, free from alkali and noxious weeds, and suitable for growing thereon all kinds of crops of hay, grain, and vegetables." (Italics ours.) Other representations were made which are not material to be set forth here. It was held that the judgment might be sustained upon evidence showing the making of any one of the material representations pleaded in the complaint. In Stone v. McCarty (Cal. App.) 220 Pac. 690, it was held that statements made by a vendor or his agent to a party unfamiliar with the land or soil that the land was free from hardpan, that nursery trees growing on the land were of a stated value, and that the trees would soon be ready for market and were already budded, and that, if they were properly irrigated, the vendee could easily sell them for a stated price, and that the soil was adapted to the growing of fruit trees, are not expressions of opinion, but amount to representations such as to give rise to a cause of action, if false.

[3, 4] Even if it were assumed that the court could not say, as a matter of law, that the statement that the land was free of alkali was the representaion of a fact, it would be equally true that it could not be said, as a matter of law, that the statement amounted to nothing more than an expression of opinion. Hence it became at least a question for the jury to decide whether the statement was a mere expression of opinion or the representation of a fact. When it is impossible to determine, as a matter of law, whether a statement is the expression of an opinion or is the representation of a fact which the defendant intended to be understood as true of his own knowledge, the question is one for the jury. Olston v. Oregon Water Power, etc., Co., supra; Ward v. Jenson, 87 Or. 314, 170 Pac. 538; Pacific Gas, etc., Co. v. Almanzo, 22 Ariz. 431, 198 Pac. 457; 12 R. C. L. p. 446.

[5] 2. Under the circumstances here presented the representation that section 13 is excellent land for the raising of grapes and for general farming purposes was more than a mere expression of opinion. It was a statement upon which the purchasers had the right to rely as the affirmation of a known fact. Had the statement stood alone, it doubtless would have been but an expression of opinion (Rendell v. Scott, 70 Cal. 514, 11 Pac. 779; Lee v. McClelland, 120 Cal. 147, 52 Pac. 300), for the general rule is that a mere naked assertion, without more, that land is suitable for the growth of some particular crop, though known to the vendor to be untrue, does not constitute actionable deceit. This is so, because in most cases such an assertion is, and is understood to be, the statement of an opinion and not of a fact, and therefore the party to whom it is made has no right to rely upon it. But to the general rule that such statements are only expressions of opinion there are many exceptions, arising out of the special circumstances under which the representation is made, as, for instance, where the seller has, or assumes to have, a special or expert knowledge of the subject, and the buyer does not possess equal opportunity for knowing the facts, but, to the seller's knowledge, trusts entirely to the latter's representation. Gustafson v. Rustemeyer, 70 Conn. 125, 39 Atl. 104, 39 L. R. A. 644, 66 Am. St. Rep. 92. In Stonemets v. Head, 248 Mo. 243, 154 S. W. 108, it is said that—

> "Courts generally recognize that, where parties do not stand on an equal footing of opportunity and knowledge, a positive assertion of a matter, which, stated in another form, might be a mere opinion, may when false and fraudulent be actionable if the statement was a material inducement to the trade or sale."

Here the seller's manager, Clark, was held out as one who would give to prospective purchasers expert advice as to what lands were best adapted to the buyers' purposes. These plaintiffs knew nothing of the Association's Imperial Valley lands or of their adaptability for the growth of grapes or other crops; whereas Clark assumed to have, and did in fact have, a special knowledge of all these lands—a knowledge which was based on the past experience of himself and others. In a preceding year the association, while Clark was its general manager at Calipatria, had rented the east half of this particular section to a tenant on a crop-sharing basis. This fact, with other circumstances which were adduced in evidence, warranted the jury in drawing the inference that Clark's knowledge of the land was exceptional and unique. Clark, if plaintiff's testimony is to be believed, knew that the latter was purchasing the land with the intention of raising grapes thereon. According to the testimony of the experts, grapes cannot be grown on soil which is impregnated with more than four-tenths of one per cent. of alkali. The top soil of this section, if the testimony of plaintiffs' experts be true, contains on an average, 1.50 per cent, and the subsoil 1.38 per cent of alkali. Clark, who had had practical experience as a viticulturist, testified that he always was of the opinion that these lands contained alkali. And yet, as one having superior facilities for knowing the facts, he recommended the section to plaintiff as land which was suitable for the purposes for which plaintiff told him the land was being purchased.

Under these circumstances the misrepresentation as to the adaptability of the soil for the culture of grapes was actionable deceit. While it is true that the man without special knowledge is prone to overvalue his property, yet, as was said by the South Dakota Supreme Court:

> "It is likewise true that in all lines of business, and in connection with all kinds and classes of property, we have those who, through special study or unusual opportunities and experience, have become possessed of unusual information regarding the value or quality of some particular piece or class of property, so that their judgment thereon is accurate, and little, if any, influenced by the fact of personal interest therein. Upon the honest judgment of such a person, the law, based as it is upon human experience, gives another the right to rely even in connection with a transaction between such parties, unless both parties are possessed of such special knowledge. This right is given, though the party may have an opportunity to see and inspect the property himself, because the law recognizes that even then the judgment of the one should be superior to that of the other; that, under such circumstances, the statement of opinion as to the value of property is a statement of a material fact, the fact that such opinion exists." Rodee v. Seaman, 33 S. D. 184, 145 N. W. 441.

In Wendell v. Ozark Orchard Co. (Mo. App.) 200 S. W. 747, it was held that false representations as to the productiveness of a peach orchard and as to the enhanced value of the land because of its being fruit land should be regarded as representative of existing conditions, and fraudulent, because made by one having superior knowledge based upon the past experiences of himself and others. In that case it was said:

> "It is claimed that these representations as to the productiveness of the peach orchard and the enhanced value of this land because of its being fruit land were mere matters of opinion and related to future events rather than to existing facts, and therefore do not sustain allegations of fraud. It will be found, however, that false representations and promises as to what will result in the future, when made by one having or professing to have superior knowledge based on the past experience of himself or others, are in effect false representations of existing conditions and support allegations of fraud. Should the selling agent of an automobile company falsely represent that an automobile would sustain a speed of 50 miles an hour, or would average 15 miles travel per gallon of gasoline, no one would doubt but that an inexperienced buyer, on discovery that such machine would not run to exceed 20 miles per hour, and would consume a gallon of gasoline for every 7 or 8 miles, would not be turned out of court because the false representations were mere opinions and related to the future. Even representations of value often afford a solid basis for actionable fraud."

See, also, Hall v. Mitchell, supra, and Stone v. McCarty, supra.

[6] 3. It will not be necessary to consider appellants' claim that there is no evidence of the falsity of the representation respecting the price at which water could be bought. Respondents practically concede that the evidence does not support the allegation of the falsity of that representation. Nor is it incumbent upon us to consider the representation to the effect that the east half of the section was level land, as that is not alleged in the complaint as one of the representations inducing the contract. Neither will it be necessary to consider appellants' claim that the evidence fails to establish that they had knowledge of the falsity of the representation that the land had not been inundated by the Salton Sea. Since the case must be remanded, and since the evidence to be adduced at the second trial may supply any deficiency in this particular, if deficiency there be, it will not be necessary to consider this point further than to say, as a guide to court and counsel, that in cases such as this direct and positive proof of the knowledge of the falsity of the representation is not required. The scienter may be inferred from other facts in the case; and it is for the jury to determine from all the circumstances whether the defendants knew the representations to be false. Hiner v. Richter, 51 Ill. 299. Furthermore, as to this particular representation the scienter seems to be admitted by the pleadings.

[7, 8] 4. The statement that the land had not been covered by the waters of the Salton Sea was a material representation. The nature of the statement is such that it naturally must have influenced plaintiffs in making their contract to purchase the land. Throughout the negotiations plaintiff was at pains to emphasize the fact that he would have naught to do with alkali land. That the falsity of the representation concerning the Salton Sea was a source of injury to plaintiffs is beyond question. Obviously, the inundation, with its consequent deposit of salts, must have had a most deleterious effect upon the soil. It is alleged in the complaint and admitted by the answer that these lands "were deeply covered by the briny waters of the Salton Sea, and have become thoroughly impregnated with salt." (Italics ours.) From the testimony of the experts it appears that land containing more than four-tenths of 1 per cent. of salt or alkali is practically valueless for all ordi nary farming purposes, and that only at considerable expense can alkali land be reclaimed, and then only if there be no impervious layer underlying the soil to prevent the necessary drainage. There is testimony that the subsoil in section 13 is a heavy clay, and that it tends to retard the natural drainage from the top soil. It seems self-evident that, other things being equal, land upon which the briny waters of an inland sea have stood for several years necessarily must contain far more deleterious substances than would be the case with similar land which has not been thus submerged.

Appellants contend, however, that plaintiff's testimony is such that it compels the conclusion that he was not influenced by the representation respecting the waters of the Salton Sea. It seems that on his cross-examination plaintiff testified as follows:

> "Q. In the purchase of both the first half section, and later in making the purchase of the other half section, you relied entirely upon Mr. Clark; that is correct, is it? A. Yes, sir. Q. And then if he told you it was submerged and that made it better land, or good land, or advised you to buy it, you would have bought it just the same, wouldn't you? A. I believe I did just the same, you know. Q. If you had known the land was covered with water, had been covered with water, and he would have advised you to buy it, you would have still bought it on his advice, wouldn't you? A. Yes, sir; at that time I had full confidence in Mr. Clark."

This testimony is far from justifying appellants' claim that plaintiff entered into the contract uninfluenced by Clark's representation that the land had not been inundated. The questions put to plaintiff on his cross-examination, questions adroitly propounded by skillful counsel, postulate a purely hypothetical situation; and it was that suppositious situation to which plaintiff was addressing himself when replying to counsel's skillful questioning. The witness did not say that he was not influenced by Clark's statement that the sea had not submerged the land. What he did say, in effect, is that his confidence in Clark was so great that he would have entered into the contract, even though he had known that the land had been so covered by the waters of the sea, provide Clark had advised him to do so. His answers, far from showing that he would have purchased the land had he known Clark's representation to be false, show that he placed such implicit reliance in Clark that he would have taken the latter's word at its full face value without questioning it, even though it had amounted to a statement that the submergence of land by the waters of this sea improves it, but that, unless he was assured by Clark that the sea water does improve land, he would not have purchased if he had known that the property had indeed been under the waters of this inland sea.

[9] 5. The fact that plaintiff drove onto the land and saw it prior to purchasing it does not necessarily charge him with knowledge of the facts, or establish that he relied upon his own judgment, or debar him from claiming that he relied solely upon the representations made to him. The fact that a vendee visits the property does not necessarily preclude him from saying that he relied upon his vendor's statements. French v. Freeman (Cal. Sup.) 217 Pac. 515; Kincaid v. Price, 82 Ark. 20, 100 S. W. 76; Jones v. Hawk, 64 Wash. 171, 116 Pac. 642; Wooddy v. Benton Water Co., 54 Wash. 124, 102 Pac. 1054, 132 Am. St. Rep. 1102.

There was that in the relations of these two men, Clark and A. C. Palladine, which was calculated to disarm caution. It seems that in the course of the trip and prior to the party's arrival at section 13 plaintiff discovered that he and Clark were members of the same secret order. Plaintiff testified that some time after he and Clark had made themselves known to each other as brothers in the same fraternal organization, and after the party had arrived at section 13, but prior to the closing of the deal, the following conversation occurred: Plaintiff, addressing Clark, said:

> "Mr. Clark, I am helpless [deferring, doubtless, to his purblindness and to his unfamiliarity with the conditions in that part of the state]. I will charge you for myself. Will you advise me as a gentleman and a Mason if this land grows grapes, fruit, cotton, alfalfa, etc.?"

To this Clark replied:

> "Certainly, this land will grow grapes, fruit, some other things and cantaloupes, and will grow anything that will grow outside of doors."

Thereupon plaintiff asked Clark if the soil was good, to which Clark replied:

> "It is all sandy loam of great fertility and rich."

One of plaintiff's sons testified that his father said to Clark:

> "Mr. Clark, if all the representations that you make of this place is true, and you give me your word as a Mason that they are true, I will take this section of land," —and that to this Clark replied that his representations were true, and that the land was even better than he represented it to be. Thereupon the deal was closed. It is due to Mr. Clark to say that these conversations are denied by him; but though his testimony in many particulars is corroborated by that of disinterested witnesses in the case, the jury chose to believe plaintiff and his witnesses, and we, perforce, must accept the testimony of the latter as true for all the purposes of this appeal.

If the testimony of plaintiff be true, Clark took advantage of their fraternal relation and of the confidence which plaintiff reposed in him by reason of that relation. Though they never had met before that day, plaintiff's discovery that he and Clark were members of the same fraternal order was well calculated to inspire him with the same confiding trustfulness which one intimate friend may safely repose in another. It has been held that when men deal as friends, and one accepts as true false representations by the other, into which, but for the relation of friendship, he would have made inquiry, the law will protect him in his trust as certainly as it will deny him relief, if the personal relations of the parties are such that the dealing is at arm's length. Gray v. Reeves, 69 Wash. 374, 125 Pac. 162. See, also, Dorr v Cory, 108 Iowa, 725, 78 N. W. 682, and Grant v. Ledwidge, 109 Ark. 297, 160 S. W. 200. For reasons equally cogent it must be held that, when two men deal with each other as members of the same fraternal order, and one accepts as true the representations of the other, into which but for the fraternal relation he would have made inquiry, the law will protect him in his trust.

Moreover, plaintiff, an elderly gentleman of defective eyesight, would have experienced some difficulty in ascertaining the exact truth respecting this land. It is true he testified that by "feeling" the soil he could tell "whether it is good grape land or not." But to discover even in this crude manner that the soil of this 640-acre tract was not "good grape land" it doubtless would have been necessary for him to have felt the soil on more than one spot. And, although he contented himself with a mere view of the land as he sat in the automobile which had conveyed him to the premises, he may have been led to make this superficial examination solely by reason of the character of the representations which were made to him by the man to whom he was bound by fraternal ties. To discover the falsity of all the representations it would have been necessary for plaintiff to do more than merely "feel" the soil. He would have had to make a most careful examination of the property, and probably would have had to make inquiries of the neighboring landowners. But, if the truth was more or less difficult of ascertainment by plaintiff, the facts were peculiarly within the knowledge of Clark, who was held out as one possessing special knowledge of the association's properties, and who, as plaintiff knew, had exceptionally advantageous facilities for acquiring exact information. In Smith v. Fletcher, 102 Wash. 218, 173 Pac. 19, 636, it is said that—

> "Where facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of the vendor and difficult of ascertainment by the vendee, the vendee, who relies on the vendor's word, is entitled to rescind for misrepresentation as to material facts, although he may have inspected the land and made some investigation of the subject matter of the representations."

See, also, Rodee v. Seaman, supra; Hetland v. Bilstad, 140 Iowa, 411, 118 N. W. 422; Koch v. Rhodes, 57 Mont. 447, 188 Pac. 933; Best v. Offield, 59 Wash. 466, 110 Pac. 17, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 55; Champneys v. Irwin, 106 Wash. 438, 180 Pac. 405; Williams v. Hanna, 105 Kan. 540, 185 Pac. 17, and Mannel v. Shafer, 135 Wis. 241, 115 N. W. 801. In Dow v. Swain, 125 Cal. 683, 58 Pac. 271, Mr. Justice Temple said:

> "If the seller knows the facts, and the buyer is ignorant, and to the knowledge of the seller the buyer relies upon the representations, I see no reason why relief should not be granted, although an imperfect examination was made. It may have been imperfect because of the representations."

6. Plaintiffs are not estopped to complain of the fraud by reason of that provision in the written contract of sale which declares that the party named therein as vendor, C. I. Whitesell, and his attorney in fact, the Title Insurance & Trust Company, shall not be responsible for any representation not set forth in the contract. Whitesell executed the contract by his attorney in fact, and is referred to in the instrument as the vendor and as the party of the first part. The exact status of the title is not clear, but it seems to be conceded that the association is the real owner, and that Whitesell was acting as its trustee. The clause in the contract upon which appellants rely reads:

> "It is further agreed that neither the party of the first part [Whitesell] nor the Title Insurance & Trust Company shall be responsible or liable for any inducement, promise, representation, agreement, condition, or stipulation not set forth herein." (Italics ours.)

By reason of the presence of this clause it is claimed that plaintiffs waived the fraud.

[10] This provision of the contract—even if we assume that, if valid, it could redound to the benefit of the association—was not a waiver of plaintiffs' right to maintain the action. The fraud which was the inducing cause of the execution of the contract renders the whole instrument vulnerable—the clause in question as well as all the other provisions. Watson v. Duarte (Cal. App.) 215 Pac. 1039; American National Bank v. Sommerville (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 376.

> "False and fraudulent representations made by one party to a contract, by which the other party is induced to enter into the contract, render it voidable, at the election of the defrauded party, and a stipulation in such a contract to the effect that the false and fraudulent representations by which the one party induced the other to enter into it shall not affect its validity is itself of no validity. No one can be estopped by anything contained in an instrument which instrument was itself obtained from him by fraud and deceit." Hofflin v. Moss, 67 Fed. 440, 444, 14 C. C. A. 459.

The chain cannot be stronger than its weakest link. The clause which it is claimed estops plaintiffs to complain of the fraud cannot be made to survive the rest of the transaction as a shield and protection to defendants, whose false representations were the efficient and inducing cause of the contract.

> "Public policy and morality are both ignored if such an agreement can be given effect in a court of justice. The maxim that fraud vitiates every transaction would no longer be the rule, but the exception. It could be applied then only in such cases as the guilty party neglected to protect himself from his fraud by means of such a stipulation. Such a principle would in a short time break down every barrier which the law has erected against fraudulent dealing." Bridger v. Goldsmith, 143 N. Y. 424, 38 N. E. 458.

Appellants have cited Blackstad Mercantile Co. v. Porter & Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 158 S. W. 216, as a case in point. There it was held that a provision in a written contract of sale that no statement by the seller's agent should be considered a part of the agreement, unless written into the contract, bound the buyer, so that promises by the seller's agent, not made a part of the contract, did not bind the seller. But that would be true, even in the absence of any such special provision in the contract. Civ. Code, § 1625. In the present case the party to whom the statements were made is not seeking relief upon the theory that the representations were a part of the agreement. Here the fraudulent misrepresentations which constistuted the inducing cause influencing plaintiffs to enter into the contract were collateral to and not a part of the agreement.

[11] 7. The jury was warranted in finding that the false representations continued to influence the minds of plaintiffs after they had agreed to purchase the east half of the section and until their execution of the final contract. It was not incumbent upon plaintiffs to show by direct and positive evidence the continuing effect of the fraudulent representations as the inducing cause of the finally executed contract.

> "If a false statement was intended to be relied upon as an inducement to a given transaction which takes place within a reasonable time afterwards, it may well have a continuing operation on plaintiff's mind, and in the absence of proof to the contrary it cannot be said as a matter of law that he did not continue to rely on the statement." 26 C. J. p. 1165, § 76.

We may repeat, in passing, that the fraud was not discovered by plaintiffs until some time after the execution of the last contract.

[12] 8. The court did not err in refusing to strike out the evidence of those representations which appellants claim were not actionable. In Haven v. Neal, 43 Minn. 315, 45 N. W. 612, it is said that, when representations which are matter of opinion and not of fact "are made in connection with others, which are material as tending to establish the plaintiff's case, they should not be ruled out, but the entire statement should be received and considered together." See, also, Anderson v. Heasley, 95 Kan. 572, 148 Pac. 738.

[13] 9. The court erred in admitting evidence of certain preliminary documents preceding the signing of the instrument which plaintiffs claim was the corrected and final contract for the purchase of the entire section. The answer admitted the contract as pleaded in the complaint, except that it denied that the deferred installments were to be paid on July 1st of each year, and alleged that they were payable on the 28th of March of each year until fully paid. A written contract for the sale of the entire section, signed by all of the parties, was produced at the trial. It had been in the custody of the association. The instrument showed that a line had been drawn through the words and figures "March 18," and that written over the canceled words and figures were the words and figures "July 1st." The trial of the case took place in the month of May, 1921. Respondents, assuming that Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 Pac. 729, holds that the plaintiff in an action of this character must show that he has complied with all the terms of his contract up to the time of the trial, argue that it was necessary for them to establish the payment by them of any installment of the purchase price which fell due prior to the trial. Upon this false premise it is further argued by respondents that, since none of the deferred installments had been paid by them up to the date of the trial, it was incumbent upon them to show that under the terms of the contract as finally executed the first deferred installment was payable in July, 1921, and not in the month of March of that year. There is no merit in the contention. One induced by fraud to enter into a contract for the purchase of real estate may withhold payments after the discovery of the fraud and pending the action for damages. True, the plaintiff in such an action must be willing and able to pay, if and when he shall become liable therefor (Hines v. Brode, supra); but the fraud suspends liability to make payments accruing after discovery of the fraud and pending the action. Payments may be withheld to recoup such damages as may be recovered. Pembrook v. Houston, 41 Cal. App. 54, 181 Pac. 828. See, also, Webb v. Emerson, etc., Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 227 S. W. 499, and cases there cited. In Hullinger v. Big Sespe Oil Co., 50 Cal. App. 10, 194 Pac. 742, the Supreme Court, in denying a petition to have the cause heard by it after judgment of the District Court of Appeal, said that it did not approve that part of the opinion of the latter court which declares that it is essential for the plaintiff in an action for damages on the contract to allege and prove his willingness and ability to perform the contract according to its terms.

Moreover, the preliminary documents, though tending to show why the parties signed the instrument which plaintiffs claim was the final and accepted contract, do not prove or tend to prove its due execution. If the time when the first deferred payment fell due had been material, that is, if it had been necessary to show that the first installment would become due subsequent to the trial of the action, i. e., in July, and not in March, that fact could have been established by evidence that the changes in the final instrument were made before the Title Insurance & Trust Company signed it for and in the name of its principal, C. I. Whitesell, and that the signing of the instrument was followed or accompanied by delivery as the remaining essential to due execution. But evidence which merely showed why it was that the parties intended to enter into such a contract as is evidenced by the instrument last to be signed by them did not tend to establish that instrument, in its corrected form, as the finally executed contract.

[14] Nor can we say that the improper admission of this immaterial evidence did not injure defendants. The circumstances were such that the evidence may have created a suspicion in the minds of the jurors that the officers of the association were fraudulently seeking to impose upon plaintiffs a contract other than the one upon which the parties had agreed.

[15] 10. The letter of December 29, 1920, from the association's secretary to plaintiff, was improperly admitted in evidence. Respondents claim that this letter was admissible in order to show an acceptance by the association of what plaintiffs claim was the finally executed contract. There is nothing to warrant the inference that by his allusion to the "contract" the writer of the letter intended that the reference should be to the instrument last signed by the parties. The reference may just as well have been to the next preceding written instrument—the instrument which provided for the payment of the installments in the month of March. Moreover, no foundation was laid for the introduction of the letter by showing authority in the secretary to say which one of the instruments was accepted by his principal as its final contract with plaintiffs.

[16] 11. Another error, and one which we believe must have seriously prejudiced defendants' case in the minds of the jurors, was the admission of the testimony of neighboring farmers as to the meager crops raised by them on their lands. Evidence of this kind, injecting collateral issues into a case, should be received with caution, and then only when it is obvious to the court, from the similarity of conditions, that it affords a safe and reliable standard of comparison. Converse v. Ferguson, 166 Cal. 1, 134 Pac. 977; Fairbanks, Morse & Co. v. Zimmerman, 30 Cal. App. 81, 157 Pac. 509; People v. Wagner, 29 Cal. App. 363, 368, 155 Pac. 649; Patrick v. Howard, 47 Mich. 40, 10 N. W. 71; Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 1, pp. 522, 523. The results which these witnesses obtained from the farming of their lands could afford no logical basis for the inference that better results could not be obtained from the proper farming of section 13, unless it were shown that the soil of section 13 and the soils of these nearby lands were substantially alike in texture, structure, chemical content, and composition. Some of the witnesses in the case testified that the lands in that vicinity, as well as those in the Imperial Valley generally, are very "spotted," and that no two pieces are alike. Before the crops raised by these neighboring farmers on their lands could be taken as a safe criterion whereby to judge the character of the soil on section 13 it would be necessary to show, in addition to similarities of soil texture and chemical content, that the lands were leveled in a similar manner; that they were brought to the same pitch or fall so as to be similarly affected by the artificial irrigation practiced in that desert region; that section 13 and these other lands had been prepared for crops by the same kind and degree of cultivation and treatment, exhibiting the same methods of husbandry; that the crops were planted at the same seasons and under the same weather conditions, and were irrigated in practically the same manner and for the same periods of time. These are some of the essential elements of similarity which it would be necessary to show before the court could properly receive the evidence of these neighboring farmers as to the results obtained by them from the farming of their lands. Unless these elements of similarity exist, there is no just or fair standard of comparison. No attempt was made to show such similarity of conditions, notwithstanding the burden rested upon plaintiffs to make a satisfactory showing thereof. 22 C. J. p. 753.

Respondents seek to justify the admission of this evidence upon the theory that it tended to establish the falsity of a representation in the folder as to what "other farmers are doing"—referring to a statement in the folder where in the association speaks in glowing terms of the successes achieved by other farmers in the district. But respondents' right of recovery must be based upon representations respecting the character of the particular parcel of land which they purchased. They cannot recover for the falsity of representations which affect other lands only. Moreover, evidence of what could or could not be done with lands in the immediate vicinity of section 13 does not tend to disprove the very general statements in the folder wherein the association speaks in ing.

[17] We can readily see how the admission of this improper evidence must have been prejudicial to appellants in a substantial measure. Without doubt it must have been considered by the jury, and must have had some weight with them in their determination of the value of the land sold to plaintiffs; and thus it must have had a tendency to enhance the jury's award of damages. This is so for the reason that in cases of this kind the measure of damages ordinarily is the difference between the actual value of the property sold and the value which it would have had if it had been as represented. Hines v. Brode, supra. It follows, therefore, that, the value which the property would have had if the representations were true being determined, the amount of damages awarded to the party complaining of the deceit will decrease or increase pari passu with the rise or fall of the property's actual value as determined by the jury. That is to say, other things being equal, the lower the actual value the greater the difference between it and the value which the land would have had if it had been as represented. The testimony as to the results obtained from the farming of neighboring lands must have had a strong tendency to depreciate, in the estimation of the jury, the actual value of the land in section 13. To the extent that it did so, this improperly admitted evidence must have tended to increase the amount of the verdict. Without doubt, therefore, it was prejudicial to appellants' case; and, if there were no other error, the improper admission of this testimony would alone necessitate a reversal of the judgment and a retrial of the action.

12. We do not think plaintiff's instruction No. 2 is objectionable upon the score that it fails to single out the false representations that were material and separate them from those which appellants claim were but expressions of opinion and immaterial. For reasons already stated we are of the opinion that each of the representations specifically referred to in the instruction was material and actionable. And, even if one of them were not material, we probably should hesitate to reverse the judgment for that reason alone. See Anderson v. Heasley, supra.

[18] 13. By plaintiffs' instruction No. 4 the court charged the jury that it is not necessary to prove by direct or positive evidence the intent to deceive, but that it is sufficient to prove facts from which such intent may be drawn—that the intent to deceive may be inferred from circumstances in evidence. This is a correct statement of the law. The intention of the parties cannot often be proved by direct testimony, but may be established by inference from the acts of the parties. 27 C. J. p. 70; Rochford v. Barrett, 22 S. D. 83, 115 N. W. 522.

[19] 14. By the last clause of this same instruction the jury was advised that one has a right to rely upon the representations or statements of another in purchasing property when the other is held forth as an expert. It is claimed by appellants that a buyer is warranted in relying upon the representations of a vendor who has expert knowledge of the subject-matter of the sale, when, and only when, there has arisen a legal fiduciary relationship between the parties. The contention lacks merit. If the vendor holds himself out as an expert possessing superior knowledge of the subject-matter of the sale, and the vendee does not possess such expert knowledge, and if the latter, during the preliminary negotiations, expressly reposes confidence in the vendor's supposed superior knowledge as an expert, and gives the latter to understand that he is going to rely upon the truth of his representations, he may safely rely thereon, irrespective of whether there is or is not a legal fiduciary relation between the two; and the confidence thus reposed by the vendee must not be abused. Grant v. Ledwidge, supra.

[20, 21] 15. By plaintiffs' instruction No. 9 the jury was advised, and properly advised, that the measure of damages in cases of this character is the difference between the actual value of the property and the value which it would have possessed had it been as represented. But in this same instruction the court gravely erred, so far as the rights of the association are concerned, when it told the jurors that, if they found for plaintiffs, they should not deduct from the total amount of damages any unpaid portion of the purchase price, but should assess the damages irrespective of any unpaid balance.

> "* * * In case of an executory contract, from the award which the jury may make because of the fraud, must be deducted the unpaid part of the purchase price or the value of any other consideration. And to this effect the jury should be instructed." Hines v. Brode, supra. (Italics ours.)

Where, as in this case, the amount of the purchase price remaining unpaid exceeds the sum awarded as damages, it would be unjust to the vendor if he were compelled to pay the full amount of damages and thereafter be required to resort to a separate action for the recovery of the unpaid portion of the purchase price in the event that his vendee, after the judgment for damages had been satisfied, should be unable or unwilling to carry out the terms of his contract.

[22, 23] 16. Complaint is made of the modification of an instruction requested by appellants—defendants' instruction No. 22.

The instruction, as prepared by defendants, advised the jury that plaintiffs cannot recover if they had the means of investigating the facts and did not do so, or if the circumstances attending the transaction were such as to put plaintiffs upon inquiry and they did not make any inquiry. The court gave the instruction as requested, after modifying it by adding thereto the following:

> "Unless you further find that plaintiffs were induced to refrain from investigation by acts and statements of the defendants."

Considered as an abstract proposition, this modification is subject to the criticism that it fails to describe the nature of the acts or statements which will excuse inquiry or examination, where inquiry or examination would otherwise be essential. It is not every act or statement of a vendor which will excuse a vendee's neglect to make an examination or investigation where the parties are dealing at arm's length and with equal means of knowing the truth, and the representation is as to the value of the land, its condition, quality, or adaptability for particular uses. Here, if the allegations of the complaint and the testimony of plaintiff and his witnesses be true, plaintiff and defendants were not standing upon an equal plane of vantage, with equal means of knowing the truth, and the representations were made under such circumstances as to disarm caution and lull plaintiff's suspicions. But, if the jury believed otherwise, that is, if it believed that plaintiff and the defendants were in fact standing upon an equal footing, and did have equal means of knowing the truth, and that the representations were not made under such circumstances as to disarm the vigilant and lull his suspicions, then, and in that case, it would not be true that an act or statement of defendants would excuse plaintiff's failure to make an examination or investigation, irrespective of whether such act or statement was or was not fraudulent, i. e., done or said with the fraudulent purpose of inducing plaintiff to forego making an examination. The rule is that, where the parties stand upon an equal footing, and have equal means of knowing the truth, and the vendee's suspicions are not lulled by the nature of the representation, an examination by the buyer will be excused only when he is fraudulently induced to forego examination, or where trick or artifice has prevented him from doing so. Parker v. Moulton, 114 Mass. 99, 19 Am. Rep. 315; Gustafson v. Rustemeyer, supra. See, also, 26 C. J. p. 1157; 12 R. C. L. p. 384; and Koch v. Rhodes, supra.

[24] 17. Objection is made to plaintiff's instruction No. 6, whereby the court advised the jurors that they might "consider whether plaintiff was put upon inquiry, or whether he was lulled into a reliance upon any representations made at the time of the sale." It is claimed that by the use of the word "lulled" the instruction implies the use of improper means to prevent inquiry and an examination by plaintiff. But under the circumstances of this case, as testified to by plaintiff and his witnesses, one of the consequences of Clark's representations was to disarm plaintiff's vigilance and to lull his suspicions. See Stewart v. Stearns, 63 N. H. 99, 56 Am. Rep. 496.

[25-27] 18. Appellants justly complain of the court's refusal to instruct the jury that in determining the fair market value of section 13 they should not consider whether land of similar character could have been purchased at a lower price in other localities. The prices at which other lands of like quality and adaptability and similarly situated could be purchased do not constitute a proper standard for ascertaining the actual value of the land in question. Reclamation District v. Inglin, 31 Cal. App. 495, 160 Pac. 1098. The owners of such other lands, through force of circumstances beyond their control, might be willing to sell their lands at prices below their actual value, or they might be willing to make such sales through improvidence or want of good judgment. That the jury, in arriving at the actual value of the land, sold to plaintiffs for the purpose of determining the amount of damages which should be awarded, was probably influenced by this improperly admitted testimony as to the prices at which other lands could be bought is indicated by the fact that the jurors themselves, or some of them, separately asked several witnesses about the prices of other lands. This testimony, it is true, was brought out on cross-examination, but that fact did not excuse the court's refusal to give the requested instruction or an instruction covering the same subject. As cross-examination, the testimony as to the prices at which other similar lands could be bought was proper for the purpose of testing the witnesses' knowledge and impeaching their opinions, but not for the purpose of fixing the value of the land; and the jury should have been so advised particularly in view of defendants' requested instruction.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

SAN FRANCISCO-OAKLAND TERMINAL RYS. v. ALAMEDA COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 4392.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 4, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 1, 1924.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑646 — "Street" relates to public way in municipality.

Strictly speaking the word "street" relates to a public way within a municipality only.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Street.]

2. Highways 🔑18—Public way generally referred to as "highway" or "road."

A public way over unincorporated territory of a county is generally referred to as a "highway" or "road."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Highway; Road.]

3. Highways 🔑80—Fee to land usually rests in adjoining property owner.

The fee to the land in a highway generally rests in the adjoining property owner, and the public holds the easement for the use.

4. Highways 🔑80 — Municipal corporations 🔑658—Municipality merely trustee of state with duty of maintaining highway.

Where adjoining owners own the fee in lands used as highways or streets, the easement lies in the people of the state, and the county or the city is merely the agent or trustee of the state, committed to the duty of maintaining the highway for the use of the public.

5. Appeal and error 🔑909(1)—Assumed in support of judgment that franchises cover right to use public highway in which county did not own fee.

In the absence of any showing to the contrary, it will be assumed in support of a judgment that franchises of a street railway in unincorporated territory covered the right to use public highways in which the county did not own the fee, but which were dedicated to public use in the ordinary and usual way.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑647—Jurisdiction over highways transferred by annexation of territory.

On annexation of territory to a city under St. 1889, p. 358, entire jurisdiction and control over highways therein for the benefit of the state was thenceforth imposed in the city, and jurisdiction of the county in respect thereto ceased.

7. Street railroads 🔑18—Nature of franchise.

The right which the grantee of a street railroad franchise obtains is more than the mere right to operate a railroad; the most valuable part of the franchise being the right to lay tracks and operate its road on a street, which carries the obligation to serve the public in the use of the street in furtherance of the original use.

8. Street railroads 🔑24(4)—Charge exacted under franchise rental for use of highway.

The gross percentage charge exacted under a street railway franchise granted by county is in the nature of a toll or rental for use of highway.

9. Constitutional law 🔑134—Municipal corporations 🔑36(1)—City held entitled to percentages on gross receipts of street railway in territory annexed, and no question of impairment of contract arises.

On annexation of territory by the city of Oakland under St. 1889, p. 358, it became entitled to annual payment of percentages upon gross receipts of operation of street railways located within the annexed territory and operated by virtue of franchises granted by the board of supervisors of Alameda county, or in accordance with the terms of the Broughton Act, granting the right to use streets "within unincorporated territory in the county"; the gross percentage charge being in the nature of a toll or rental for the use of the streets, and there being no question of impairment of the obligation of contracts.

10. Franchises 🔑2—Deemed granted in contemplation of existing statutes.

Franchises granted after enactment of a statute must be deemed to have been made in contemplation of its terms.

11. Statutes 🔑219—Legislature not bound by interpretation placed upon acts by officials.

Legislature is not bound by an interpretation placed upon its acts by the officials of one county without, at least, some showing that such interpretation was brought to its notice either directly or indirectly.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, in interpleader, against the County of Alameda and the City of Oakland. From an adverse judgment, the first-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., and Frank Mitchell, Jr., Ralph E. Hoyt, and Carlisle C. Crosby, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of Oakland, for appellant.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Markell C. Baer, Asst. City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent City of Oakland.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, for respondent San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Rys.

NOURSE, J. The San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways commenced this action in interpleader to require the county of Alameda and the city of Oakland to litigate between themselves the question as to which one was entitled to the annual payment of percentages upon the gross receipts of the operation of street railways over certain streets now located within the municipal boundaries of the city of Oakland. The railways are operated over these streets by virtue of four franchises granted to the predecessors of the plaintiff railroad corporation by the board of supervisors of Alameda county. The first franchise was granted by ordinance of the supervisors adopted July 10, 1893. The other three franchises were granted in accordance with the terms of the Broughton Act (Stats. 1905, p. 777) in May, 1907, December, 1907, and May, 1909, respectively. All four franchises granted the right to construct and operate street car lines over public highways within unincorporated territory in the county of Alameda. All were to run for a period of 50 years each, and all called for the payment to the county of Alameda of a percentage upon the gross receipts derived from the operation of the roads. On December 8, 1909, after all the franchises were in full operation, all that portion of the territory of the county of Alameda which was covered by the franchises was annexed to and became a part of the municipal corporation of the city of Oakland in accordance with the annexation statute of 1889. Stats. 1889, p. 358. Following the annexation proceedings and at all times thereafter until the year 1921 all percentages collectible under the franchises were paid to the city of Oakland. Prior to June 30, 1921, the county of Alameda demanded that all payments becoming due under the franchises on June 30, 1921, be paid to the county instead of the city of Oakland. Thereupon the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, the holder of the franchises, commenced this suit in interpleader to determine to whom said payments should be made. The city of Oakland and the county of Alameda joined issue therein, and judgment was rendered in favor of the city of Oakland, from which judgment the county of Alameda prosecutes this appeal.

The appellant insists that, inasmuch as each franchise is a contract which provided for the payment of the percentages to the county as an original contractor, the right to receive such payment is a property right, and that the obligation under the contract cannot be impaired by the Legislature through the annexation proceedings. On the other hand, the respondent argues that the percentage is merely a toll or charge in the nature of a rental exacted as a consideration for the privilege of using the highways, and that the right to collect the percentage lies in the public agency upon which is imposed the burden of supervision and control of the highways. The appellant insists that the annexation of the unincorporated territory to the city of Oakland did not work a transfer of the property of the county in the absence of express legislative declaration. The respondent insists that the legislative intention to do this must be inferred from the general statutes which provide for the supervision and control by the city of the public highways which lie within the territory annexed and the consequent denial of such supervision and control on the part of the county.

Appellant relies upon the rule that, where two political corporations change their boundaries, in the absence of any statute on the subject, the old corporation retains all the property rights and privileges which it had, except as to such property as is physically situated within the territory going to the new corporation. For the purposes of this opinion we need not quarrel with the rule as stated, but there are so many exceptions to it that we cannot see its application here. It is sufficient to say that it is a matter of intention and that, generally, each case must stand upon its own facts as showing the intention of the parties. If, for instance, a county owns and operates a public hospital in territory which is thereafter annexed to a municipal corporation, it would not be reasonable to say that title to the hospital passed to the municipality. It has been said that what property the county holds it holds in trust for the benefit of the state. Reclamation District v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 672, 679, 154 Pac. 845. The state may therefore provide for such disposition of its property as will best suit the public welfare. It becomes necessary, therefore, to determine what, if any, property rights are involved in this proceeding.

[1-5] The case is presented on the theory that the franchises covered the right to operate street car lines "over certain streets within unincorporated territory of the county of Alameda." Strictly speaking, the word "street" relates to a public way within a municipality only. A public way over unincorporated territory of a county is generally referred to as a highway or road. From the transcript it appears that in the franchises the words "public roads," "highways," and "routes" are used. A public road or highway through unincorporated territory is generally a public way dedicated to the public use but not owned as such by the county. Generally speaking, the same applies to a public street within a municipality. The exceptions in both instances are where highways or streets are obtained in fee by the county or the city through public or private grant. In most cases the fee to the land rests in the adjoining property owner and the public holds an easement for the use. Where an easement only is acquired, the right lies in the people of the state, and the county or the city is merely the agent or trustee of the state committed to the duty of maintaining the highway for the use of the public. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, we may assume, in support of the judgment, that these franchises covered the right to use public highways in which the county did not own the fee, but which were dedicated to public use in the ordinary and usual way.

[6] Thus, in so far as it concerns the public highways over which the franchises were granted, the county had no property to lose, and these highways became public streets of the city of Oakland upon the annexation of the territory where they were located, at least when so declared to be by the city authorities. In any event, the entire jurisdiction and control over such highways for the benefit of the state was thenceforth imposed in the city, and all jurisdiction of the county in respect thereto ceased with the annexation.

[7] The right which the grantee of a street railroad franchise obtains is more than the mere right to operate a railroad. As said by Mr. Justice Shaw in San Francisco, etc., Ry. Co. v. Scott, 142 Cal. 222, 228, 75 Pac. 575, 581:

> "The right which a street railroad obtains from the city to lay its track and operate its road on a street, on the contrary, is the most valuable part of its franchise. It carries the obligation to serve the public in the use of the street, and is in furtherance of the original use."

The state has been zealous to insure that this obligation to serve the public in the use of the street shall be protected and enforced by the public agency having control over the streets. All these franchises were conditioned upon this power of supervision and control, and, as the highways covered by these franchises are the property of the state, the state is interested in enforcing the obligations of service to the public under the franchises.

[8, 9] The gross percentage charge exacted under the franchises is in the nature of a toll or rental for the use of the streets covered by the franchises. In Tulare County v. City of Dinuba, 188 Cal. 664, 670, 206 Pac. 983, 985, the Supreme Court say:

> "The gross receipt charge under the Broughton Act is neither a tax nor a license, but is obviously a toll or charge, which the holder of the franchise undertakes to pay as part of the consideration, for the privilege of using the avenues and highways occupied by the public utility."

Primarily this charge would go to the state as the owner of the highway. But the state has chosen to award it to the public agency upon which is imposed the burden of enforcing the obligations under the franchise.

The act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 358) provides that when the annexation is complete the annexed territory shall be "to all intents and purposes a part of such municipal corporation." This language is broad enough to support the conclusion that the supervision and control of all public highways within the annexed territory passes from the county to the municipality. As the percentage upon the gross receipts collected under the franchises is a fee for the supervision and control of the street railroads operating on the public streets, it is reasonable to assume that the state intended that this percentage should be paid to its new agency.

[10] The question of the impairment of the obligation of a contract is not involved. The franchises were all granted after the enactment of the annexation statute and must be deemed to have been made in contemplation of its terms. The state, through the annexation statute, has transferred the supervision and control of the streets from the county to the city. This transfer carries with it the right to collect charges for the use of the streets. An assignment of the rights of the grantor has thus been effected by operation of law. This result is wholly consistent with the annexation statute in contemplation of which the contracts were executed.

It is also argued that the county has lost whatever claim it might assert to the percentages through the acquiescence of its officials in the collection of payments by the city over a period of eleven years. We do not favor the doctrine of acquiescence, or estoppel, as applied to a situation of this kind. There is much respectable authority holding that public officials and public agencies cannot alienate public rights by mere failure to assert such rights in behalf of the public which they represent.

[11] It is also said that the doctrine of departmental construction should be applied and People v. Town of Antioch, 17 Cal. App. 751, 757, 121 Pac. 945, is cited. But, inasmuch as the question before us demands an interpretation of the legislative intention in the enactment of the statute involved, it would be unreasonable to hold that the Legislature is bound by the interpretation placed upon its acts by the officials of one county without, at least, some showing that such interpretation was brought to the notice of the Legislature either directly or indirectly.

We conclude that when the franchises were granted the county was merely acting as the agent of the state; that the gross receipts charge was exacted as a toll for the use of the state's public highways; that when the supervision and control of these highways was transferred to a new state agency, it carried the benefits as well as the burdens, including the right to collect and retain these charges. Accordingly, the county has no enforceable property right growing out of the franchises.

JOSLIN v. SHAFFER et al. (Civ. 2693.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 3, 1924.)

1. Taxation 🔑439—Failure to attach affidavit to assessment book held cured by statute.

St. 1915, p. 23, cured omission of affidavit, required by Pol. Code, § 3732, to be attached by county auditor to assessment book of 1914 to validate tax sale.

2. Taxation 🔑658(2)—Tax sale without notice held not made "at proper time" nor "as prescribed by law."

Sale of unredeemed property under Pol. Code, § 3771, at time of which legal notice was not given to owner, is not made "at a proper time" nor "as prescribed by law," of which tax deed is made prima facie evidence by Pol. Code, § 3786, subd. 5.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Proper Time; First Series, Prescribed by Law.]

3. Taxation 🔑788(5)—Presumption from tax deed of publication of notice of sale not conclusive.

Presumption of publication of notice, if included in presumption, under Pol. Code, § 3786, subd. 5, from tax deed, that property was sold as prescribed by law at proper time and place, is not conclusive.

4. Taxation 🔑788(5)—Not lightly presumed that Legislature intended to make tax deed conclusive evidence of notice to owner.

It is not to be lightly presumed that Legislature intended to make tax deed conclusive evidence, contrary to fact, that owner was given notice of sale.

5. Taxation 🔑814(1)—Title can be quieted against claimant under void tax deed only on condition that owner repay taxes, etc., paid at or on faith of sale.

Title to property can be quieted, as against claimant under void tax deed, only on condition that owner repay taxes, penalties, interest, and costs, paid at sale or afterwards, on faith of it, with legal interest from time of payment, less rents received, if purchaser has been in possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Charles T. Joslin against H. S. Shaffer and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, and H. E. Gleason, of Madera, for appellant.

C. W. Croop, of Merced, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is an action to quiet title to the land described in the complaint. Judgment was entered quieting defendant H. S. Shaffer's title to the land, and the plaintiff has appealed.

Shaffer claims title under a sale of the land for delinquent taxes. "By operation of law and the declaration of the tax collector," the land was sold to the state in the year 1915 for delinquent taxes of the year 1914. The land remaining unredeemed, the tax collector, in the year 1920, pursuant to the provisions of sections 3764 to 3771 of the Political Code, included the land in the delinquent tax list of that year and sold the same to Shaffer, he being the highest bidder therefor. The tax collector thereupon executed a deed to Shaffer.

[1] Appellant contends that the assessment of 1914 is void because of the failure of the county auditor to attach to the assessment book of that year the affidavit required by section 3732 of the Political Code. It has been held that such affidavit is essential to the validity of a sale of property for delinquent taxes. Miller v. County of Kern, 137 Cal. 516, 70 Pac. 549; Moyer v. Wilson, 166 Cal. 261, 135 Pac. 1125; Brady v. Davis, 168 Cal. 259, 142 Pac. 45. The Legislature in 1915, however, passed an act validating all assessments theretofore made which were defective by reason of the omission to attach the affidavit required by section 3732. Stats. 1915, p. 23. Since the Legislature in the first instance might have dispensed with the requirement of such affidavit, no reason appears why the validating act is not effective to cure the defect of its omission.

[2] It is urged that the sale of the land to Shaffer is void because legal notice thereof was not given. In addition to notice by publication, section 3771 provided, at the time of the sale in question, that "when any property is to be sold at public auction as provided in this section, within five days after the first publication of said delinquent list the tax collector shall mail a copy of said list or publication, postage thereon prepaid and registered, to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before such sale, at his last known post office address." Stats. 1919, p. 142. In this case the sale was noticed for June 28, 1920, and publication was made on the 4th, 11th, 18th, and 25th of that month. On the first day of publication the tax collector duly mailed a copy of the delinquent list, postage thereon prepaid and registered, to the person to whom the land was last assessed, at his last-known post office address, which was Los Angeles. The envelope in which the list was mailed was admitted in evidence, and from it and the testimony of the tax collector it appears, without contradiction, that the envelope contained a direction to return the same to the tax collector if not delivered in ten days and that it was mailed back to him on June 17, 1920. Appellant contends that such service by mail was not a compliance with the statute by reason of the return of the notice before the day of the sale.

Section 3771 provides that property upon which taxes have become delinquent "shall, by operation of law and the declaration of the tax collector, be sold to the state." Section 3780 provides:

> "A redemption of the property sold may be made by the owner, or any party in interest, within five years from the date of the sale to the state, or at any time prior to the entry or sale of said land by the state, in the manner provided by section three thousand eight hundred and seventeen."

Sections 3764, 3771 and 3897 provide the procedure by which the owner's right of redemption may be foreclosed. Section 3764 provides that the delinquent tax list shall be so arranged that the publication thereof "shall designate in some particular manner the property contained in said list which was sold to the state five years previous under the provisions of section three thousand seven hundred and seventy-one of this Code" and has not been redeemed. Section 3771 provides that, at the time fixed for the sale of delinquent property, any property contained in the advertised list "which has not been redeemed from the sale made to the state five years previously, shall be sold by the tax collector at public auction to the highest bidder for cash. * * * After such bid has been made and accepted the right of redemption shall cease [with exceptions not applicable here]. * * * If no sale is had under the provisions of this paragraph, then said property shall be deeded to the state." If no sale is had and the property is deeded to the state, the delinquent owner's right of redemption continues until the property is sold by the state under the provisions of section 3897. Pol. Code, §§ 3780, 3817; Jordan v. Beale, 172 Cal. 226, 155 Pac. 990. Section 3897 provides for the publication of notice of sale for at least three successive weeks and, in addition thereto, that "it shall be the duty of the tax collector to mail within five days after the publication of said notice of sale a copy of said notice, postage thereon prepaid and registered, to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale, at his last-known post office address." In Smith v. Furlong, 160 Cal. 522, 117 Pac. 527, and Healton v. Morrison, 162 Cal. 668, 124 Pac. 240, it was held that, in a sale by the state under the provisions of section 3897, publication and mailing of notice "were both jurisdictional prerequisites to a valid sale by the state, and that a failure to give the latter notice when the condition existed requiring it, rendered the sale and the deed thereunder void." In the latter case the notice by mail was returned to the tax collector, pursuant to directions on the envelope, prior to the sale, without having been delivered. At page 674 (124 Pac. 242) it is said:

> "In view of the conclusion reached, that notice by mail was not given under the section because it was not sent in time, it is unnecessary to discuss what would be the effect of this procedure by the tax collector when, by reason of the indorsement on the registered letter, it is returned to him many days prior to the date of sale and during which it might have been delivered to the person to whom it is addressed. * * * Certainly there is no warrant whatever for placing a notification thereon calling for such return at any time earlier than the date set for the sale. The party to whom the letter is addressed is entitled to all the advantages for its delivery which the postal system, domestic or foreign, affords, and the tax collector has no right to do anything which may prevent him from having them."

The soundness of the views so expressed is so obvious that further discussion of the matter would be superfluous.

Section 3898 provides that a deed from the state for property sold under the preceding section "shall be prima facie evidence of all the facts recited therein." Respondent contends that the deed here in question is conclusive evidence that legal notice was given of the sale by the tax collector and that therefore, the cases arising under sections 3897 and 3898 are not in point. Relative to a deed executed pursuant to a sale to the state or to an individual under the provisions of section 3771, section 3786 provides:

> "Such deed, duly acknowledged or proved, is primary evidence that: 1. The property was assessed as required by law; 2. The property was equalized as required by law; 3. The taxes were levied in accordance with law; 4. The taxes were not paid; 5. At a proper time and place the property was sold as prescribed by law, and by the proper officer; 6. The property was not redeemed; 7. The person who executed the deed was the proper officer; 8. Where the real estate was sold to pay a poll tax or taxes on personal property, that the real estate belonged to the person liable to pay the tax."

Section 3787 provides:

> "Such deed, duly acknowledged or proved, is (except as against actual fraud) conclusive evidence of the regularity of all other proceedings, from the assessment by the assessor, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed."

In Bernhard v. Wall, 184 Cal. 612, 622, 194 Pac. 1040, 1045, where the notice of sale was first published more than 28 days prior to the day fixed therein for the delinquent sale, it is said that—

> "The publication was not sufficient to authorize the sale and that the deed based thereon was void. Section 3787, which makes the tax deed 'conclusive evidence of the regularity of all other proceedings,' from the assessment down to the deed, does not apply to or cure this defect. Sections 3786 and 3787 must be read and construed together. The phrase 'all other proceedings,' in section 3787, refers back to section 3786, and, therefore, includes only such proceedings as are not included in section 3786. The presumption as to the proceeding which fixes the time for the sale is prescribed by section 3786. It declares that the tax deed is 'primary,' meaning prima facie, evidence of the fact that the property was sold 'at a proper time.' * * * The tax deeds here in question were, therefore, only prima facie evidence that the tax sales on which they were founded were made 'at a proper time.'" A sale made at a time of which legal notice was not given cannot be held to have been made "at a proper time."

By subdivision 5 of section 3786 the tax deed is made prima facie evidence that "the property was sold as prescribed by law." The law specifically prescribes the notice of sale which must be given, and a sale without such notice is certainly not made "as prescribed by law." In Hayes v. Ducasse, 119 Cal. 682, 685, 52 Pac. 121, it is said:

> "Defendants urge further that the deed fails to show that publication was made of the notice of sale required by section 3765 of the Political Code, and that the omission was fatal. * * * Since * * * the deed contains nothing to show that notice was not published, the due publication thereof is included in the presumption (which flows from the presence of the essential recitals in the deed) that at a proper time and place the property was sold as prescribed by law. Pol. Code, secs. 3786, 3787. Whether such presumption is disputable or conclusive is not now material."

[3, 4] If publication of notice is included in the presumption that "at a proper time and place the property was sold as prescribed by law," the exact language of subdivision 5, § 3786, then it necessarily follows that such presumption is one of those enumerated in that section and is not conclusive. It is not lightly to be presumed that the Legislature intended to make a tax deed conclusive evidence, contrary to the fact, that the owner was given notice of his last opportunity to save his property. Whether a provision making a tax deed conclusive evidence that such notice was given would be a denial of due process of law has not been considered, because it clearly appears that the Legislature did not intend to give such deed that effect.

[5] From what has been said it follows that the deed in question is void. Plaintiff's title to the property can be quieted, however, only upon condition that he repay to the purchaser "the taxes, penalties, interest, and costs justly chargeable upon the land and which the purchaser has paid at the sale, or afterwards upon the faith of it, with legal interest from the time of such payment, less rents received, if any, if the purchaser has been in possession." Holland v. Hotchkiss, 162 Cal. 366, 375, 123 Pac. 258, L. R. A. 1915C, 492. The other grounds urged for a reversal are of minor importance, and it is sufficient to say that they are without merit.

66 Cal. App. 53

STATE v. SAN FRANCISCO SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. (Civ. 2676.)

1. Courts 🔑91(1), 97(3)—Validity of escheat statute not open to further consideration.

Since both state and United States Supreme Courts have directly passed on escheat statutes (Code Civ. Proc. § 1273, and St. 1915, p. 1106, § 5) and held them valid, question as to their validity is not open to further discussion in the Court of Appeal.

2. Corporations 🔑54—By-law, effective retrospectively, impairing obligation or right, held unreasonable.

Where, by giving by-law retrospective operation, it destroys or impairs existing obligation or substantive right, it will be held unreasonable or in defiance of existing laws.

3. Banks and banking 🔑303—By-law amendment as to interest on accounts ten years dormant held retrospective.

Amendment to by-laws of savings bank, organized under Civ. Code, providing that if for ten years no money had been deposited or withdrawn no interest should be allowed after 10 years had elapsed since last deposit or withdrawal, held to apply at once, and not 10 years after its adoption, to accounts already dormant, but, as so construed, retrospective in operation.

4. Banks and banking 🔑300—Bank unauthorized to change by-laws as to interest without consent of owner of dormant accounts.

Savings bank, organized under Civ. Code, §§ 571–583b, which agreed when accounts were opened that dividends, as declared, would be appropriated and credited to depositor's accounts, cannot, after accounts have remained dormant or inactive for a number of years, and after statutory time for escheat to state, without consent of depositor, so change its by-laws as to disallow interest from date of change; bank being exempted from obligation for interest only when deposits earned no interest or accumulated no dividends.

5. Banks and banking 🔑299—Deposit creates relation of debtor and creditor.

Deposit in savings bank, organized under the Civil Code amounts to a loan of use of money to bank in consideration of payment of fixed interest or such sum as deposit, invested by bank, may earn, and creates relation of debtor and creditor.

6. Banks and banking 🔑300—Savings bank may amend by-laws as to interest on notice to depositors.

A savings bank may, on notice to depositors, so amend its by-laws as to reduce rate of interest on deposits or to refuse to continue deposits.

7. Banks and banking 🔑300—Limitation on bank's right to amend by-laws as affecting depositors stated.

By dealing with bank, depositor adopts existing regulations, but, though by-law, at time account is opened, provides for amendment, bank may not so amend by-laws as to materially change the contract without depositor's knowledge.

8. Banks and banking ⚷300—Savings bank cannot terminate or vitiate contract as to unclaimed deposits.

Savings bank, doing bulk of its business on money deposited, could not vitiate or terminate contract with depositors on assumption that depositors, who failed to claim deposits and allowed them to remain inactive for more than 20 years had abandoned accounts and waived rights under contract with bank as to dividends or that notice of change in by-laws disallowing interest on dormant accounts was unnecessary, since, if depositors were dead, right to deposits vested in their heirs, and, in absence of heirs, deposit, under escheat laws, vested in state eventually.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the State against the San Francisco Savings & Loan Society, a corporation (originally sued as the German Savings & Loan Society, a corporation). Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guerena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State.

HART, J. The Attorney General of the state of California instituted this action in behalf of the state in pursuance of the provisions of section 1273 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as the same was amended by the Legislature of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 107), to have 170 different savings deposits in the defendant bank declared escheated to the state.

The notice required by the section named of the commencement of the action was duly given to the defendants, and the notice to claimants, required to be given by the county clerk by the Bank Act, as amended by the Legislature of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1106), was also given as so prescribed. The state was awarded judgment declaring each of the deposits as escheated to it, and particularly from said judgment and particularly so much thereof as awards interest on each of the accounts from the date of the adoption of a certain amendment to the by-laws of the appellant (to be hereinafter considered) to the time of the rendition of judgment the defendant bank appeals. The case is brought here on the judgment roll alone.

Section 1273 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, among other things, that, where a deposit of money in a bank made by a depositor has, for a period exceeding 20 years, remained in such bank without being added to or drawn on in any amount, and the depositor has failed to claim the same, and neither the depositor nor any other claimant has filed with the bank any notice of his or her present residence, such deposit, with the accrued interest, shall escheat to the state.

Among the findings are the following:

"That it was agreed between the defendant bank and the defendant depositors when their said accounts were opened that dividends, as declared, would be appropriated and credited to the accounts of the said depositors, and it was further agreed between the defendant depositors and the defendant bank that the defendant depositors would be governed by the by-laws of the bank; that the by-laws of the defendant bank at all times provided that they could be amended;

"That on January 26, 1917, the defendant bank added to its by-laws, in the manner prescribed by law for the amendment of its by-laws, a new provision, to wit: 'If for ten years no money has been deposited on an account nor withdrawn therefrom, no interest shall be allowed on such account after ten years have elapsed since the last deposit or withdrawal was made.'"

[1] At the trial the defendant bank opposed the action on the ground that the escheat statutes of this state were unconstitutional and void. Since the trial of this action, however, both the Supreme Court of the state of California and the Supreme Court of the United States have directly passed upon and decided that our legislation with respect to escheats is not invalid for any of the reasons urged here or for any reason at all. See State v. Security Savings Bank, 186 Cal. 419, 199 Pac. 791; State v. Anglo-London, Paris Nat. Bank, 186 Cal. 746, 200 Pac. 612; Security Savings Bank v. State of California, 263 U. S. 282, 44 Sup. Ct. 109, 68 L. Ed. ——. Counsel for the appellant, notwithstanding those decisions, still cling to the position that the escheat statutes of this state sanction the taking of property without due process of law and also deny to the appellant "and certain other citizens and persons within the jurisdiction of said state the equal protection of the laws," and insist that the conclusions reached in the cases cited are erroneous. The cases mentioned set at rest all question as to the constitutionality of our escheat statutes, and it follows that the question of their validity is not now open to further consideration, at least so far as this court is concerned. Indeed, counsel for the appellant do not themselves appear to be serious in pressing the point here. The discussion in their briefs is addressed mainly to the question as to the meaning and the effect of the above-quoted amendment made by the appellant to its by-laws upon the obligation of appellant to pay interest on the savings deposits for the whole period of dormancy on said deposit accounts and to the date that the same were judicially declared escheated to the state.

The amendment in question was, it will be noted, adopted or passed by the board of directors of the appellant on the 26th day of January, 1917, and as to this the general proposition of the appellant is that, after the date of the adoption of the said amendment, the deposit accounts in suit were not, by virtue of the terms of the amendment, to draw or to be credited with interest.

All the deposit accounts concerned in this action had been dormant or inactive for a period far in excess of 20 years prior to the date of the commencement of this action, on the 30th day of July, 1917. It is, in fact, expressly admitted by counsel for the appellant that the amendment in question was adopted long after the accounts herein involved became subject to transfer to the state treasury under the escheat laws.

[2] Much of the controversy in the briefs revolves around the proposition as to whether the amendment in question was or is, as to the accounts in suit, retroactive or prospective in its operation. This controversy arises upon the facts disclosed here by the findings considered in the light of the well-settled rule that where the language of a by-law of a corporation is such that, by giving it retrospective operation, it would have the effect of destroying or impairing an existing obligation or a substantive right, it will be held to be unreasonable or in defiance of existing laws. See 6 Cal. Jur. p. 717.

[3] The appellant contends that the amendment is prospective in that it applies, not to the accounts as they existed prior to the date of the passage of the amendment, but to the accounts as they existed from and subsequent to said date. The state maintains that the amendment is susceptible only to the construction that it is not to have operative effect until the lapse of 10 years from the date of its adoption.

We do not agree with the Attorney General's construction of the amendment. For its purposes, the amendment divides the dormancy of the accounts into two different periods of time of 10 years each, and, paraphrased in simple language, plainly means this: That interest will be allowed on the accounts for each of the 10 years of their dormancy, but, from and after the expiration of such 10 years of inactivity, interest will not be allowed thereon. If the amendment were valid or enforceable according to its plainly expressed terms, the fact that the bank does not claim or pretend to be authorized by virtue thereof to exercise the right to disallow interest for any period prior to the adoption of the amendment would not, it is obvious, change or alter the retrospective effect of the amendment. The appellant evidently recognized the construction which we ascribe to the amendment in undertaking to exercise what it conceived to be its right under the amendment by confining the exercise of such right to a period beginning with and subsequent to the date of the adoption of the amendment, claiming, as we have shown, that, since the right to disallow interest on the account is so limited or confined, the amendment is made to operate in the future or prospectively.

[4] But, in our opinion, even as construed by the appellant, the amendment, in its terms, is still retrospective in its operation, for it would, in such case, as it would in any view of it, not only operate upon agreements made prior to its adoption, but would by such operation so affect said agreements as to destroy one of the vital rights established thereby when made. Thus we are brought to the consideration of the pivotal point of this appeal, to wit, whether a savings bank, subsequent to its acceptance of savings deposits, upon an agreement to pay the depositors the interest or dividends thereon, may, after such accounts have remained dormant or inactive for a number of years, or, as in this case, after the statutory time has run when the state may proceed to have the same transferred to the state treasury, and without the consent of the depositors, so change its by-laws as to authorize it to disallow interest on such accounts from the date of such change. It is, of course, the contention of the appellant that this may be done. The real basic proposition of the argument in support of that position is that, as the court found, the by-laws of the appellant, at the time the deposits in suit were made contained a provision that "the by-laws of the defendant bank at all times provided that they could be amended"; that when the deposits were made it was agreed by and between the defendant depositors and the defendant bank that the former would be governed by the laws of the latter; that, therefore, the by-laws, as so providing at the time the deposits were made, essentially became a part of and entered as an element into the agreement whereby the deposits were made by the depositors and accepted by the bank, and that the depositors thus agreed that an amendment of the by-laws might be made at any time by the bank without actual notice of the amendment or the intention to make it to the depositors. We cannot assent to this proposition in its entirety.

[5] The appellant is a savings bank, and, ever since October, 1885, has existed and carried on business as such under the provisions of the Civil Code of the state of California of 1872 and amendments thereto. Civ. Code, §§ 571–583b. Under the provisions of the Civil Code under which it was organized and is operating, it has a capital stock, and the depositors, unlike the original conception of savings banks where the depositors shared proportionally in profits and losses, and where the managers of the funds were but the trustees and agents of the members, when making and maintaining deposits therein, sustain the relation of creditors to the bank. In other words, the legal relation created between said bank and its depositors is, as to the deposits made by the latter, that of debtor and creditor. Where moneys are deposited in the savings account of a savings bank so organized the transaction amounts to an agreement between the depositors and the bank, whereby the former loaned the use of their moneys to the latter upon a consideration that, for such use, the bank will compensate the depositors either by the payment of a fixed rate of interest or such sums as the moneys so deposited and as invested by the bank may earn. These payments are sometimes called interest and sometimes dividends, although the latter term is more applicable to those savings banks where the depositors share proportionally in the earnings of the bank. As seen, the court in this case found that—

> "It was agreed between the defendant bank and the defendant depositors when their said accounts were opened that dividends, as declared, would be appropriated and credited to the accounts of the said depositors."

We are at a loss to understand how the bank can avoid the effect of that agreement. There is nothing in the agreement as found which provides that "the dividends, as declared, would be appropriated and credited to the accounts" for a limited period only. Nor is there any language in the agreement itself which gives, or may be so construed as giving, the bank authority to limit the period during which interest may be allowed on the accounts, while they are still maintained, to a specified time, or, in other words, that, after a certain time, the bank may discontinue the payment of interest, although still holding and using the deposits. The agreement, it seems perfectly clear, can mean but one thing, so far as the rights of the depositors are concerned, to wit: That so long as the accounts exist and remain in the bank, whether they become dormant or remain active or live accounts, the bank is obligated to credit such accounts with such dividends or interest as may be declared. There is but one contingency which can happen under the agreement, as found by the court, which could operate to exempt the appellant from the performance of the obligation of allowing interest or dividends on the accounts for the whole period of their existence as assets of the bank and that would arise when, perchance, the deposits had earned no interest or the bank had accumulated no dividends which could be declared.

[6, 7] The right of a bank to amend its by-laws, and, upon sufficient notice to its depositors, so to amend them as to reduce the rate of interest on deposits or to refuse to continue the deposits, cannot be questioned. Nor will it be doubted that, by dealing with the bank, every depositor adopts its regulations which are in existence at the time, and it may be conceded to be true that where, as here, the by-laws of a bank at the time an account is opened therein by a depositor contain a provision authorizing their amendment the bank may, under such authorization and without notice to such depositor, amend the by-laws so as to bind the latter, in so far as such amendment may affect only those general rules and regulations, common to all banking and other corporations, which relate to the general administrative policies thereof. But "the fact that a by-law of which a depositor has notice authorizes the amendment of the by-law does not operate to change the depositor's contract where a material amendment to the by-law is made, without notice to him, and without his consent." 3 R. C. L. § 339. In other words, a provision in such by-laws authorizing an amendment thereof cannot give power to the bank to amend by-laws so as to change materially the contract of the depositor without his knowledge. 2 Morse on Banks and Banking (4th Ed.) p. 620, and cases therein cited. And this proposition holds good even in the face of the established rule that the by-laws of a bank existing at the time an account is opened therein enter into and become a part of the contract whereby the deposit is made by the depositor and accepted by the bank. The rule seems to be uniform that where a person opens a deposit account with a bank the depositor is to be thereafter governed and bound by the by-laws existing at the time the account is opened, and that all deposits made after the opening of the account are deemed to be made under the original contract. Of course, the latter rule is subject to this qualification: That if, upon notice to the depositor, the by-laws are so amended as to change materially the original contract, such deposits as are made subsequent to the amendment will be held to be made under the contract as so changed.

could be deemed to have canceled the contract." Without attempting to reply to the points in the order in which thus they are stated, we make these general observations as a complete answer thereto: A savings bank, such as is the appellant, does the bulk of its business on borrowed capital; that is, on the moneys deposited therein by the depositors. Its business is, therefore, to seek such deposits. Indeed, without such deposits it could not survive as a savings bank. And certainly it could not be said to be inequitable, assuming that such a consideration could influence the determination of this appeal, if, as may well be assumed to be true, the bank has used the moneys in the accounts involved herein. As to the suggestion that the failure of the depositors to claim their accounts or to allow them to remain inactive for over 20 years is to be deemed an abandonment thereof, as well as a waiver of their rights under their contract with the bank, the ready reply is that such contracts cannot be terminated or their validity vitiated in any such way. The policy of the state is that there shall be an ownership of all property in some one. If the depositors are dead and they died intestate, the contract, with all its rights, vest in their heirs, or if they have died testate and have thus disposed of their accounts, either specifically or in general language, then the accounts belong to those named in the will as such beneficiaries. If there be neither heirs nor a will, then, under the law, the property must, after the prescribed time during which they have remained dormant, be transferred to the state treasury under the provisions of our escheat laws. The claim that there is no necessity for giving notice to the depositors of the adoption of the amendment in question because their whereabouts are unknown, making it impossible to give such notice is not only answered hereinabove, but by the further consideration that when the bank accepted the deposits it did so with full knowledge of the fact that one of the contingent incidents of such a transaction was that the accounts might become dormant and remain unclaimed for a sufficient period of time to justify the state, under our statutes of escheat, to institute suit for the transfer of the moneys therein into the treasury of the state.

We do not intend to review in detail herein the cases cited by the appellant as supporting its position. None of them is directly in point, and, indeed, we have not been able to find any case precisely like the one here. All the cases cited by the appellant involve amendments to the by-laws of mutual benefit or fraternal societies which pay sick and other benefits to its members. The amendments dealt with in those cases changed the amount of benefits to be paid, or limited the period during which those members coming within the terms of the sick benefit provisions should receive weekly or monthly benefit payments. The cases are not unlike in principle those cases dealing with savings banks in which the depositors themselves are the bank and the trustees and officers of the bank are the agents of the depositors. In such case the relation of debtor and creditor is not created between banks so organized and conducted and the depositors, who are themselves the owners of the banks. The directors and officers of such banks are the agents or trustees of the depositors, and when a regulation is made by such agents it is the act of the depositors themselves. The same situation exists as to the mutual benefit societies or fraternal organizations awarding sick or death benefits to the members. The relation of debtor and creditor does not exist between such society itself and its members, for the reason that the members themselves constitute the society and the officers thereof are the agents or trustees of the members. When, therefore, such officers or agents or trustees adopt a by-law or regulation within the scope of the powers of the society and their official authority, the adoption of such by-law or regulation involves the act of the members themselves, whose consent thereto is necessarily of the essence of the act. The distinction between a savings bank whose depositors share proportionally the profits thereof and who really are the owners of the bank and a savings bank having a capital stock and of which the shareholders and not the depositors are the owners is clearly pointed out in the case of Ackenhusen v. Peoples Savings Bank, 110 Mich. 175, 68 N. W. 118, 33 L. R. A. 408, 64 Am. St. Rep. 338, a case approved by our Supreme Court in Los Angeles Investment Co. v. Home Savings Bank of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 601, 614, 182 Pac. 293, 5 A. L. R. 1193.

The judgment is affirmed.

PARKER v. PARKER et al. (L. A. 7960.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 23, 1924.)

1. Divorce ⚷247—Provision for payment of alimony not based on consent ends on death of either spouse.

Provisions for payment of alimony, made not upon consent of parties, are founded upon legal obligation which the law imposes on husband to support the wife, and obligation comes to an end on death of either spouse.

2. Divorce ⚷247—Stipulation incorporated in decree held to create annuity to wife for life.

A stipulation in a divorce action that in lieu of a division of property court might order husband to pay to wife $50 per month during remainder of her natural life, which stipulation was incorporated in decree of divorce, held to create an annuity to wife for her natural life, which was not terminated by death of husband.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by Willie O. Parker against Maud D. Parker and another, as executrices of the will and estate of Francis M. Parker, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John B. Nichols, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Tobias R. Archer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In a divorce action pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county in 1912, wherein Francis M. Parker (the decedent herein) was plaintiff and Willie O. Parker (plaintiff and respondent herein) was defendant, it was stipulated in open court at the trial that, "if a decree for divorce should be awarded to either party, the court instead of dividing the property of said parties between them, might provide for the separate maintenance of defendant by awarding to her certain property for life, and that plaintiff pay defendant such monthly allowance and secure the same by a lien upon such property of plaintiff as in the discretion of the court should seem proper." Thereafter a decree was entered therein in favor of Francis M. Parker, plaintiff therein. It was provided in the interlocutory decree and also in the final decree which followed in due course "that said plaintiff pay to said defendant the sum of $50 on the first day of each and every month during the remainder of her natural life, beginning on the 1st day of September, 1912, and to secure the payment of said sum of $50 per month a lien in favor of said defendant is hereby created and declared to exist upon the remainder over and interest of said plaintiff in" certain real property therein described. See Parker v. Parker, 55 Cal. App. 458, 203 Pac. 420.

Said Francis M. Parker died in 1922, and the executrices of his estate refused to continue thereafter the payments of $50 per month as provided in said decree, upon the ground that his liability therefor terminated with his death. Thereupon said Willie O. Parker duly presented her claim against his estate for the payments accrued and unpaid, which was disallowed. She thereupon commenced this action against the defendants as executrices of his estate and recovered judgment in the court below, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

The merits of this appeal depend upon the true interpretation of the effect of the quoted provisions in the decree of divorce. If those provisions are to be regarded in the light of the rules governing the interpretation of contracts there would be no room for a difference of opinion as to their meaning and effect. It is there provided "that said plaintiff pay to said defendant the sum of $50 on the first day of each and every month during the remainder of her natural life." It is apparent that if it had been intended that those payments should continue only during the joint lives of the plaintiff and defendant it would have been very easy and simple so to say.

[1, 2] Coming now to the question whether any different meaning and effect can be or should be given to the quoted words, we are directed to numerous cases cited in appellant's brief wherein it is held that similar provisions for the support of the wife contained in divorce decrees have been construed by courts of other states as ceasing and determining upon the death of either spouse. If the provision in the decree here under consideration were merely the ordinary provision for the payment of permanent alimony, then we might be constrained to follow those decisions, because provisions for the payment of alimony made not upon the consent of the parties, but usually against the opposition of one of the spouses, are founded upon the legal obligation which the law imposes upon the husband to support the wife, and that obligation comes to an end upon the death of either spouse. So, regardless of the language used by a court in making a provision in its decree for the payment of alimony, that provision ceases to be effective upon the death of either spouse. But here we have a provision based upon an agreement of the parties, in effect a contract. It is not an award of permanent alimony, but an award of a life annuity given in lieu of a division of the property of the spouses. It rests, not upon the obligation which the law imposes upon a husband to support his wife, but upon the contract of the parties thereto.

It is true that the trial court in its decree attempted to reserve to itself the power to modify these provisions from time to time. It is not necessary for us to determine here whether that attempted reservation was or was not effective, because in so far as the provision we are now considering is concerned the trial court never attempted to modify it. So, regardless of the question whether the attempted reservation was effective, these provisions have remained the same, unmodified by any action or attempted action of the trial court. We are convinced that the true interpretation and effect of these provisions are to create an annuity of $50 per month to the wife for the period of her natural life, and that therefore there is no merit in this appeal.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary for us to determine whether or not anything which was decided or said in the opinion upon the appeal in Parker v. Parker, supra, is to be regarded as the law of the case upon this appeal.

PEOPLE v. FRANK. (Cr. 2643.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1043(1)—Objection held sufficient to raise question of accessibility of witnesses whose testimony at preliminary examination read.

An objection to reading of depositions, made at preliminary examination, that there was no showing as to genuineness of letters, purporting to be written by witnesses, which established their presence outside state, held sufficient to raise point on appeal that there was no showing that witnesses were not within state, or that diligent search or inquiry had been made for them.

2. Criminal law 🔑543(2)—Evidence held insufficient to show absence from state of witnesses whose testimony at preliminary examination read.

Letters and telegrams, purporting to be in reply to request from district attorney for their presence, were insufficient to show their presence outside state, so that their depositions taken at preliminary examination might be read, in absence of evidence that any communication was sent to witnesses by district attorney.

3. Criminal law 🔑543(2)—Matters not considered on question of absence from state of witnesses whose testimony at preliminary examination read.

Where no proper foundation was laid for admission of depositions taken at preliminary examination, their contents could not be considered to lay foundation for their own admission by establishing that witnesses were outside state.

4. Criminal law 🔑1163(3)—Conviction based on incompetent evidence, admitted over objection, reversed.

Appellate court must conclude that a conviction based on incompetent evidence, admitted over objection of defendant, sufficient to preserve his exceptions thereto, involves a miscarriage of justice.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted upon each of two counts of an information, which in the first count charged him with the commission of the crime of burglary with intent to commit larceny, and in the second count charged him with the crime of robbery. The court received in evidence the testimony, given in January, 1923, at the preliminary examination, by Edwin A. MacPherson and his wife, Ellen MacPherson, to the effect that in their room in the Ambassador Hotel, in the city of Los Angeles, at the time stated in the information, the defendant, in their presence, committed the acts constituting the alleged crimes. Without this evidence it is reasonably certain that the defendant could not have been convicted; with it his guilt is established "beyond a reasonable doubt." He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The principal point relied upon in support of the appeal is that the court erred in permitting the depositions of said witnesses to be read in evidence. Counsel for defendant, in stating his objection that no proper foundation was laid for admission of said depositions, insisted that there was nothing before the court tending to show—

> "that the party therein mentioned is not in the county of Los Angeles or in the state of California; there is nothing there indicating that any diligent search or inquiry has been made for either one of those parties in the state."

The information was filed on the 9th day of February, 1923. The case was first set down to be tried on the 5th day of April, at which date, at request of defendant, the trial was continued to April 23. On April 23 the trial was continued to June 7, and at that time the case was tried. In order to lay a foundation for the introduction of said depositions in evidence, the district attorney first exhibited to the court and opposing counsel, along with the questions which had been propounded to Mr. MacPherson and the answers thereto, three documents, all "for the purpose of reading his testimony—both he and his wife." The documents consisted of a telegram, dated April 4, 1923, from Denver, Colo., directed to the district attorney, and which he stated that he had received, and purporting to be signed by said Edwin A. MacPherson; a letter dated April 5, 1923, purporting to be signed by the district attorney and addressed to said MacPherson at Fort Worth, Tex.; and a letter dated May 3, 1923, Denver, Colo., purporting to be signed by said MacPherson.

The telegram of April 4, purported to be in reply to a message of the district attorney to Fort Worth, "re Mrs. MacPherson and me being Los Angeles on April 5th," in relation to this case, referred to the fact that they had gone to Los Angeles in January solely to give evidence in this case, and regretted that it would be impossible for them to return on April 5. The letter of April 5 informed MacPherson that the trial of Williamson (the name first given by defendant at the time of his arrest, and therefore the name under which the prosecution originally was commenced) had been continued until April 24, and urged that MacPherson and his wife be present for the trial at that time. The letter of May 3 purported to be in reply to a letter of April 27 from the district attorney, and referred to "your request for Mrs. MacPherson's and my presence in Los Angeles on June 16th." The letter then stated that MacPherson was then constructing "a long line in the states of Wyoming and Nebraska," which would occupy all of his time until the early part of the year 1924, and that it would therefore "not be possible for me or for Mrs. MacPherson to appear against this defendant within that time." In this letter he referred again to the fact that he had given testimony in the case the preceding January.

Counsel for defendant, in arguing his objections in the trial court to the letters and telegram, did not object to the district attorney's statement that the copy of the letter of April 5 was a copy of a letter which he had written to Mr. MacPherson, or that he had received the other letter and the telegram; neither did counsel for defendant stipulate thereto. The emphasis of the objection, as made by defendant's counsel, was laid upon the proposition that:

> "There is nothing before the court going to show that the party whom they desire to call sent that letter; there is nothing going to show that this is the letter coming from him, unless we indulge in the presumption or guess that that is the letter from him."

[1-4] The two objections herein quoted were sufficient in form and substance to raise the point relied upon by the defendant upon this appeal. The letters and telegram were inadmissible for any purpose over the objection of the defendant until the foundation had been laid by some competent evidence of their genuineness. We cannot see that their genuineness was sufficiently established by the internal evidence contained in them, for the reason that there is no competent evidence that they were in reply to any communication from the district attorney. There is no competent evidence that any communication was sent to these witnesses by the district attorney. If he had asked for a stipulation from defendant's counsel to the truth of the statements made by him in court, it may be that such stipulation would have been given. If it had been refused, it would then have been incumbent upon the district attorney to be sworn and testify under oath to the truth of those statements. This not having been done, and the defendant having reserved his exception by a sufficient objection, the letters and telegram were inadmissible.

Disregarding the letters and telegram and the statement of the district attorney, there remains in the case no foundation for the admission in evidence of the depositions of these two witnesses. It is true that, if we examine the deposition of Edwin MacPherson, we find that at said preliminary examination in January he stated that his occupation was "construction"; that he resided at Fort Worth, Tex.; that he had come here for the purpose of testifying at this time; and that he expected to return to Texas. Mrs. MacPherson in her deposition stated that she resided at Fort Worth, Tex., and expected to leave Los Angeles shortly for that place. But, no proper foundation having been laid for the admission in evidence of these depositions, their contents could not be considered for any purpose, not even for the purpose of laying the foundation for their own admission. We are of the opinion that this case comes within the rule of People v. Plyler, 126 Cal. 379, 58 Pac. 904, and that the trial court erred in the admission of these depositions in evidence. When it clearly appears that a verdict of conviction is based upon incompetent evidence, which was admitted over the objection of the defendant, sufficient in form and substance to preserve his exception thereto, we must conclude that the judgment resulting therefrom involves a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

In re BOND'S ESTATE.

MASON v. WILBER et al. SAME v. SUPERIOR COURT in and for Los Angeles County et al. (two cases). (L. A. 8095, S. F. 11105, 11115.)

1. Executors and administrators ⟹35(12)—Order of superior court removing administrator held within jurisdiction.

An order of the superior court, revoking letters of administration after hearing in a proceeding to compel the administrator to render his past-due account, held within court's jurisdiction.

2. Executors and administrators ⟹35(19)—Errors in exercise of jurisdiction over administration of an estate by superior court not assailable by writs.

Errors in proceedings for removal of administrator, in exercise of jurisdiction acquired by superior court, cannot be successfully assailed by application for writ of supersedeas, review, or prohibition.

3. Executors and administrators ⟹35(19)—Filing notice of appeal, without bond, insufficient to stay execution of order removing administrator.

Notice of appeal, filed by administrator, from order of removal directing him to turn over assets to another administrator, no appeal bond or undertaking being filed, was insufficient, under Code Civ. Proc. § 943, to stay execution of such order, and application for supersedeas, and prohibition, should be denied.

In Bank.

Applications by William S. Mason, individually and as administrator of the estate of Emma M. Bond, deceased, for writs of supersedeas, certiorari, and prohibition, to prevent the Superior Court of Los Angeles County from proceeding in the matter of removal of administrator, to review an order appointing special administrator, and to prohibit enforcement of an attachment for contempt. Writs denied.

Geo. D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Janeway, Beach & Pratt, of Los Angeles, for respondent Wood.

Oliver O. Clark, of Los Angeles, and Eugene J. Wix and James F. McBryde, both of Glendale, for respondent Wilber.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing three proceedings were heard together by agreement of the parties and upon their submission were decided from the bench, with the understanding that, if deemed advisable, a memorandum opinion would be filed. The original proceeding out of which these three matters arose was that of the estate of Bond, a probate proceeding commenced and still pending in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles. The facts giving rise to these proceedings in the matter of that estate were briefly these. Upon the death of Emma M. Bond, who died intestate, one J. J. Bond was appointed administrator of her estate by said court and duly qualified as such administrator. Subsequently J. J. Bond died, leaving such administration uncompleted. Thereafter W. G. Wilber was duly appointed executor of the will of said J. J. Bond by said court and duly qualified as such. In the Matter of the Estate of Emma M. Bond, William S. Mason was, upon the death of J. J. Bond, appointed administrator of the last-named estate, and duly qualified as such. Thereafter, and during the latter part of the year 1923, said W. G. Wilber filed a petition in the matter of the estate of said Emma M. Bond, alleging that said W. S. Mason, as the administrator of said estate, had failed to render an account as such administrator within the time required by law. Whereupon a citation was issued by said court, requiring the said W. S. Mason, as administrator of said estate, to appear before said court on the 26th day of November, 1923, then and there to show cause why an attachment should not be issued against him to compel the accounting, and why he should not be "discharged" as such administrator. The said W. S. Mason appeared before the said court in response to such petition and citation on the 26th day of November, 1923, and presented his demurrer and answer to said petition, and the said court on said day, over his objection and exception, made an order for his suspension as administrator of said estate and for the holding of his powers as such administrator in abeyance until such time as he should render to said court an account of his receipts and expenditures during his administration, and a full and true report of all proceedings had and taken by him in the course thereof. Thereafter, and on the 17th day of December, 1923, the said Mason presented and filed in said court a verified account of his receipts and expenditures and a report of his proceedings taken in said estate, and also on the 13th day of March, 1924, filed an amended account as said administrator, which included additional funds which had come into his hands as such. Thereupon, a date was fixed by an order of court for a hearing upon said accounts, and the court by its order directed that its previous proceedings with reference to an accounting by said administrator be continued to that date. Thereafter, and on the 14th day of March, 1924, the court made and entered an order in said estate removing said W. S. Mason from his position as administrator of said estate, and revoking his letters of administration, and the court by its same order, but without any previous notice having been given thereof, undertook to appoint the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, a corporation, administrator of the said estate of Emma M. Bond, deceased. The court also, by said order, directed the said W. S. Mason, whose letters of administration had been revoked, to deliver over to said Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles all of the property and assets of said estate. In so directing the delivery over to said corporation of the assets of said estate, the order of the court did not designate that the said Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles was to be delivered said assets in its capacity of such administrator, but merely directed such delivery to it, without indicating in what particular trust capacity the said corporation was to hold and keep such assets. Thereafter and on the 15th day of March, 1924, said W. S. Mason filed a notice of appeal from said order of the previous day, but gave and offered no bond or undertaking upon said appeal. Thereafter, and on the 19th day of March, 1924, the said superior court in which the foregoing proceedings had been pending undertook to make an order modifying its said order of March 14, 1924, by inserting in that portion of said order wherein it had appointed the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles administrator of said estate, the word "special" before the word "administrator" in said order. Thereupon, and on March 26, 1924, the said W. S. Mason commenced the first of the above-entitled proceedings in this court, wherein he prayed for a writ of supersedeas preventing the said superior court from taking any further proceedings during the pendency of said appeal looking to the enforcement of the order or orders appealed from, or in any way modifying the same, and in his prayer to said petition further asked that this court issue an order to show cause why any orders which the said superior court had made purporting to modify the order appealed from should not be declared void. This court issued an order to show cause upon said proceeding, and the same came on for hearing before this court on its recent Los Angeles calendar.

On April 3, 1924, said W. S. Mason presented and filed in this court a petition for a writ of review, which constitutes the second of the above-entitled proceedings, in which the said superior court was made the respondent, and in which the said petitioner assails the order of said court made and entered on the 19th day of March, 1924, by which the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank was attempted to be appointed special administrator of the estate of Emma M. Bond, deceased, upon the ground that said order had been made without the notice required by law, and, was, therefore, in excess of the jurisdiction of said court and void. An order to show cause was issued by this court upon said petition, returnable upon the day fixed for the hearing upon the previous proceeding. Thereafter, and on the 3d day of April, 1924, the said superior court made and entered an order reciting certain of its previous proceedings above referred to, having for their purpose the requiring that said W. S. Mason should render a full, true and correct account of all proceedings taken by him in the course of his administration of said estate, and that W. S. Mason had been removed as administrator of said estate because of his failure to render such an account, and that upon his removal as administrator of said estate he had been required by order of said court to turn over to said Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank all of the property and assets of said estate, and that he had failed and neglected to obey said last-named order, whereupon the court directed an attachment to issue against the said W. S. Mason, and that he appear before said court and be required then and there to show cause why he should not be punished for his failure to obey its aforesaid order, and to deliver to said corporation the property and assets of said estate. Thereafter, and on the 9th day of April, 1924, the said W. S. Mason presented and filed in this court his petition for a writ of prohibition, wherein and whereby he sought to have this court prohibit the enforcement by said superior court of the last-named order, upon the ground that said order was in excess of the jurisdiction of said court for the reason that its previous orders purporting to appoint the said Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank special administrator of said estate was void for the reasons stated in his previous application for a writ of review, and for the further reason that the proceedings of said court in the matter of requiring him to turn over the property and assets of said estate had and taken after his appeal from the order of said court purporting to remove him as such administrator and purporting to direct the delivery over of the property and assets of said estate to said Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles had been stayed by said appeal. This court issued an order to show cause in this matter also, making the same returnable upon the date fixed for the hearing of the two previous proceedings.

[1-3] Upon the hearing and submission of each of said matters at the time fixed therefor, this court was of the opinion, upon the facts and record of the various proceedings in said estate, that the order of the superior court whereby it undertook to revoke the letters of administration of said petitioner was within the jurisdiction of said court acquired, through the inception of the proceedings, to compel the making and filing of an account by said petitioner as the administrator of said estate, and that, this being so, whatever error, if any, was committed by said court in its order removing said administrator, was an error in the exercise of such acquired jurisdiction, and hence could not be successfully assailed in each or any of the foregoing proceedings. This court was further of the opinion that, in so far as the petitioner's application for a writ of supersedeas was concerned, the appeal which the petitioner herein had taken from the order of said court removing him as such administrator and directing him to turn over to the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles the property and assets of said estate was insufficient, under the provisions of section 943 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to stay the execution of said order, and that for that reason the application of the petitioner for a writ of supersedeas should be denied, and that for the same reason the application of the petitioner for a writ of prohibition should also be denied.

In so far as the application of the petitioner herein for a writ of review is concerned, wherein it was sought to have the order of said court appointing the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles special administrator of said estate reviewed and annulled, it was made to appear to said court upon the final day of the hearing upon said petitions that the questions presented upon said application had in effect become moot, and for that reason the parties agreed that the order therein attacked should be annulled, and it was so ordered.

1. Pledges 🔑57—Finding that principal of a note issue was unpaid not inconsistent with other findings.

In an action by trustee of a note issued to recover amount of the notes and to foreclose collateral securing their payment, finding that entire principal of notes was unpaid held not inconsistent with other findings.

2. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Trial court's findings construed to uphold judgment.

The trial court's findings should be construed to uphold rather than to defeat judgment thereon, and wherever, from facts found, other facts may be inferred which will support judgment, such inferences will be deemed to have been made, and appellate court will not draw from these facts any inference contrary to that which may have been drawn by trial court for purpose of rendering such judgment; this rule being especially applicable to an appeal on judgment roll alone.

3. Pledges 🔑30(4)—Judgment ordering execution on, and sale of, collateral security, merely substitutes judgment as collateral.

A judgment giving trustee a first lien on, and ordering execution against, securities pledged as collateral for a note issue did not alter or extinguish their character as collateral security but merely substituted the higher security of the judgment.

4. Estoppel 🔑78(1)—Under trust agreement, debtor held estopped from claiming that enforcement of collection of collateral notes inconsistent with execution sale of collateral.

Under trust agreement, empowering trustee to sell collateral pledged to secure corporate note issue on corporation's default and to proceed at law or equity to protect rights of holders of notes, held that corporation was estopped from objecting that the remedy by enforcement of collection of the collateral notes was inconsistent with remedy of execution sale of the collateral, especially where such judgment inured to the benefit of corporation.

5. Equity 🔑39(1)—Court properly proceeded to complete settlement of matter before it.

Where a court of equity took cognizance of a matter, it could properly proceed to a complete settlement in so far as it could, while keeping within scope of transactions, reflected in proceedings before it.

6. Corporations 🔑479—Trustee to whom debtor pledged note whose payment it guaranteed held to have legal title, entitling trustee to sue maker and guarantor in same action.

Where corporation transferred and pledged certain securities as collateral to a trustee under a trust deed empowering trustee to sell the collateral on default, with right to proceed in law or equity to protect the rights of holders of the notes, and certain note transferred as collateral was guaranteed by corporation, held that such transaction vested an estate in trustee and did not merely give him a lien under Civ. Code, § 2872, and section 2888 did not apply, and trustee was entitled to sue maker and guarantor of such note in same action.

7. Guaranty 🔑1—Nature of stated.

A guaranty of a note is an original independent undertaking to pay the debt if maker does not do so.

8. Judgment 🔑875—Judgment on guaranty of note by pledgor held merely security for payment of principal debt, and satisfaction of principal obligation satisfied judgment.

Though guaranty executed as part of same transaction with a note makes obligation of guarantor commensurate with that of maker, where circumstances showed that guaranty of note, transferred by guarantor as collateral, was intended as collateral for a corporate note issue, to give trustee for note holders full benefit of a lien on the pledged property, a judgment on the guaranty was merely collateral security for payment of the principal debt, and satisfaction of the principal obligation satisfied the judgment on the guaranty.

9. Execution ⚷271—Judgment ⚷846—Rule of caveat emptor applies to sale of judgment.

Though a judgment is property which may be transferred, it is not a negotiable instrument, but is a mere chose in action, and the rule of caveat emptor applies, irrespective of whether it is sold voluntarily by judgment creditor or on execution by the sheriff.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Anglo-California Trust Company and others against the Oakland Railways and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 216 Pac. 578.

Werner Olschewski, of San Francisco, for appellant.

McKinstry, Harber & Firebaugh, Lilienthal, McKinstry, Raymond, Haber & Firebaugh, Garret W. McEnerney, Walter Rothchild, and Cushing & Cushing, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. This is an appeal, on the judgment roll alone, by the Oakland Railways, one of many defendants, in an action brought by the plaintiff, as trustee of a note issue, to recover the amount of the notes and to foreclose the collateral transferred in trust to secure their payment. The findings are comprehensive, and the pertinent facts clearly appear therefrom.

The defendant Oakland Railways was the controlling stockholder of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, which latter corporation was formed by the consolidation of four previously existing railroad corporations. On or about the 12th day of August, 1912, Oakland Railways executed and delivered to the plaintiff, Anglo-California Trust Company of San Francisco, as the trustee thereunder, a certain trust agreement to secure the payment of an issue of 6 per cent. collateral trust notes in an aggregate principal amount of $2,500.000. At the same time, as a part of the transaction, and pursuant to and in accordance with the terms of the trust agreement, the Oakland Railways made and executed 100 notes, by the terms of each of which notes the Oakland Railways, for value received, promised to pay the bearer thereof, at the office of the Anglo-California Trust Company in the city of San Francisco, on the 12th day of June, 1913, the sum of $25,000 in gold coin of the United States of America, with interest thereon from the date of such note until paid at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. These notes were thereafter sold by the Oakland Railways to investors, and at the time of the commencement of this action they were held by various parties.

Contemporaneously with the execution of the trust agreement, and in order to secure the payment of the principal and interest of all of the notes at any time issued and outstanding under its terms, the Oakland Railways "assigned, transferred, mortgaged, and pledged" to and with the plaintiff Anglo-California Trust Company, the following property: (1) 1843 $1,000, 5 per cent. 28-year gold bonds of the Oakland Traction Company, having an aggregate face value of $1,843,000. (2) 1413 $1,000, 5 per cent. 30-year gold bonds of the San Francisco, Oakland & San Jose Consolidated Railway, having an aggregate face value of $1,413,000 (3) A promissory note of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways for the principal sum of $2,500,000, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, dated August 12, 1912, originally payable to Oakland Railways or order, and by it indorsed so as to be payable to bearer. This note was secured by the entire outstanding capital stock of Oakland Terminal Company, less five "qualifying directors' shares," which was pledged to plaintiff to secure its payment. Prior to, or contemporaneously with, its execution and delivery to plaintiff, and as part of the same transaction, the defendant Oakland Railways guaranteed payment of the principal and interest of the note, and waived presentment, demand, protest, and notice. (4) The capital stock of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, class A and class B, preferred, of the par value of $4,811,200, and common stock of the par value of $13,710,000.

The defendant Oakland Railways also transferred to, deposited, and pledged with the plaintiff, as part of the property to be deposited and pledged under the trust agreement, a promissory note, dated March 15, 1912, for the principal sum of $128.184, executed by Oakland Traction Company, payable on demand to the United Properties Company of California or order, and by that corporation duly and legally indorsed so as to be payable to bearer.

A collateral trust agreement was made and executed between the defendants Oakland Terminal Company, Oakland Railways, and San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, and the plaintiff Anglo-California Trust Company, as trustee thereunder, pursuant to which 35 notes of Oakland Terminal Company of the aggregate principal sum of $1,100,000, together with certain interest coupons, were executed and delivered by Oakland Terminal Company to Anglo-California Trust Company as trustee. Concerning this part of the transaction, the trial court found that since the commencement of the action these 35 notes have been paid and discharged, and the lien created by the collateral trust agreement has been extinguished.

It is provided in the trust agreement of August 12, 1912, securing the 100 $25,000 notes, that if any one or more of certain events called "events of default" should happen, "the trustee shall have full power and authority to sell at its option the whole or any part of the collateral pledged hereunder." The trustee in its discretion, however, instead of, or in addition to, exercising the power of sale herein conferred upon it, may proceed by appropriate action or proceedings at law or in equity as the trustee may be advised by counsel, to protect and enforce its rights and the rights of the holders hereby secured and then outstanding. Whenever the notes shall become due and payable by declaration or otherwise, upon the demand or succesive demands of the trustee, Oakland Railways expressly covenants and agrees that it will pay to the trustee for the benefit of the holders of the notes then outstanding the whole amount due and payable at the time of any such demand on all of such notes for principal and interest, with interest upon the overdue principal and installments of interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum; and, in case Oakland Railways shall fail to pay the same forthwith upon such demand, the trustee in its own name and as trustee of an express trust for the holders of the notes shall be entitled to recover judgment against Oakland Railways for the whole amount due and unpaid.

> "VI. Upon the happening of any of the events of default previously mentioned the trustee may take such action by legal proceedings or otherwise for the collection or enforcement of such collateral as to it may seem wise or proper."

No part of the principal sum of the 100 promissory notes issued by defendant Oakland Railways was paid. Neither was any payment made on the principal of the promissory note executed by San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways to the Oakland Railways. In due time plaintiff, as trustee, gave notice of the nonpayment of the notes, and made written demand upon the defendant Oakland Railways for the benefit of the holders of all of the notes then outstanding that it pay the aggregate principal sum of the notes, together with accrued interest. Payment not being made, the holders of a majority of the face amount of the notes requested the Anglo-California Trust Company, as trustee, to declare the principal of the notes to be immediately due and payable, and to make demand for the payment thereof, and to institute this action, all of which acts were done by the plaintiff in the manner and at the times provided by the trust agreement, and subsequent to the making of such requests.

The only defendants to appear in the action were Oakland Railways and the United Properties Company of California. They appeared by an unverified general denial. Defaults of all other defendants served were entered, the action was dismissed as to others, and the cause proceeded to trial. Upon the evidence taken, the court found the foregoing facts. It also found that plaintiff fully complied with and performed all of the terms, conditions, and provisions of the trust agreement of August 12, 1912, on its part to be complied with or performed, prior to or as a condition for the commencement or maintenance of an action or actions to recover the amounts due and unpaid on the notes and to enforce the trust declared in the trust agreement, and to foreclose the pledge evidenced thereby. It found that the interest on the promissory note dated August 12, 1912, executed by San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, was paid from time to time to and including the 12th day of June, 1923, which was the date of its judgment, leaving unpaid on that date only the principal sum of $2,500,000. It also found that no interest upon the 100 notes of $25,000 remained unpaid. Judgment was directed to be entered against the Oakland Railways, maker of the 100 notes, for the aggregate full amount of the principal, $2.500,000, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of the judgment, and that plaintiff have execution against Oakland Railways for the amount of the judgment. The amount of the judgment, together with plaintiff's costs of suit, was declared a first lien upon all of the personal property pledged with Anglo-California Trust Company by Oakland Railways, pursuant to the terms of the trust agreement of August 12, 1912, and heretofore described, and a sale of all of such collateral was ordered.

It was also ordered that plaintiff have judgment against the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways for the principal sum of $2,500,000, with interest at legal rate from judgment, upon the promissory note executed by it to Oakland Railways and by the latter defendant pledged to plaintiff. This judgment was made a first lien upon the 64,995 shares of stock of the Oakland Terminal Company pledged to secure the note, which were ordered sold to satisfy the amount so found due. A further judgment was ordered in favor of the plaintiff and against defendant Oakland Railways for the sum of $2,500,000, upon its guaranty of the last-mentioned note of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, and execution was ordered thereon. Plaintiff was also awarded judgment for $128,814 against San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, due on the note made by Oakland Traction Company, which last corporation, the court found, became a constituent element in the consolidated San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways after it made the note.

Concerning the three last-mentioned items in the judgment, it was, in the conclusions of law, provided:

> "That any judgment obtained in this or any other action by the plaintiff, Anglo-California Trust Company, a corporation, against the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways on account of its said note for two million five hundred thousand dollars ($2,500,000) aforesaid, or the said note for one hundred twenty-eight thousand eight hundred and fourteen dollars ($128,814) above described or against the defendant Oakland Railways on account of its guarantee of the said note for two million five hundred thousand dollars ($2,500,000) are subject to said trust agreement dated August 12, 1912, and the lien and pledge thereby evidenced and may be sold under the judgment to be entered herein, as therein provided."

The judgment in this respect, as in all others, minutely follows the conclusions of law, and permits that these three judgments be sold "as a part of the properties held and pledged to secure the payment of the" $2,500,000 found as the principal due from Oakland Railways upon the 100 notes, and the interest on such sum from judgment.

Two appeals have been taken from the judgment in this case. The first was dismissed on motion on the ground that the attorney who signed the notice of appeal and prepared the transcript was not the attorney of record, and that there had been no substitution of attorneys. Anglo-California Trust Co. v. Oakland Railways (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 578.

Several contentions are advanced by appellant in support of the present appeal. The respondent has suggested that certain points raised by the appellant are now moot questions by reason of the fact that all of the collateral by which the 100 $25,000 notes of the Oakland Railways were secured has been sold by the commissioners appointed by the judgment in this case, and in a judgment rendered the same date in another action between the same parties as those to this action, and in which judgment was rendered in favor of this plaintiff and against San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways for the sum of $2,500,000, with interest, based upon its note for that amount executed to Oakland Railways, and by that corporation in turn pledged to plaintiff as security for the notes which are the basis of the present action. Respondent has not pointed out the particular matters which its claims have become moot, and we are not inclined to pursue that subject any further, for the appeal may be readily disposed of on the points raised by appellant.

[1] One of the contentions of the appellant is, in effect, that the findings of the trial court do not support the judgment. It contends that upon the facts found the court below could not award a judgment for $2,500,000 in favor of plaintiff and against Oakland Railways upon the 100 $25,000 notes because, under the findings, Oakland Railways is entitled to a credit upon those notes in the sum of $1,500,000, the amount of the interest paid by San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways upon its $2,500,000 note to the Oakland Railways, from the date of the default of the latter corporation upon its 100 $25,000 notes, June 12, 1913, to June 12, 1923, at the rate of $150,000 per year for 10 years, the court having found that all of the interest on the 100 $25,000 notes had been paid from the date of said notes to the date of the entry of judgment. This contention amounts to the assertion that the plaintiff had in its hands, applicable to the payment of the 100 $25,000 notes, $1,500,000 in cash, which it ought to have applied against those notes, leaving unpaid but $1,000,000, for which amount the judgment should have been entered. No such defense was pleaded. No evidence has been brought here in support of any such claim, and there is no finding which warrants the drawing of any inference to support appellant's contention. The finding that the entire principal sum of the 100 promissory notes is unpaid is not overthrown by, and is not inconsistent with, any other finding. It is directly responsive to the issue raised by the allegation of the complaint and the general denial of the two answering defendants, and which appears to have been regarded by all the parties in court as sufficient to put them on proof as to the fact of the payment or nonpayment of the notes and the amount due thereon.

[2] Appellant asserts that it is not attempting to overthrow the finding that the entire principal sum of the $2,500,000 of the Oakland Railways' notes is unpaid, but argues that inferences which must be drawn from the findings made do not permit such an assumption. No good purpose will be served by attempting here to follow the appellant in its contentions as to the inferences it argues should be drawn. Findings of the trial court are to receive such a construction as will uphold rather than defeat its judgment thereon, and whenever, from the facts found by it, other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by the trial court, and upon an appeal from the judgment this court will not draw from those facts any inference of fact contrary to that which may have been drawn by the trial court for the purpose of rendering such judgment. Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 72, 77, 31 Pac. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257. The rule has especial application where, as in this case, the appeal is upon the judgment roll alone. Cutting Packing Co. v. Canty, 141 Cal. 692, 695, 75 Pac. 564.

[3] Another contention of the appellant is that plaintiff cannot recover judgment against the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, maker of the $2,500,000 collateral note, and, at the same time, procure a sale of the collateral. Its theory is that the remedy for the enforcement of the collection of the pledged note is inconsistent with the remedy of sale thereof. The defense of "inconsistent remedies" was not pleaded by the appellant, and appears to be raised for the first time on this appeal. This contention is embodied in an attack upon that part of the judgment which authorizes the sale of the judgments obtained and entered in this action on the two promissory notes for $2,500,000 and $128,814. Appellant denies the power of the court to order a sale of the judgments on the collateral notes as part of the property pledged to secure its primary obligation. It says:

> "The notes could not be collected and then sold, nor sold and then collected, by the trustee. The remedies being inconsistent, the trustee, when filing the action on the pledged notes and obtaining judgment thereon, was concluded from proceeding under the power of sale. It could not stop short with one remedy, that of collection, and make use of the other remedy, that of sale, and sell the judgment. It could only proceed and exhaust its choice of remedy."

[4, 5] There appear to be several reasons why the appellant may not be heard to complain in this manner. In the first place, the defendant against whom this part of the judgment was rendered has not appealed. In the next place, appellant was not aggrieved by the action of the court, but, on the contrary, was actually benefited thereby. The rendition of the judgment on the notes in question did not alter or extinguish their character as collateral security. The judgments were as much collateral as the notes were before judgment was rendered. Lynch v. Burt, 132 Fed. 417, 428, 67 C. C. A. 305. They are the same security in another and higher form. 1 Freeman on Judgments, par. 229; Jones on Pledges and Collateral Security (2d Ed.) par. 591. Only the form and not the substance was changed, and that was done, we may assume, primarily to prevent the interposition of the bar of the statute of limitations. The action of the court in this regard benefited the appellant. If, for any reason, the value of the notes as collateral for the payment of its own obligations had become lost, its direct burden of payment would have become so much greater. As it was, their character as collateral was preserved by merger into the judgment. Again, if we should assume that respondent had pursued inconsistent remedies in the particular complained of, appellant is estopped by its contract from raising the question. By the terms of the trust agreement of August 12, 1912, as already pointed out, it was provided that the plaintiff was empowered to sell the collateral pledged by the appellant upon the happening of any of the events of default, and might proceed by appropriate action or proceedings at law or equity to protect and enforce its rights and the rights of the holders of the notes of appellant. It was also provided that the remedies conferred upon, or reserved by the terms of the trust agreement to plaintiff as trustee, or the holders of the notes, were not intended to be exclusive of any other remedy, but should be cumulative and in addition to every other remedy given thereunder. It would be hard to conceive how broader powers could have been conferred upon plaintiff in the matter of taking whatever steps it might deem necessary or proper, on default of the appellant being established, even to the pursuit of inconsistent remedies. For these reasons we deem it unnecessary to pursue further the discussion as to whether or not the action of the court did involve a situation where inconsistent remedies were pursued. The trial court very properly regarded the judgments against the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways as but a continuation, in different form, of the two collateral notes which were the foundation of the judgments. So regarded, it ordered them sold "as part of the properties held and pledged to secure the payment of the amounts found due" by the judgment against appellant on the 100 notes for $25,000 each executed by it and secured by the trust agreement of August 12, 1912. Its action thus enured to the benefit and avantage of the appellant. It was proper for the court, sitting in equity and having taken cognizance of the entire matter, to proceed to a complete settlement of the affairs of the parties to the litigation, in so far as it could, while keeping within the scope of the transactions reflected in the proceedings before it.

[6] Appellant makes the further contention that under no conditions could the Anglo-California Trust Company, as a mere pledgee of the $2,500,000 note of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, sue it (the Oakland Railways) payee of such note, upon its guaranty of payment of a collateral obligation, but was confined to its remedy against the maker. It relies upon Sparks v. Caldwell, 157 Cal. 401, 108 Pac. 276. It was held in that case that the holder of a promissory note, executed by one who as payee of the note of a third person expressly guaranteed payment of such second note, and transferred it to his creditor as collateral security for the payment of the principal obligation, was confined to his remedy against the maker of the collateral note, and could not maintain an action against the pledgor upon the express guaranty. Respondent, on the other hand, contends that Sparks v. Caldwell was overruled by the later decision of this court in Cooke v. Mesmer, 164 Cal. 332, 128 Pac. 917. In that case a recovery was had against guarantors, who were the payees, of certain notes executed and payable to the defendants, which had been deposited as security by the payees for money loaned to still other parties. The judgment was affirmed on appeal, and the court said (164 Cal. 340, 128 Pac. 920):

> "It is thoroughly settled that an action on such a guaranty is one upon an independent contract of the guarantor, with which the principal debtor has nothing to do."

Neither of these cases is in exact point with the case at bar. In Sparks v. Caldwell, the one question presented was whether or not a pledgee could sue a pledgor as guarantor of a collateral security in the nature of a negotiable instrument, and the court said he could not for the reason that, "as between the pledgor and pledgee, the general property in a pledge remains in the pledgor" (citing Civ. Code, § 2888), and the transfer of the pledged note did not transfer the title any farther than to entitle the pledgee to collect the note from the maker. In Cooke v. Mesmer the guaranty sued on was an "independent contract" made to secure the payment of money loaned to third parties on the strength of such guaranty. We are not concerned, for the purpose of this case, in determining whether or not Sparks v. Caldwell has been overruled by the decision relied on by respondent, for there are features, both in relation to the law and the facts, which distinguish the instant case from both of the foregoing decisions. Section 2888 of the Civil Code, on the authority of which Sparks v. Caldwell, supra, was decided, provides that—

> "Notwithstanding an agreement to the contrary, a lien, or a contract for a lien, transfers no title to the property subject to the lien."

The court held in that case, therefore, that the title to the note was the all-significant matter and that, as the title remained in the pledgors, the pledgee was clothed only with the power, as their agent, to collect the amount due from the maker of the note, and to apply such sum to the payment of his debt. 157 Cal. 405, 108 Pac. 276. A different situation is presented here. The instant case is one in which there was an actual assignment, transfer, mortgage, and pledge to and with the respondent as trustee "upon the trusts and subject to the terms and conditions" expressed in the trust agreement of August 12, 1912. Section 2872 of the Civil Code declares:

> "A lien is a charge imposed in some mode other than by a transfer in trust upon specific property by which it is made security for the performance of an act."

The entire estate and interest of the appellant in the property subject to the trust agreement was vested as an estate, and not as a lien, in the respondent as trustee (Weber v. McCleverty, 149 Cal. 316, 322, 86 Pac. 706) and the trustee cannot be held to have had only a mere lien on the property (Hollywood Lumber Co. v. Love, 155 Cal. 270, 273, 100 Pac. 698).

Consequently the note of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, having been conveyed to respondent as collateral, and the legal title to the paper having been transferred to respondent, we see no reason why, under the very broad power conferred upon it by the trust agreement, it should not be allowed to maintain the action against the maker, and also against this appellant as guarantor in the same action. That would seem to be a very reasonable thing to do in this particular action, wherein, it is evident, the court endeavored to dispose of the whole subject-matter of the controversy at one time —not piecemeal—a practice worthy of emulation. Cramer v. Tittle, 79 Cal. 332, 335, 21 Pac. 750. In answer to the further contention that the judgment on the guaranty is not supported by any allegation in the complaint, or anything that appears on the face of the record, it may be said that the proceeding adopted by the court was wholly consonant with the principle that where equity has acquired jurisdiction for one purpose, it will retain that jurisdiction to the final adjustment of all differences between the parties arising from the cause of action presented. It is, indeed, its duty, when the parties to the controversy are before it, to adjust the rights of all and leave nothing open to further litigation. Swan v. Talbot, 152 Cal. 142, 147, 94 Pac. 238, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1066.

[7, 8] Finally appellant urges upon our consideration the contention that if the judgment obtained against it on the guaranty of the note of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways is permitted to stand, the result will be "that by reason of its principal obligation of $2,500,000, the Oakland Railways now has judgments against it of $5,000,000." This contention rests upon the assumption that appellant is primarily liable to respondent in the sum of $2,500,000 on the judgment against it for the amount of its note issue, and in an equal amount on its guaranty of the collateral note. For legal support of its contention, appellant looks to the proposition of law that in ordinary acceptance of the term "collateral security" implies the transfer to the creditor of an interest in some property, or lien on property, or obligation, which furnishes a security in addition to the responsibility of the debtor (11 Cor. Jur. p. 961), and that therefore an additional promise of a debtor to pay money cannot, from the very nature of the case, be treated as collateral security for his own debt. Dibert v. D'Arcy, 248 Mo. 617, 643, 154

S. W. 1116; In re Waddell-Entz Co., 67 Conn. 324, 334, 335, 35 Atl. 257. This rule seems to apply, however, only when the undertaking is considered solely in the light of a mere additional promise of the maker of the notes to pay money. The nature of the obligation changes with attending circumstances. The two cases just noted, and which are so strongly relied on by appellant, hold that, should the debtor secure his second note, or contract, by a mortgage upon property, the note and mortgage may be treated as collateral to the principal indebtedness so far as is necessary to give the creditor in the first note the benefit, with respect to his indebtedness, of the lien upon the mortgaged property normally created as security for the collateral note. Dibert v. D'Arcy, supra; In re Waddell-Entz Co., supra.

It has become necessary, therefore, to determine just what was the nature of the transaction in the present case. Considered aside from the circumstances under which it was made, appellant's guaranty was an original, independent undertaking to pay the debt of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, in the event the maker of the note did not pay it. Cooke v. Mesmer, supra. So regarded, the note and the guaranty must be construed to be but one instrument, constituting a single contract, upon which the liability of the guarantor, to the extent of its obligation, was commensurate with that of the maker of the note. Reios v. Mardis, 18 Cal. App. 276, 281, 122 Pac. 1091; Bagley v. Cohen, 121 Cal. 604, 606, 53 Pac. 1117. But the findings of the trial court, the sufficiency of which are not here attacked, indicate very clearly that the guaranty was but one step of the entire transaction, which resulted in the trustee being given power and authority to pursue every means, or form of action, permissible to secure payment of the notes issued by appellant. We must not lose sight of the fact that by the terms of the trust agreement appellant "as the controlling stockholder of said San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways" made certain agreements and representations concerning the amount of the stock of that corporation: That it would not be increased until all of the notes issued by appellant should be fully paid; that neither the maker of the collateral note nor appellant should issue, sell, or otherwise dispose of any bonds of the two corporations, or either of them, unless the first proceeds resulting from the sale, or other disposition, of such additional bonds be paid to the trustees for the purpose of application to the payment of the notes, and interest, secured by the trust agreement. Appellant further covenanted and agreed that it would "also do, execute, and deliver, or cause or procure to be done, executed, acknowledged, and delivered, all and every such further act, deed, transfer, and assurances for the better assuring, conveying, and confirming unto the trustee of all and singular the property pledged hereby, as the trustee shall reasonably require."

The trial court found that—

> "Contemporaneously with the execution and delivery of said trust agreement and as a part of the same transaction, said Oakland Railways delivered to and pledged with said Anglo-California Trust Company, pursuant to said trust agreement, * * * a promissory note dated August 12, 1912 [which is the date of the trust agreement], legally executed and delivered by San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways * * * for the principal sum of $2,500,000; * * * and which said note, prior to or contemporaneously with its execution and delivery, and as part of the same transaction, was guaranteed by defendant Oakland Railways."

It also found that the judgment obtained by plaintiff against appellant on its guaranty is subject to the trust agreement and the lien and pledge thereby evidenced, and might be sold under the judgment to be entered in this action. In the light of these findings, therefore, we may safely assume that the trustee required appellant to execute the guaranty for the "better assuring, conveying, and confirming unto" it the note of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways and the collateral pledge of capital stock. To accept the view of appellant would be to hold that the parties to this particular transaction merely intended to accomplish an idle act. The facts found, and the judgment of the lower court, must be supported by every reasonable inference and intendment. It is not at all unreasonable to conclude that the guaranty of appellant in this case was properly considered as collateral in so far as it was necessary to give the respondent, as trustee for the holders of the notes of the appellant, the full benefit of the lien upon the pledged property. Judgment on this collateral undertaking is the collateral promise reduced to a judgment which has taken the place of the guaranty, and stands as security merely for the payment of the principal debt of appellant on its notes. When that obligation is satisfied, such collateral judgment will become extinguished, and no action or rights can thereafter be maintained upon it. Harding v. Hawkins, 141 Ill. 572, 579, 31 N. E. 307, 33 Am. St. Rep. 347. When the principal obligation or debt is satisfied, the only purpose for which the guaranty was executed or can be used has been accomplished. The satisfaction of the judgment against appellant upon the principal obligation will amount to a satisfaction of the judgment upon the collateral note. Lynch v. Burt, supra; Vanuxem v. Burr, 151 Mass. 386, 24 N. E. 773, 21 Am. St. Rep. 458. In the latter decision reference is made to Corn Exchange v. Babcock, 8 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 256, where it is said (at page 259):

"As a general if not a universal proposition, remedies upon the primary debt and upon the collateral security may be prosecuted at the same time, even to judgment and execution, though but one satisfaction can be obtained therefor. * * * If an attempt be made to collect the judgment both upon the original and the collateral security, that can always be prevented or remedied by the order of the court."

Therefore the judgment rendered against appellant on its guaranty of the note of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways has not increased and cannot add to the burden of payment to which it has already been subjected by reason of the judgment against it on its primal obligation to pay the amount found due on its own note issue. Appellant is not aggrieved thereby, and it becomes unimportant to consider further whether or not the trial court committed error in its rendition in this particular action.

[9] If it be urged that the trial court erred in decreeing that the judgment against appellant on the guaranty might be sold under the judgment entered on the trust agreement "as part of the properties held and pledged to secure the payment of the amounts found due" on the promissory notes executed by appellant, the first answer to such contention is that its action is supported by the finding that the judgment on the guaranty is "subject to said trust agreement dated August 12, 1912, and the lien and pledge thereby evidenced." The next answer is that as long as the trustee remains owner of the judgment it cannot collect upon both the original debt and the collateral security, as already pointed out. In so far as a sale of the judgment to a third party is concerned, while a judgment is property which can be transferred, the rule of caveat emptor applies to such transactions. Curtin v. Kowalsky, 145 Cal. 431, 435, 78 Pac. 962. A judgment is not a negotiable instrument, but is a mere chose in action vesting an equitable right in the assignee to the proceeds of it, with a right to the usual and legal means of collecting the amount due on it. There is no difference, so far as affects the equity of the interest conveyed, between a sale made voluntarily by a party himself and a sale made for him by a sheriff or commissioner who, in making it, acts as his agent. Fore v. Manlove, 18 Cal. 436, 438. A sale by a sheriff or commissioner is in effect only an assignment. Southard v. McBrown, 63 Cal. 545, 547. If the assignor or holder of the judgment has no title, the assignee or purchaser at such sale will take none, whether he had notice or not. We think it must follow that any purchaser of the judgment entered against appellant on the guaranty in this case must take it subject to all the rights appellant has in the premises arising out of its relation to respondent by reason of the nature of the transaction. The exact nature of these rights does not need to be determined in this action.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

NEW AMSTERDAM CASUALTY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 4615.)

1. Master and servant ⟹397—Jurisdiction not acquired by Industrial Commission by consent.

Jurisdiction cannot be acquired by Industrial Accident Commission by consent.

2. Master and servant ⟹397—Stipulation Commission had jurisdiction without effect.

A stipulation that Industrial Accident Commission had jurisdiction of proceeding, under Workmen's Compensation Act, was of no effect.

3. Master and servant ⟹398—Stipulation Commission had jurisdiction not waiver of limitations.

A bare stipulation that Industrial Accident Commission had jurisdiction of proceeding, under Workmen's Compensation Act, did not constitute waiver of defense of limitations.

4. Master and servant ⟹416—Referee's failure to find on issue of limitations did not deprive insurer of defense.

Failure of referee in proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act to clearly state issues or to find on issue of limitations did not deprive insurer of defense of limitations.

5. Master and servant ⟹403—Burden of proof as to limitations.

Where pleadings of petitioner before Accident Commission showed action was barred by limitations, burden was cast upon him to prove that one of exceptions of statute existed in order that claim might be relieved from bar of limitations pleaded.

Application for certiorari by the New Amsterdam Casualty Company to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission of State of California awarding compensation for injury. Order annulled.

Warren H. Pillsbury and Edward O. Allen, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

George H. Moore, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

HOUSER, J. Certiorari. The point which is suggested by counsel for petitioner, and which is accepted by respondent as being proper for the consideration of this court, has to do with the statute of limitations. Ordinarily it might be contended that a writ of certiorari would not lie herein; but, in view of the fact that the controversy arises under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831), and that the ordinary functions of the writ of certiorari are largely extended by its provisions as affecting cases arising thereunder, together with the further consideration that both the Supreme Court and the appellate court of this state in analogous cases have heretofore recognized the broadened powers of this court in such proceedings, it may be assumed in the instant case that this court is not without authority in the premises.

Without reference to the underlying facts in the case, it may be stated that the application for the adjustment of the claim before the Accident Commission was in the usual form in such matters, and from the return to the writ it appears that the accident which resulted in the injury of which complaint is made occurred on the 28th day of November, 1922, and that the application by the injured person for adjustment of his claim was not filed with the Industrial Accident Commission until July 6, 1923. The act on which the proceeding is based provides in effect that, unless compensation be made, or an agreement for its payment be made, within six months from the date of the injury, except as otherwise provided in the act, such proceedings shall be barred.

On the face of the record it appears that more than six months elapsed between the date of the injury and the date of the filing of the application. Among other defenses the answer of the defendant New Amsterdam Casualty Company contained the following:

> "It sets up the defense that the time limit of applicant for making claim against the New Amsterdam Casualty Company has expired, inasmuch as over six months have elapsed since the time of injury, and no request for any payment of any nature has ever been made by applicant, or any one on his behalf, to the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, and the said New Amsterdam Casualty Company has never made any such payments to any one."

On the hearing before the referee a stipulation was entered into which, among other things, showed that certain compensation in payment of medical services and for disability of the injured person had been paid by one of the defendants in the proceeding, but that nothing had been paid by the defendant New Amsterdam Casualty Company. It was also stipulated "that the Commission has jurisdiction in this proceeding." In stating the issues in the proceeding before the Commission, the referee omitted to mention the fact that there was any issue regarding the statute of limitations. No evidence was offered by either party to the controversy touching any of the exceptions mentioned in the act which would have had the effect of preventing the operation of the statute of limitations as therein provided. Nor was any finding made by the referee with respect to such statute.

[1-4] On behalf of the respondent herein it is urged that the stipulation of the parties as to the jurisdiction of the Commission, together with the failure of the defendant at the hearing to offer any evidence with reference to the statute of limitations and especially as to the exceptions mentioned in the statute, constituted a withdrawal and a waiver of such defense. The general rule is that jurisdiction cannot be acquired by consent, and whatever exceptions may exist thereto are certainly not within the facts of this matter. It is apparent that the Commission either had or that it had not jurisdiction. If it already had jurisdiction, the stipulation was not only unnecessary but was also a superfluity; and, if it had not jurisdiction, the stipulation could not confer it. It must be true that, if jurisdiction existed, the question of the applicability of the statute of limitations to the facts of the case could not in any wise affect the right of the Commission to adjudicate concerning the subject-matter in the proceeding before it. In a proceeding of this nature the question of whether or not the tribunal has jurisdiction cannot be made to depend upon the conclusion as to which party should recover judgment, whether dependent upon the statute of limitations or any other single issue in the case. Holding that the issue of the statute of limitations was determinative of jurisdiction, that is, the legal right of the tribunal to decide the case, would in effect mean that, eliminating such issue, the court would have no power to decide for either of the parties to the action. The stipulation contained no statement of facts from which jurisdiction of the tribunal would necessarily follow; it was but a bald statement "that the Commission has jurisdiction in this proceeding." The result must be that by the stipulation the jurisdiction of the court was entirely unaffected. Nor did it constitute any waiver of the defense of the statute of limitations; it had no bearing upon, nor had it any relation to, such issue. Neither could the failure of the referee to correctly state the issues in the proceeding, or to find on the issue of the statute of limitations, deprive defendant of its defense. It was no part of its duty to see that the referee was properly performing his duty. The defendant had interposed the defense according to the usual and accepted form in such matters—at least no objection is made on such grounds—and it had the undoubted right, if findings were to be made at all, to have a finding made upon such issue.

[5] It is contended that the burden was upon the defendant, not only to prove that the statute of limitations applied, but also to prove that none of the exceptions of the statute prevented it from taking effect in the defendant's favor. In 17 R. C. L. 1004, 1005, where the authorities are cited, the general statement is made to the effect that, where a party to an action in which the statute of limitations is pleaded claims the benefit of an exception, all presumptions are against him, and the burden is upon such party to show that he is entitled to the exception. And in volume 8 Ann. Cas. p. 341, where a large number of cases are collected, it is said that—

> "When the plaintiff's pleadings show upon their face that the claim sued upon is actually barred by the statute of limitations, then a plea of the statute interposed by the defendant will in effect shift the burden to the plaintiff, who will be obliged to produce evidence to relieve his claim from the bar of the statute. Of course in the first instance the burden is upon the defendant to prove his plea, but he may rely for such proof upon the admissions contained in the plaintiff's pleadings and rest without producing other evidence."

In the instant case the pleadings of the petitioner before the Accident Commission show that the action is barred by the statute. The burden was therefore cast upon the petitioner to prove that one of the exceptions of the statute existed in order that the claim might be relieved from the bar of the statute. The record herein discloses the fact that no evidence was introduced to offset the defense made by the defendant on the face of the pleadings. The defense of the statute must therefore prevail.

It is ordered that the award of the Commission as against the defendant New Amsterdam Casualty Company be and the same is annulled.

Defendants Duffy, Larson, and Oria were convicted under the first count of the indictment. Defendants Leonard, Fink, Erwin, Gross, and Allen were convicted under both counts. All appeal from the judgment of conviction.

It is contended that there is in the record no evidence to support the verdict convicting any of appellants. This point may be summarily settled as to each of appellants and speedy disposition thus be made of the appeal.

[1, 2] There is no evidence that either appellant Erwin, or appellant Gross, or appellant Oria was ever in Los Angeles county prior to the date upon which the indictment was found. There is some evidence of the commission by appellant Leonard, in the county of Imperial, of acts of a nature similar to those charged in the indictment, but no evidence that he committed any such acts in the county of Los Angeles.

Appellant Fink, at the time of his arrest, which occurred before the indictment was found, was possessed of a membership card in the Industrial Workers of the World, which we shall henceforth refer to as the I. W. W. This card recited, "Issued by authority of the general executive board of the I. W. W.," and showed that Fink was "initiated T. S. Waller, M. T. W. Union No. 8—April 8, 1920." The arresting officer testified:

> "I told him [Fink] that I was surprised to see him down in this hall [at the time of the arrest] in a big meeting that had taken place that afternoon; was surprised to see him there in that hall with those papers, selling those papers there; and found these books and all this stuff on him."

The papers referred to by the witness were six copies of a newspaper, seven copies of a "demand," or circular, and one copy of a pamphlet, all apparently issued by the I. W. W. They were introduced in evidence. All of them, except the pamphlet, were identified by an affirmative answer of the witness to a question of the prosecutor: "Are these the papers you refer to as being in his possession there in the hall?" The witness identified the pamphlet as having been "taken off him at the time he was arrested." This was all the evidence offered to show the commission by Fink of the acts charged in the indictment. It is plain that it was insufficient to support the verdict on either count. The record fails to show that Fink organized or assisted in organizing the I. W. W., or that he became a member thereof in Los Angeles county, or that he printed, distributed, circulated, or publicly displayed any written or printed matter whatever.

The evidence offered to show the commission by appellant Allen of the acts charged in the indictment was in the testimony of the officer who arrested him. This officer talked with Allen in jail the next day after the arrest. Allen then said he was a member of the I. W. W. and had been for some time. The officer, along with others, then took Allen to a place which some person other than the prisoner had said was his residence and they there found I. W. W. literature. This evidence, all that was offered to prove Allen's alleged criminal acts, was palpably insufficient as a support for the verdict against him.

The only evidence introduced for the purpose of showing the commission by appellant Duffy of the acts charged in the indictment was that, upon his arrest, he was possessed of an I. W. W. button and of a suit case in which was contained some I. W. W. literature. This evidence, of course, gave no support to the verdict.

It was only shown against appellant Larson that the officer who arrested him had a "conversation with him about his membership in the I. W. W." The prosecution offered a membership card in the organization, but it was rejected by the court upon objection that it was not shown to have been issued to Larson. It was superfluous to say that there was no evidence against that appellant.

It is just to remark that the Attorney General, in the brief filed by him, practically concedes that the judgment must be reversed.

Judgment reversed as to each appellant.

PEOPLE v. ORTIZ. (Cr. 1118.)

1. Criminal law ⚿1170(2)—Exclusion of evidence otherwise supplied immaterial.

It was immaterial that evidence was excluded, where matters sought to be proved were otherwise established.

2. Criminal law ⚿650—Defendant properly asked to illustrate manner in which he took knife from pocket.

In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, where defendant testified that he cut plaintiff in self-defense, court properly permitted district attorney to request defendant to illustrate to jury manner in which he took knife from his pocket and opened it.

3. Criminal law ⚿1170(1)—Exclusion of evidence held not prejudicial.

In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, where only question was whether defendant cut in self-defense, exclusion of evidence that defendant had written no letter threatening violence, as testified by witness, held not so prejudicial as to warrant reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

John Ortiz was convicted of simple assault, and appeals. Affirmed.

Oscar Hudson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial after a conviction of simple assault upon an information charging defendant with assault with a deadly weapon.

The facts appearing from the record are substantially as stated by the appellant. On August 16, 1922, the defendant saw his wife leave their home in San Francisco, Cal., and take a street car going to the waterfront.

Defendant is a stevedore by occupation, and had left his home in the morning ostensibly to go to his work; but, instead of doing so, he had placed himself in a position where he could watch his home. In an automobile he followed his wife to the Ferry building in San Francisco and saw her meet Albert Donaso and proceed with said Donaso back to her home. Defendant then went to the police station and asked the aid of the police to have Donaso ejected from his home, but was informed that it would be necessary for him to secure a warrant before the police department could aid him. Defendant then left the police station, went directly to his home, and, finding the front door locked, went around to the window of his bedroom, broke a pane of glass, opened the window, and entered his home. He found his wife, her aunt, and Donaso drinking wine together in the kitchen while they were preparing food for their lunch. When the defendant entered the kitchen, the two women fled from the house, and defendant and Donaso engaged in a struggle in which Donaso was repeatedly cut with a pocketknife.

[1] The first objection made by the appellant is that the court erred in sustaining the objection of the district attorney to a question asked by counsel for defendant of the witness Donaso, as to where he first met the wife of defendant on the day of the assault. At the place in the record to which we are referred by appellant, we find that the question was answered without objection; the following appearing: "Q. Where did you first meet Mrs. Ortiz on that day? A. Down to the wharf—on the Vallejo boat wharf." The next question asked was: "Q. Who was with her, if any one?" An objection was sustained to this question. The materiality of the question is not apparent to us, but, nevertheless, the jury was informed upon the question of who accompanied Mrs. Ortiz to the Ferry building by the testimony of her husband, who stated that he saw his wife leave the house with her baby and take the street car to the waterfront.

The next objection made by appellant is that the court sustained an objection to a question asked of Mrs. Carion, an aunt of Mrs. Ortiz, as to why she ran from the house when she saw the defendant enter. We do not find that any objection was made to this question, and the answer to the same appears in the record presented to us.

[2] Complaint is made to the action of the trial court in overruling the objection of counsel for defendant to the request of the district attorney that the defendant illustrate to the jury the manner in which he took from his pocket and opened the small pocketknife with which Donaso was cut. We think the request was a proper one upon cross-examination under the facts of this case. The defendant had testified that he cut Donaso in self-defense; that he entered the room with no weapon in his hands; and that Donaso rushed at him with a knife, whereupon he pulled his pocketknife out of his pocket, opened it, and cut Donaso in self-defense. As a test of the witness' ability to hastily take the knife from his pocket and open it during the struggle between the two men, the district attorney asked him to repeat the act of drawing the knife from his pocket and opening it for the jury. We think this was proper upon cross-examination in view of the defense offered by the defendant.

[3] The record contained testimony by Donaso that Mrs. Ortiz had come to the wharf to meet him because she wished to tell him of a letter which Ortiz had written to his sister, threatening the life of Donaso. Another witness, the aunt of Mrs. Ortiz, stated that she had run out of the house when Ortiz entered it because he had written a letter to his mother-in-law stating that he would come around there some time. Later the mother-in-law was placed upon the witness stand and asked if she had received a letter from Ortiz threatening violence against either Donaso or Mrs. Ortiz. She replied that she never had received such a letter. Objection was made to the relevancy of the testimony, and the court ordered the same stricken out. The appellant now urges that error was committed in this ruling, as the evidence stricken out would tend to prove that there was no such letter as that testified to by Donaso and the aunt of Mrs. Ortiz and that the story was a fabrication. If the fact of whether the mother of Mrs. Ortiz had or had not received such a letter had any bearing upon the question of defendant's guilt, it was a remote bearing. The record is clear that the defendant cut Donaso with a knife. The question for the jury was whether or not he had done so in self-defense. Whether or not the defendant had also written threatening letters was a collateral issue, and failure to go into this matter does not warrant a reversal of the judgment.

MAIDEN v. SUPERIOR COURT, ALAMEDA COUNTY. (Civ. 4904.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 11, 1924.)

Prohibition ⟹13—Application for writ held to present only moot question.

Where, at time of application for a writ to prevent modification of interlocutory divorce decree, parties have compromised their disagreements by contract, only a moot question is presented and writ will be discharged.

Action by Walter Maiden for writ of prohibition to be directed to the Superior Court of Alameda County, T. W. Harris, Judge thereof. Writ discharged.

John T. Wentz, of San Leandro, for petitioner.

Gerald C. Halsey and Frederic T. Leo, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

Opinion of the court, stated by Mr. Justice GEORGE A. STURTEVANT (from the bench):

Assuming that Mr. Leo and Mr. Halsey had been called as witnesses, as has been stipulated, they would have testified that they did not threaten Mr. Maiden regarding the making of the contract. There is here Mr. Maiden's affidavit that he was threatened, but the preponderance of testimony is against him. That rule would have special application in a fraud charge. The court would not be burdened at all in determining against Mr. Maiden that he was not threatened and imposed upon.

He and his wife have compromised these matters. There are two distinct subjects, one touching their property rights and one touching the divorce. As to the property rights, they had the unquestionable right to make a settlement. Now, then, assuming that in the contract they inserted something regarding the entering of the final decree. That is somewhat cleared up as between them, but there is a third party who has not been heard from on that subject yet, and that is Judge Harris. This court may not assume, in advance, that Judge Harris will accept and will act upon any such contract purporting to confer jurisdiction, if jurisdiction had expired. Nor may we assume that he will use such a contract as conferring jurisdiction to modify the interlocutory decree in any respect provided that he reaches a conclusion that a sufficient showing has not been made that these parties cohabited subsequent to the entry of the interlocutory decree and come within the rule of Olson v. Superior Ct. of Merced County, 175 Cal. 250, 165 Pac. 706, 1 A. L. R. 1589.

It patently appearing that at the time this application was made for a writ of prohibition the parties themselves had compromised their several disagreements by contract, it is a moot question that is before us, and, basing our order solely upon that, we discharge the writ.

PEOPLE v. WAGNER et al. (Cr. 711.)

1. Constitutional law ⟹90, 250, 258—Insurrection and sedition ⟹2—Criminal Syndicalism Act does not abridge freedom of speech, deny equal protection of laws, or due process of law.

The Criminal Syndicalism Act is not unconstitutional as abridging exercise of the right of freedom of speech, or as denying equal protection of the laws, or due process of law.

2. Insurrection and sedition ⟹2 — Criminal Syndicalism Act not unconstitutional as not requiring guilty knowledge.

That part of Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, which declares that any person who "is" a member of any organization, etc., the purpose of which is to advocate, teach, etc., criminal syndicalism, as said offense is defined in section 1 of such act, is guilty of felony, is not unconstitutional as permitting conviction under the act though convicted person had no knowledge of alleged criminal character of organization.

3. Insurrection and sedition ⟹2—Evidence held admissible as tending to show objects of organization to be violative of Criminal Syndicalism Act.

In prosecution of members of Industrial Workers of the World under Criminal Syndicalism Act, testimony as to finding of pamphlets and publications having reference to principles of the Soviet Russia organization in canvas bag carried by one of defendants while distributing literature, held properly admitted in evidence, in that they were found among papers concerning purposes of I. W. W. organization, and in view of testimony as to similarity of the two organizations.

4. Criminal law ⟹419, 420(11)—Evidence of conversations with third parties held inadmissible as hearsay.

In prosecution of members of Industrial Workers of the World under Criminal Syndicalism Act, permitting witness to narrate substance of conversation with members of I. W. W., not defendants, relating to crimes claimed to have been committed by them in pursuance of policy of the organization was error; such testimony being wholly hearsay.

5. Criminal law ⟹1186(4) — Admission of hearsay evidence held harmless error.

In prosecution of members of Industrial Workers of the World for violation of Criminal Syndicalism Act, error in admitting hearsay evidence as to crimes committed by members not defendants in pursuance of policy of organization held harmless, where same matter was testified to by other witnesses, and in view of evidence tending to show guilt, and of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

6. Criminal law 🔑451(4) — Conclusions of witness that amendments to platform and principles of I. W. W. camouflage held admissible.

In prosecution of members of Industrial Workers of the World under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, court did not err in permitting former member to testify that purported changes in principles and platform of the I. W. W. organization was mere camouflage, witness stating facts on which he based conclusion.

7. Criminal law 🔑1169(2)—Admission of evidence held harmless if erroneous.

In prosecution of members of Industrial Workers of the World under Criminal Syndicalism Act, error in permitting ex-member to testify that the organization believed in free love, that religion and churches were sham, that courts should be done away with, etc., held not prejudicial, in view of evidence tending to establish objects of organization.

8. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Evidence of past violence held admissible in prosecution under Criminal Syndicalism Act.

In prosecution of members of Industrial Workers of the World under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, criminal acts committed by members of the I. W. W. in pursuance of its policy of obtaining control of government by violence, were admissible, though remote in time from the time at which defendants were arrested and prosecuted, though there is no presumption to be applied under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32, in view of sections 1959, 1960.

9. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Guilt under Criminal Syndicalism Act held for jury.

In prosecution of members of Industrial Workers of the World under the Criminal Syndicalism Act, guilt held for the jury.

10. Criminal law 🔑449(1)—Interpretation by outsider of principles of Industrial Workers of World held properly excluded in prosecution under Criminal Syndicalism Act.

In prosecution of members of Industrial Workers of the World under Criminal Syndicalism Act, held proper to exclude publication by a certain publicist to effect that principles and purposes of the I. W. W., were of a high character; such testimony involving mere opinion of an "outsider."

11. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Instruction requested as to evidence necessary to establish conspiracy held properly refused as misleading.

In prosecution of members of the Industrial Workers of the World under Criminal Syndicalism Act, court properly refused instruction that "the mere fact that two or more persons are instrumental in bringing about the same result, is not, in itself, sufficient to establish conspiracy between such persons, unless there is an agreement or understanding between such persons to bring about, or attempt to bring about, such result," being misleading, as under conceivable circumstances the fact recited might be sufficient evidence of the required previous agreement or understanding.

12. Criminal law 🔑829(3) — Requested instruction covered by given instructions properly refused, where containing misstatement of law.

In prosecution of members of I. W. W. under Criminal Syndicalism Act instructions held to sufficiently convey to jury proposition that knowledge of character of the organization was an essential ingredient of the crime, and court did not err in refusing to give a requested instruction thereon which included misstatement of the law.

13. Criminal law 🔑824(1)—Instruction on criminal intent or knowledge should be given, though not requested.

In prosecution of members of I. W. W. under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, even if such an instruction is not requested by either defendants or the people, it is nevertheless duty of court sua sponte to clearly explain that, knowledge of alleged criminal character of the organization is as necessary to be proved as fact of being or becoming member thereof.

14. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Place of organization immaterial in prosecution for being member of society to abet criminal syndicalism.

In prosecution under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, it is immaterial whether alleged unlawful organization was organized in the county of the prosecution or anywhere in the state, or whether the defendants were members of the local organization.

15. Criminal law 🔑830—Instruction containing misstatement of law may be rejected.

A requested instruction, though in some respects involving a correct statement of the law, may be rejected by the court, if in other particulars it contains a misstatement of the law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Joe Wagner and others were convicted of criminal syndicalism, and appeal. Affirmed.

R. W. Henderson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendants Wagner, Brooks, and Russell were indicted by the grand jury of Sacramento county for the crime of criminal syndicalism. The defendants Vargo and Hewitt were likewise charged with the same offense. The indictment against the first-named defendants was presented and filed in the superior court of said county on the 2d day of March, 1923, and the indictment against Vargo and Hewitt presented and filed in the same court on the 10th day of August, 1923. The same attorneys represented all the defendants under both indictments. By stipulation between said attorneys and the district attorney, the two cases or indictments were consolidated for the purposes of the trial, and accordingly the defendants under both indictments were jointly tried.

The jury found the defendants Wagner, Vargo, and Russell guilty as charged. The record does not appear to show what disposition was made of the cases against the defendants Brooks and Hewitt. This, however, is of no material consequence. A motion for a new trial in behalf of each of the convicted defendants was made and denied, and they appealed from the judgment of conviction and the order refusing to grant them a new trial.

The two indictments are founded on subdivision 4 of section 2 of the act designated and known as the Criminal Syndicalism Act. Stats. 1919, p. 281. The said section reads as follows:

> "Any person who * * * organizes or assists in organizing, or is or knowingly becomes a member of, any organization, society, group, or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate, teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism," —is guilty of a felony, etc.

The first section of said act defines "criminal syndicalism" as—

> "any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage (which word is hereby defined as meaning willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property), or unlawful acts of force and violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change."

The points urged for a reversal are numerous, but many of them call for but passing, if any, notice herein. It is contended that the evidence, as brought before the jury in support of the indictments, is insufficient to sustain the verdicts. It is further claimed that much of the evidence presented by the people in support of the indictments was legally improper and seriously prejudicial to the rights of the accused. The assignments so made, together with objections to certain instructions, constitute the principal grounds upon which it is insisted that the cases should be sent back for trial de novo.

It is expressly conceded by counsel for the defendants that the evidence sufficiently shows that the appealing defendants were members of the organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World.

It is not necessary that the testimony presented by the people should be minutely examined herein. We have read the evidence, as it is disclosed by the record, and we find that it is substantially the same character of proof as was adduced at the trial of other cases, in which precisely the same offense as is charged in the indictments here was charged against the accused. See People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 203 Pac. 78; People v. Taylor, 187 Cal. 378, 203 Pac. 85; People v. Roe, 58 Cal. App. 690, 209 Pac. 381; People v. La Rue et al. (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 627; People v. Flanagan et al. (Cal. App.) 223 Pac. 1014. The literature embraced in numerous publications in the form of books, magazines, pamphlets, and leaflets introduced in the instant case to show the principles and objects of the I. W. W. organization is the same, or of the same general character, as that received in the cases just mentioned. Certain of the witnesses (former members of the I. W. W.) giving testimony in this case of the commission of criminal acts in furtherance of the general program to which the I. W. W. organization is, according to its literature, committed, are, we judge from their names (idem sonans) the same witnesses who gave substantially the same testimony in the cases above named. As it was held in those cases, so it must be held here, that the testimony in the record now before us affords sufficient support to the verdicts. To some of the testimony, however, the objection is urged that it is incompetent. It is also objected that the acts of violence and other criminal performances which were shown to have been perpetrated by certain members of the Industrial Workers of the World having been committed some four or five years before the trial of this action, were improperly allowed to be brought into the case because of the remoteness of the time at which they were committed from the time of the arrest and prosecution of the defendants, the argument being that there is no presumption that, even if said organization had then advocated, taught, and practiced such criminal acts for the purpose of carrying out its principles and doctrines, said organization had not since changed in that respect and had not adopted lawful and peaceable means for accomplishing its objects and purposes. The objection in this behalf will be later considered.

[1] The contention that the Criminal Syndicalism Act is unconstitutional, in that its effect is to abridge the exercise of the right of freedom of speech as guaranteed by the state and federal Constitutions, has been held in numerous cases in which said act and other similar statutes of other states have been considered to be without force. People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 203 Pac. 78, supra; People v. Gitlow, 195 App. Div. 773, 187 N. Y. Supp. 783; Schenck v. U. S., 249 U. S. 47, 39 Sup. Ct. 247, 63 L. Ed. 470. Nor is the act in conflict with the guaranty of the federal Constitution interdicting legislation, the effect of which would be to deny to persons the equal protection of the laws or contravene the right of due process of law. State v. Dingman (Idaho) 219 Pac. 760. See, also cases above cited.

[2] There is no merit in the contention that that part of subdivision 4 of section 2 of the Syndicalism Act, which declares that any person who is a member of any organization, etc., the purpose of which is to advocate, teach, etc., criminal syndicalism, as said offense is defined in section 1 of said act, is unconstitutional, in that the word "is" is not modified by the word "knowingly," and that therefore a person who is or remains a member of said organization would be guilty of a felony under the act, even though he had no knowledge of the alleged criminal character of the organization. In the opinion by Presiding Justice Finch of this court, in the recent case of People v. Flanagan et al., 223 Pac. 1014, supra, it was held that scienter or guilty knowledge or criminal intent was an essential element of the offense of criminal syndicalism. The question is exhaustively considered in that case. To the conclusion reached therein upon that proposition we unqualifiedly adhere. Indeed, we are not reluctant to take a step further and say that, in our opinion, even if the word "knowingly" were altogether eliminated from subdivision 4 of section 2 of the act, it would still remain true that knowledge of the unlawful character of the organization would be a necessary element of the crime denounced by said subdivision.

[3] The next points which may briefly be considered are the rulings of the court upon matters of evidence. The defendant Wagner, when arrested, was distributing certain I. W. W. literature, carrying the same in a canvas bag. In his room was also found a large quantity of literature, among which were certain pamphlets and publications having reference to the principles of the Soviet Russia organization and Communists' party principles. These were received in evidence over objection by the defendants; the claim being that said organizations are not related to, or connected in any way with, the Industrial Workers of the World, and that the principles they advocated were not those of the latter organization. We think that the court made no error in the rulings allowing in evidence the literature just referred to. The witness Townsend testified that the only difference between the program of the Soviet Russia organization and the Industrial Workers of the World is that the former undertake to secure industrial freedom by or through political methods, that is, through ballot box, while the Industrial Workers of the World advocate direct action, that is, forcibly taking control of the industrial machinery of the world and appropriating it and using it according to their conception of the kind of government that should rule society. The said pamphlets and publications were found in the possession of the defendant Wagner and were among books, papers, and pamphlets admittedly containing literature regarding the purposes and objects of the I. W. W. organization. They were admissible for the purpose of showing the general character of the latter organization since their general principles were the same, and the fact that the defendant had knowledge of the plans of the I. W. W. organization.

[4, 5] It is further objected that the court erred in permitting the witness Townsend to narrate the substance of a conversation occurring between the witness and William Weyh, a member of the Industrial Workers of the World, relating to a certain crime which said Weyh claimed to have committed in pursuance of the policy of said organization to destroy property for the purpose of creating a reign of terror among the people. A similar objection is made to the rulings of the court allowing said Townsend to testify that one Connellan, a member of the I. W. W., told him (the witness) that that he (Connellan) and others had deposited potassium hydroxide in the shoes of one Joe Arada who was employed in digging potatoes for a farmer in the San Joaquin Valley; that Connellan, so Townsend was permitted to testify, stated that the effect of putting that chemical in the shoes of Arada was to burn his feet and so cripple him that he could not proceed further in the employment in which he was engaged. The objection to this testimony was well taken. The precise proposition was considered in the cases of People v. La Rue, supra, and People v. Flanagan, supra, and in those cases it was properly held that such testimony was wholly hearsay and, therefore, inadmissible. See, also, People v. Irvin, 77 Cal. 494, 504, 20 Pac. 56; State v. Dingman (Idaho) 219 Pac. 760; State v. Gibson, 115 Wash. 512, 197 Pac. 611; State v. Petilla, 116 Wash. 589, 200 Pac. 332; People v. Smith, 151 Cal. 619, 626, 91 Pac. 511; People v. Sullivan, 59 Cal. App. 633, 211 Pac. 647. As was said in the Flanagan Case, so it is true here:

> "The hearsay statements erroneously admitted were not made at any meeting of the organization, or to or by an officer or representative thereof, or in the way of propaganda to further its purposes, but the facts sought to be proved by the declarations were the commission of criminal acts by its members."

who, it may be added, were not on trial either in the Flanagan Case or in this. The record shows, however, that said Arada was a witness in this case and testified in detail to the fact of the placing of potassium hydroxide in his shoes at the time and under the circumstances as explained by Connellan to the witness Townsend and the effect of the chemical upon his feet, stating that his feet were so severely burned from contact with the chemical that he became, for a time, helplessly crippled, and that by reason thereof he was compelled to remain in a hospital and under medical treatment for several months. There is also in the record evidence of many circumstances tending strongly to fix responsibility for the said act upon the members of the Industrial Workers of the World. In view of this first-hand testimony of the happening of the act and the competent testimony of circumstances tending to prove it was the work of certain members of said organization, it well may be concluded that the admission of Townsend's hearsay testimony relative to the circumstance could have done very slight damage to the substantial rights of the accused. Furthermore, the record contains a mass of relevant and competent testimony tending to show the guilt of the defendants, and we think that, as to the rulings here considered, as well as to some other erroneous rulings to which reference will later be made, section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution applies—that is to say, that even with these errors, a miscarriage of justice has not followed the conviction of the accused, in view of the vast amount of incriminatory evidence which was received in the case.

[6] It is also contended that one of the witnesses, who was a former member of the organization, was erroneously permitted to give his opinion regarding some alleged recent amendments which had been made to the platform of principles of the I. W. W. organization, whereby language expressly or impliedly advocating and teaching acts of sabotage and other criminal acts theretofore contained in said platform was eliminated therefrom. The witness stated that, while it was true that since the enactment of the criminal syndicalism law a change in the principles of the organization had been effected so as to make it appear that criminal acts or acts of violence were no longer to be resorted to in order to accomplish the purposes of the organization still the purported change was a mere camouflage, and that the organization and its members intended to proceed upon the same lines that it always had adopted in carrying out or crystallizing its principles or securing control of the machinery of industry of the country and changing our system of government. The witness stated that he knew this to be the fact because he had heard the matter discussed at meetings of the organization. We cannot say that this testimony was erroneously admitted. It is true that the witness now and then expressed his conclusion regarding the matter, but in the main his story in this regard involved a statement of a fact, that is, of the fact that in the discussions which he had heard at the meetings of the organization with reference to the purported change the determination of the members was that acts of violence and crime should go on until the organization had succeeded in accomplishing its ultimate purposes.

[7] Over objection by the defendants, an ex-member of the Industrial Workers of the World was allowed to testify that among the tenets of that organization was the doctrine of free love or the abolition of the marriage institution, and therefore no marriage relation; that, if the organization succeeds in attaining its ultimate ends, there will be no churches, since, as the members thereof contend and proclaim, religion is the most dangerous and implacable enemy that the radical movement has; that religion is a sham to keep people in ignorance; that the courts will be done away with; that jails and penitentiaries will be abolished and that all persons confined therein will be liberated; that the members of the organization refer to the Savior as "Jerusalem Slim," etc. The ruling admitting substantially the same testimony was criticized in the case of People v. Flanagan, supra, and therein declared to be erroneous; but, as above stated, there is so much evidence in the record tending to establish the fact that the I. W. W. organization teaches and advocates and encourages the commission of any and all kinds of crimes in furtherance of the objects of the organization that we feel that we are forbidden to hold that a miscarriage of justice would or could result from the verdicts even in the face of the ruling referred to.

[8, 9] The complaint that the criminal acts to which the witness Townsend, Cox, and Coutts testified were committed by members of the Industrial Workers of the World in pursuance of its policy of obtaining control of the government by violence were perpetrated at a time too remote from the time at which the defendants were arrested and prosecuted to render them competent as testimony against the accused cannot be sustained. It was certainly competent and relevant testimony. There is some discussion in the briefs to the effect that, since it is true that the I. W. W. organization at some past time advocated, practiced, and committed sabotage and other crimes and acts of violence generally as in furtherance of its objects, the presumption "that a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature" (section 1963, subd. 32, Code Civ. Proc.) is applicable. We doubt the soundness of that position. Section 1959, Code of Civil Procedure, declares that a "presumption is a deduction which the law expressly directs to be made from particular facts." Section 1960 declares:

> "An inference must be founded: 1. On a fact legally proved; and 2. On such a deduction from that fact as is warranted by a consideration of the usual propensities or passions of men, the particular propensities or passions of the person whose act is in question, the course of business, or the course of nature."

To apply the presumption declared in subdivision 32 of section 1963, supra, in a case of this character would almost be tantamount to declaring it to be a maxim of the law that "once a criminal always a criminal." It is true that said presumption is subject to be controverted, but it is not the law that a jury in a criminal case is compelled as a matter of law to make the deduction from the fact that a person or combination of persons has once been engaged in the business of committing crimes, that such person or combination is guilty of the particular crime for which he or it is on trial. In this case the proved fact that the I. W. W. organization at a previous period in its existence habitually advocated as a part of its principles and policies the commission of crimes by its members to effect its ultimate objects affords a ground for an inference by the jury that its principles and policies in that respect are now the same as they had always been prior to the trial of the particular case. The remoteness of the time of the alleged commission of the acts from the time of the arrest and prosecution of the defendants was one which would go to the weight or evidentiary value of the testimony of those acts, and obviously this would be a matter for the jury to determine. In this connection it should be stated that the witness Townsend testified that certain criminal acts were committed by the members of the organization, for the purposes of the organization, as late as the year 1921. The defendants were at liberty and entitled to show that, since the commission of the acts above referred to, the organization had changed its policy and condemned, rather than advocated, such acts, This would have been a proper defense. In this connection it should be stated that the defendants did not themselves take the witness stand. Several witnesses, however, testified in behalf of the defendants and gave testimony negativing the testimony by the people that the resort to violence of any character was a part of the program or platform of principles and policies of the I. W. W. organization. There were also introduced by the defense a number of printed articles containing a favorable analysis and interpretation of the principles of said organization. The probative force of this evidence was for the determination of the jury. In other words, it was for the triers of the fact to say whether or not the evidence presented by the defense was sufficient to overcome the case made by the people in support of the indictments. It may be added that the criminal acts committed before the enactment of the criminal syndicalism statute were proper to be shown for the purpose of determining the character of the organization. People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 203 Pac. 78; People v. Lloyd, 304 Ill. 23, 136 N. E. 505.

[10] It is claimed that the court committed error in disallowing the defense to introduce the interpretation published by a certain publicist of the principles of the Industrial Workers of the World. The said interpretation involved an analysis of the principles and purposes of said organization and the author undertook to demonstrate thereby that said principles and purposes were of a high and commendable character and if concretely applied would tend to ameliorate the condition not only of all laboring men, but of all mankind living under a government founded upon such principles. The court refused to allow the proffered literature or essay on the ground that it was not shown that the author was a member of the Industrial Workers of the World and on the further ground that it involved the mere opinion of an "outsider." We think the ruling was proper. If such testimony were admissible in a case of this character, many opinions of the principles and purposes of said organization of diametrically opposite trend could be introduced in evidence and none lead to the establishment of any substantial fact or any fact or facts from which a jury could intelligently form a conclusion as to the guilt of the defendants of the charge made in the indictments. People v. Lloyd, 304 Ill. 23, 136 N. E. 505; People v. Gitlow, supra.

There are several other rulings of the court upon the question of the admissibility of evidence which are criticized as erroneous and prejudicial, but which need not be specially considered herein, since they are of the same general character as those assignments which have already been considered. We have carefully examined all the assignments under this head and feel well convinced that, even with errors that have been noticed and others of a similar general kind which will not be noticed herein, the verdicts are so well buttressed by strong competent proof of guilt that a miscarriage of justice will not be the result of the verdicts here complained of. As was said by the Illinois Supreme Court, in People v. Lloyd, 304 Ill. 23, 136 N. E. 505, 531, so with equal pertinency and force may it be said of the record here and our examination thereof:

> "There are many other objections to the court's ruling on the admission of special items of evidence, but it would serve no useful purpose to consider them in detail. We have considered with care each and every objection urged by plaintiffs in error with respect to the admission and rejection of evidence, and while we do not hold that the record is free from error in this respect we do hold that no substantial error was committed. Granting that there were minor errors committed by the trial court, it does not follow that the judgment must be reversed. Plaintiffs in error make no defense on the merits. Not one of them took the stand to explain his participation in this conspiracy, or his conduct in connection with it. The competent evidence in the record in our judgment, leaves no room for the slightest doubt of the guilt of plaintiffs in error."

In dismissing now this branch of the case, we feel constrained, in view of some of the errors to which we have herein called special attention—errors which, in very recently decided cases in California, involving the same charge that is stated in the indictments here, have been pointed out and so characterized in language of singular perspicacity—to venture the earnest wish that such errors may not in the trial in the future of cases of like character be repeated.

[11] It is contended that the court erred by its refusal to submit to the jury the following instruction requested by the defendants:

> "The mere fact that two or more persons are instrumental in bringing about the same result, is not, in itself, sufficient to establish a conspiracy between such persons, unless there is an agreement or understanding between such persons to bring about, or attempt to bring about, such result."

The above instruction is a misleading statement of the law. It is true that there must be an agreement or understanding between two or more persons to do an unlawful act or a lawful act by unlawful means to constitute a conspiracy, but it is also true that the fact that two or more persons were "instrumental in bringing about the same result," if such result or the means adopted to accomplish it be unlawful would be at least prima facie and, under conceivable circumstances, sufficient evidence of a previous agreement or understanding between such persons to bring about such result. The court, however, submitted to the jury several instructions clearly explaining the elements or essentials of a conspiracy, as follows:

> "* * * A conspiracy exists when two or more persons conspire or combine together to commit an unlawful act." "A conspiracy is an illegal agreement between two or more persons to do an illegal act or a legal act in an illegal way. The gist of the conspiracy is the agreement, or meeting of the minds of the conspirators. While you may find the existence of a conspiracy from circumstantial evidence, that evidence must be of sufficient strength to convince your minds. A conspiracy cannot be established by a mere guess or suspicion. It must be founded upon the evidence."

The defendants proposed, and the court refused to embrace within its charge the following instruction:

> "Before you can convict any one of these defendants you must find that three facts existed, to a moral certainty, and beyond every reasonable doubt. These facts are as follows: (1) That at, or about, the time mentioned and charged in the indictment against him such defendant was a member of the Industrial Workers of the World, in the county of Sacramento, in the state of California; (2) that, at such time as you have found such defendant to be a member thereof, the Industrial Workers of the World was organized in the said county of Sacramento to advocate, teach, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism as that term has elsewhere been defined to you in these instructions; and (3) that at the time such defendant has been found to be a member of that organization, that defendant knew that the Industrial Workers of the World was organized for such purpose. Unless you find each of the foregoing facts to exist with regard to each defendant, it will be your duty to acquit such defendant."

The court included within its charge section 1 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, defining the offense of criminal syndicalism, and also subdivision 4 of section 2 of said act, which, as seen, in effect provides that knowledge is an element of the offense specifically charged in the indictments in this case. The court further instructed the jury as follows:

> "You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the I. W. W. organization and its members was at the time charged in the indictments engaged in a conspiracy which had for its object the commission of the acts denounced by the criminal syndicalism statute of this state and which I have read to you, and if you further believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that such conspiracy, if conspiracy there be, on the part of the I. W. W. organization and its members, was still continuing, at the time charged in the indictments, not having yet accomplished its purpose, and if you further find that the defendants knowingly became members of the said I. W. W. organization, then I instruct you that by so knowingly becoming members of such organization they thereby adopted and became coconspirators."

[12-15] It seems to us that the instruction last above quoted herein, together with a statement of the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 2, upon which the indictments were predicated, sufficiently conveyed to the jury the proposition that knowledge of the character of the organization was an essential ingredient of the crime for which the accused were on trial. It would manifestly have been the better course, and certainly only just, for the court to have amplified the fact that scienter or knowledge is an element of the offense which had to be proved to the satisfaction of the jury to justify a conviction, and if a proper instruction of that character had been requested by the defendants, it would have been error—whether sufficiently prejudicial to require a reversal, we need not here say—for the court to have rejected it. Indeed, we are of the opinion that even if an instruction upon the question of knowledge were not requested by either the defendant or the people it would, nevertheless, be the duty of the court, sua sponte, to have given an instruction clearly explaining that, as in every crime in which, to consummate it, intent is as essential as the act, knowledge of the criminal character of the organization was as necessary to be proved as the fact of being or becoming a member thereof. But the above instruction, offered by the defendants upon the subject, does not, as must be readily apparent upon reading it, state the law correctly. It will be observed that it declares that to warrant a conviction the defendants must have been shown to have been members of the Industrial Workers of the World in the county of Sacramento; that "at such time as you have found such defendant to be a member thereof, the Industrial Workers of the World was organized in the said county of Sacramento to advocate, teach, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism," etc. It is a proposition too obviously sound to require discussion that it is immaterial, so far as that phase of the case is concerned, whether the Industrial Workers of the World was organized in Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Sacramento, or Seattle, or whether the defendants were members of the organization in Sacramento city or any other place where a branch of the organization may exist. It is only necessary to prove so far as that element of the crime is concerned, that they have become or are members of said organization. An instruction, though in some respects involving a correct statement of the law, may be rejected by the court if, in other particulars, it contains a misstatement of the law. This does not mean, however, as we have before pointed out, that, as to a vital element of a crime, the court will be excused if it gives no instruction explaining to the jury that such element must be shown to have existed in connection with the act or the crime will not be proved.

As stated above, we think that, in view of the instructions which the court did give upon the subject of knowledge, though not amplified as they should have been, and in view of the further fact that the defendants' proposed instruction upon the subject contained a misstatement of the law in certain particulars, the action of the court in failing to give a more explicit and amplified explanation of the proposition that knowledge was an essential element of the offense, and therefore required to be proved to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, does not justify us in reversing the case. The situation in this case with respect to the question of scienter is very much different from that in the case of People v. Flanagan, 223 Pac. 1014. In the latter case, the jury, after the case was submitted to them and they had retired to consider their verdict, returned into court and, in effect, inquired whether knowledge of the character of the organization was necessary to be shown, and the court replied that "the law does not require, that the prosecution establish that he knew the character of the organization. * * * It does not require that they know the character of the organization when they joined it. * * * The word 'knowingly' there means that he must know that he joined the organization." Thus, it is to be seen, the court in the Flanagan Case, misinterpreted the word "knowingly" as the same is used in the statute and in its written instructions, and consequently erroneously told the jury that knowledge of the alleged criminal character of the organization was not an element in the offense charged. No such an incident occurred in the instant case.

We have now given consideration to all the points that we believe deserve special notice herein, and, after an examination of the record and all the points urged for a reversal, we have been persuaded to the conclusion that the judgments and orders appealed from should not be disturbed.

Accordingly the judgment and the order as to each of the appealing defendants are affirmed.

HARLOW v. SILVERIA et al. (Civ. 4675.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1008(1)—Finding as to meaning of ambiguous contract conclusive.

Finding of trial court as to meaning of contract, as to which contract appellant could, at most, claim that its express language was not conclusive against him, held conclusive on appeal.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1056(6)—Exclusion of evidence excusing delayed performance held harmless in view of proof of no performance.

In contract action, exclusion of evidence excusing plaintiff appellant's performance within contract time was harmless where record showed there was no performance by him at any time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by George T. Harlow against Charles M. Silveria and others and Edward L. Shadbolt, Addie Offutt, and Addie Offutt, special administratrix of the estate of John Offutt. Judgment for the last-named defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Russell P. Tyler, of San Francisco, and Carl Barnard, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendants Edward L. Shadbolt and Addie Offutt, individually and as special administratrix of the estate of John Offutt, deceased, in an action brought to recover $14,990, the balance due upon the purchase price of certain mining stock alleged to have been purchased by the defendants from the plaintiff. Plaintiff also asked for $2,600 alleged to have been expended by him upon the mining property in controversy at the request and for the benefit of defendants under the terms of the contract between him and the defendants for the purchase and sale of said stock.

The defendants Charles M. Silveria and Edwin D. Casterline were never served with process and did not appear in the action. Subsequent to the commencement of the action the defendant John Offutt died, and, thereafter, the defendant Addie Offutt was duly appointed as special administratrix of the estate of John Offutt, deceased, for the purpose of representing said estate in the said action, and said Addie Offutt, as such special administratrix, was substituted as and for the defendant John Offutt in this action.

The plaintiff and the defendants entered into a written contract by which the plaintiff, through his attorney in fact, agreed to sell to the defendants for the sum of $15,000 all the capital stock of the Alaska Gold Dredging & Improvement Company owned by plaintiff, amounting to 480,000 shares, together with all claims or liens which said Harlow might have against said company. It was further provided that the purchase price should be paid as follows: $10 cash upon the execution of the agreement and $14,990 within 30 days. The following clause then appears:

> "And the said party of the first part [plaintiff] further agrees that he will furnish to the parties of the second part [defendants] an abstract of title to the property owned by said Alaska Gold Dredging & Improvement Company as originally deeded to it by the Houston Hydraulic & Dredging Company, on or before the expiration of said thirty days, which said abstract of title shall show title in the said Alaska Gold Dredging & Improvement Company, free and clear of all incumbrances whatsoever on said date."

There are further provisions in the agreement as to the delivery of the seal, stock books, and records of the company by the plaintiff to the defendants and an agreement that the defendants, upon the fulfillment of the obligations of the plaintiff under the contract, would fully satisfy and discharge a certain money judgment theretofore entered in favor of defendant Addie Offutt and against the plaintiff.

The complaint sets out this contract, alleges plaintiff's offer of performance of the same, and that the defendants failed and refused to meet their obligations thereunder, and asks for a judgment for $14,990, the balance due upon the purchase price of the stock, and also for $2,600, alleged to have been expended under the contract for the benefit of defendants upon assessment work upon the property required by law. The answers denied that the plaintiff offered to deliver the stock or the abstract contemplated by the contract, and alleged that the plaintiff refused ever since the execution of the said contract and still refused to deliver to defendants the property which he was required by said contract to deliver. The trial court found that subsequent to the execution of said contract, and within the time provided for by said agreement, the plaintiff did not tender nor offer to deliver to defendants the capital stock covered by the contract, but that, on the contrary, at the time the contract was entered into and at all times subsequent thereto, the plaintiff did not own, have in his possession, or control 480,000 shares of said capital stock, or any shares whatsoever, and that the plaintiff was not in a position to deliver to defendants said number of shares or any number of shares of said stock upon the date of the signing of the contract nor at any time subsequent to the execution of the same; that the plaintiff did not tender nor offer to deliver to any of the defendants, within the time provided for by said contract an abstract of title to the property owned by the Alaska Gold Dredging & Improvement Company, as provided for in the said contract.

Appellant attacks these findings as being unsupported by the evidence. We think, however, that his position is without merit. The evidence appearing in the record and the possible inferences from the same which support these findings are all with which we are concerned upon appeal. The contract provides for an abstract showing title free and clear of all incumbrances in the Alaska Gold Dredging & Improvement Company to all the property originally deeded to said company by the Houston Hydraulic & Dredging Company. The purported abstract offered by plaintiff to the defendants in compliance with his obligation under the contract appears in the record, and, irrespective of the time at which the document was furnished to the defendants, it in no manner indicates what property was conveyed to the Alaska Gold Dredging & Improvement Company by the Houston Hydraulic & Dredging Company, nor whether the mining claims enumerated in said document represent all or any part of such property. It is merely a purported copy from the official records of a mining district in the territory of Alaska of all instruments filed and of record affecting certain enumerated mining claims and water rights. Such instruments consist of affidavits of annual assessment work done by the Alaska Gold Dredging & Improvement Company and a statement that the records of said mining district show no judgments, suits pending, liens, or taxes outstanding against said mining claims and water rights. There is an affidavit by one Curtis R. Morford to the effect that he, personally, compiled the aforementioned instruments, and that said compilation is a full and complete abstract of all instruments affecting said property appearing of record in the mining district.

Appellant meets this situation, however, by urging that the defendants did not object to the sufficiency of the abstract furnished, nor point out its alleged deficiencies, and, consequently, they are precluded now from making any objections thereto, because of the provisions of section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If appellant's position be correct, there yet remains as an obstacle to his recovery the finding of the trial court that he never owned nor controlled the 480,000 shares of stock which he was to transfer to the defendants, and never at any time was in a position to deliver the same. The record contains evidence that prior to the execution of the contract between the parties the 480,000 shares of stock which had theretofore belonged to plaintiff had been sold by the sheriff at public auction in satisfaction of a judgment against Harlow, and that Harlow never owned nor controlled any other stock.

The appellant meets this situation with an argument that because of the evidence in the record regarding the situation of the parties to the contract at the time it was entered into the court should have interpreted the contract between them as calling upon the plaintiff to surrender not 480,000 shares of stock, but only whatever rights or interests in the same he might have been able to assert after the sheriff's sale. The interests which the appellant suggests are: That Harlow was in physical possession of the certificates of stock after the interest which they represented had been sold at auction by the sheriff, and that he was in possession of the corporate books, seals, and other records of the company; that the judgment against him under which the stock was sold by the sheriff had been obtained by default, and at the time of the execution of the contract between plaintiff and defendants plaintiff had a right to move to set said judgment aside; and, further, that the corporation owed him considerable money as salary. However valuable these various interests of the plaintiff might have been, the contract in express language provides that he is to sell to the defendants "all the capital stock of the Alaska Gold Dredging & Improvement Company owned by the party of the first part [plaintiff] * * * amounting to 480,000 shares, together with all claims, liens, sums due, demands, and causes of action or otherwise which he may own, claim, or possess or have against the said Alaska Gold Dredging & Improvement Company by reason of any matter or thing whatsoever."

[1] It seems, therefore, that the most that can be said for the appellant is that the court might have concluded from the evidence that the parties intended to contract for the sale of something other than what was expressly stated in the contract—that is, that they did not mean to contract for the sale of 480,000 shares of stock, together with all claims and liens of plaintiff against the company, but merely for the transfer of valueless certificates which no longer represented the property right in such shares of stock, and the claims and liens of plaintiff against the company. However, the court did not so conclude, and surely the express language of the written contract raises a conflict in the evidence as to what was required to be delivered by the plaintiff, and consequently the findings of the trial court that the plaintiff was required to deliver 480,000 shares of stock which he never owned nor controlled after the execution of the contract may not be disturbed by us upon this appeal, and are conclusive of the rights of the parties in this action.

[2] The appellant complains of the ruling of the trial court in excluding the judgment roll in a proceeding to revive the corporation, Alaska Gold Dredging & Improvement Company. The written contract between the plaintiff and defendants, which forms the basis of this action, provides:

> "And it is further understood and agreed that proceedings are now pending in the superior court of Sonoma county, Cal., for the appointment of trustees of said Alaska Gold Dredging & Improvement Company, who shall make application to the state of California for the reinstatement of said corporation; and that if such reinstatement shall be impossible to be accomplished within thirty days from this date, without neglect upon the parties of the second part, or the agents of said company, that in that case this agreement shall be extended for a period of thirty days from the expiration hereof."

It is clear from the record that no attempt was made by plaintiff to furnish an abstract within 30 days from the date of the contract, which time would have expired on the 18th day of July, 1919. However, a receipt from the defendants for a purported abstract, bearing date of August 12, 1919, was introduced in evidence, and appellant now contends that the said judgment roll in the reinstatement proceedings was relevant to prove that plaintiff was entitled to an additional 30 days within which to perform his obligations under the contract because of the pendency of proceedings for reinstatement of the corporation. The offer of this evidence was not made for this purpose, and, had it been, the evidence might have been admitted without objection. On the contrary, when the attorney for the plaintiff was called upon by the court to state the purpose of the offered evidence, he stated a purpose which did not warrant the admission of the evidence, and did not state the purpose which he now urges. However, even though we concede to the appellant that the ruling upon the admission of this evidence was error, such ruling could only be prejudicial if the judgment rested solely upon the failure of the plaintiff to perform his obligations under the contract within 30 days. But the record and findings go further, and find that the plaintiff never did perform his obligations, neither within 30 nor 60 days from the date of the contract, nor up to the time of the bringing of the action. Therefore the error, if any, of the trial court in refusing to admit the record in the proceedings for reinstatement of the corporation, could not be prejudicial to the appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re RAWSON'S ESTATE.

Appeal of SALISBURY et al. (Civ. 4682.)

Wills ⚷394—Order on demurrer, denying right to contest will, held not appealable.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 963, order, on demurrer, denying right to contest will, is intermediate order or ruling, reviewable only on appeal from final order or judgment admitting will to probate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William H. Ellis, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Martha Rawson, deceased. From order sustaining demurrer to contest of will, Charles E. Salisbury and another appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Charles E. Salisbury, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Oliver P. Ensley, of Hemet, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The last will and testament of the above-named deceased was offered for probate, and appellants filed a contest wherein fraud, undue influence, mental incompetency, conspiracy and other grounds were alleged. The proponent demurred thereto, and after argument and the submission of briefs by the parties, the trial court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend. Notice was given that contestants appealed "from the order of the above entitled court, entered therein October 2, 1923, sustaining the demurrer, without leave to amend, filed by the proponent of the will of Martha Rawson, deceased, to contest of said will; said order being in favor of said proponent of said will and against the above-named contestants of said will, and from the whole of said order." No judgment is embraced in the record before us.

Appellants' opening brief is devoted exclusively to extensive argument and citation of authorities upon the merits of the contest, but respondent raises the point that the appeal must be dismissed, and, such being our view of the law, we are not called upon to consider the other questions involved.

Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure enumerates the orders from which an appeal will lie in probate matters, to wit:

> "A judgment or order granting or refusing to grant, revoking or refusing to revoke, letters testamentary, or of administration, or of guardianship; or admitting or refusing to admit a will to probate, or against or in favor of the validity of a will, or revoking or refusing to revoke the probate thereof."

Appellant contends that none of the authorities cited by respondent upon this question involve the contest of a will and quotes from Estate of Edelman, 148 Cal. 233, 82 Pac. 963, 113 Am. St. Rep. 231, as holding that—

> "There is no difference in principle between the order of the court denying a right of contest for lack of interest upon demurrer, and denying it, as in this case, by a formal dismissal of the contest for lack of interest."

However, the Supreme Court there expressly held that—

> "The only appealable orders in probate matters are those designated in subdivision 3 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. * * * The adjudication to be made is as to the validity or invalidity of the will, and the order here made dismissing a contest is reviewable upon appeal from the final order or judgment admitting the will to probate as is any other intermediate order or ruling which the court may make."

The conclusion, therefore, is irresistible that an order made upon demurrer, denying a right to contest, is an intermediate order or ruling which is reviewable only upon appeal from the final order or judgment admitting the will to probate. This is the only authority cited by appellant, and we are able to find none holding to the contrary. In De La Beckwith v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 496, 80 Pac. 717, it was said:

> "An order sustaining a demurrer is not a judgment, and does not have the effect of finally and irrevocably dismissing the demurring party from the action. 'It may form the basis for rendering a judgment, but it is not itself a judgment' (Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 518), is not appealable, and can be reviewed by an appellate court only on appeal from a final judgment subsequently given. Upon such an order being made without leave to amend, or where it is made with leave to amend and no amendment is made, the party whose demurrer has been sustained may become entitled to a judgment, which may effectually bar further proceedings against him in the matter from which he has been dismissed. In the absence of such a judgment, however, the mere order constitutes no bar, and if, at any time prior to judgment, it is made to appear to the court that a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of such party, we can conceive of no good reason why the court may not make such orders as will have the effect of bringing such party into the action again."

To the same effect are Cornic v. Stewart, 179 Cal. 242, 176 Pac. 164; Harmon v. De Turk, 176 Cal. 758, 169 Pac. 680; Rickert v. Zoeger, 169 Cal. 399, 146 Pac. 894; Fortain v. Smith, 114 Cal. 494, 46 Pac. 381; Pacific Seaside Home for Children v. Newbert Protection District, 49 Cal. App. 326, 193 Pac. 169.

Appellants assert in the closing brief that a judgment was actually signed and filed, but the record does not bear out such statement, as it must, to render it available (Bagley v. Cohen, 121 Cal. 604, 53 Pac. 1117), and, even though this discrepancy might have been cured, they do not appeal from a judgment.

The appeal is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. CARILLO. (Cr. 1040.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 8, 1924.)

1. Criminal law ⚷829(1)—Unnecessary to give requested instructions covered by charge.

Requested instructions fully and correctly covered by charge given need not be given.

2. Criminal law ⚷531(3)—Confession admissible on substantial evidence of voluntariness, notwithstanding scintilla of evidence to contary.

Whether confession was free and voluntary is within the peculiar province of the trial court to decide, if there is evidence substantially supporting its ruling; and discretion to admit it is not destroyed by a mere scintilla of evidence that confession was not free and voluntary.

3. Constitutional law ⚷70(3)—Argument held to go only to wisdom of statute prescribing punishment for assault to rape.

Argument that Pen. Code, § 220, fixing punishment for assault with intent to commit rape, is unconstitutional, in view of fact that under section 264, because of discretion of jury, punishment for statutory rape (section 261, subd 1) may be less than for such assault, held to go to wisdom, and not unconstitutionality, of section 220.

4. Criminal law ⚷543(2)—Foundation for admission of testimony taken at preliminary hearing held sufficient.

Evidence as to absence of witness from state held sufficient foundation for allowing her testimony taken at the preliminary hearing to be read to the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Richard Carillo was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape and burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

Stanley Visel, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal from a judgment after verdict of guilty rendered by a jury against the defendant upon both counts of an information charging the crimes of assault with intent to commit rape and burglary, wherein the jury found the burglary to be that of the second degree. Appellant asserts that the trial court erroneously refused to give 15 instructions requested by him. However, he has failed in his briefs to do more than quote the offered instructions and to assert that because of the omission to give them his rights were substantially prejudiced.

[1] A careful reading of the entire charge given by the trial court to the jury discloses that the principles of law involved as pertaining to the issues in this case were fully and correctly stated. This being so, it was unnecessary to repeat them in the language of the instructions requested by appellant.

[2] It is seriously urged that, "where there is one scintilla of evidence going to the fact that a confession was not free and voluntary," it is no longer discretionary with the trial judge to admit, or sustain objection to the admission of, an alleged confession. It is admitted that the effect of the testimony of one witness for the prosecution was that the confession was entirely free and voluntary. No authorities are cited by appellant to sustain his novel position. It is elementary that it is within the peculiar province of a trial court to pass upon the admissibility of evidence tending to show a confession. This is true wherever the record contains evidence which substantially supports the ruling of the trial court. People v. Grafft (Cal. App.) 214 Pac. 273; People v. Fouts (Cal. App.) 214 Pac. 657; People v. Rodriguez (Cal. App.) 214 Pac. 452; People v. Jung Sam (Cal. App.) 213 Pac. 966.

[3] Other points made by appellant are equally clearly not well taken. It is urged that section 220 of the Penal Code is unconstitutional, for the reason that section 264 of the Penal Code allows the jury by their verdict to fix the punishment of a person convicted of an offense under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, but that section 220 provides punishment for assault with intent to commit rape of not less than one nor more than fourteen years, and allows the jury no discretion in the matter. The point which appellant seems to attempt to make is that assault with intent to commit rape is a crime of less heinousness than rape, and yet that the punishment provided by section 220 of the Penal Code is less severe than that for rape under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, hence appellant says the section under which he was convicted, to wit, section 220 of the Penal Code, is unconstitutional. The mere statement of this proposition answers itself, as the argument is clearly not directed against the constitutionality of the law, but merely to its wisdom, which, of course, is within the province of the Legislature.

[4] There is no merit in the objection that the court erred in permitting the testimony of a witness, Olive Schealey, taken at the preliminary hearing, to be read to the jury, on the ground that a sufficient foundation was not laid. The evidence showed that the officer attempted to serve a subpœna upon the witness at No. 1700 Grafton street, Los Angeles, known to be her former abode, and that a Mrs. Dunn, who lived at that address, said Mrs. Schealey had left for Texas in an automobile, starting from in front of her house; the witness interviewed another woman in the immediate neighborhood, who said she had received a postal card from Mrs. Schealey, postmarked "Laguna, Texas," stating that she was there; that he also inquired of a daughter-in-law of Mrs. Schealey, living at Glendale, who stated that she had received a letter in an envelope postmarked in Texas, on the day on which the witness was testifying. This letter was offered in evidence, and was postmarked "Monte, Texas." This foundation was ample.

The judgment is affirmed.

COMMERCIAL & SAVINGS BANK v. EWING, City Treasurer. (Civ. 4902.)

Municipal corporations ⚿955(1)—Bonds payable on presentation without audit.

Municipal bonds which are legal outstanding obligations are liquidated claims which must be paid on presentation; they are contracts with the city, and, when they provide for payment upon presentation, the city may not require the holder to submit his bond to an audit or accept a warrant upon the treasury upon transfer of his bond in lieu of legal tender, and City Charter of Fresno, § 58, requiring presentation of certified vouchers, applies only to unliquidated claims.

Application for writ of mandate by the Commercial & Savings Bank against A. D. Ewing, as Treasurer of the City of Fresno, to cancel and pay a municipal bond. Writ granted.

Gallaher, Simpson & Hays, of Fresno, for petitioner.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts, of Fresno, for defendant.

NOURSE, J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus to require the defendant, as treasurer of the city of Fresno, to cancel and pay on presentation to him a municipal bond issued by the city under proceedings duly had therefor for the construction of a municipal improvement described as a playground pavilion. The defendant has appeared by demurrer, and rests upon the ground that the petition fails to state a cause of action. There is no dispute as to the facts. It is conceded that the bond was duly issued by the municipality, and that it is now an outstanding obligation, and that payment is due. The point of difference between the parties is that the defendant insists that he is not authorized by the municipal charter to pay the bond upon presentation, but that it is necessary for the holder thereof to present it to the commissioner of finance for his audit, and that the commissioner must thereupon draw his warrant upon the treasurer in favor of the holder, and that such warrant alone can be paid by the treasurer. On the other hand, the petitioner insists that the provisions of the charter on which defendant relies relate only to unliquidated claims against the city, and do not relate to bonds of this character.

On behalf of the petitioner it is suggested that the bond was issued under an ordinance of the municipality enacted in 1912, which provided a sinking fund to be kept by the treasurer of the city for the payment of principal and interest upon the bonds authorized by the ordinance, and that "when the respective payments of principal and interest shall fall due the said treasurer of the city of Fresno be, and he hereby is, authorized, directed, and required to pay out of the said moneys of said sinking fund the said respective amounts thereof when demand shall be made therefor as by law required, and upon the surrender of the corresponding bonds and coupons to said treasurer." The bond in suit was sold under the terms of this ordinance and dated August 15, 1912.

The sections of the charter upon which the defendant relies were finally adopted in 1921. In general they provide that the commissioner of finance shall have the custody and control over the disbursements of city funds. The section upon which special reliance is placed is section 58, entitled "Payment of Claims." It reads in part as follows:

"Payment by the city shall be made only upon vouchers certified by the commissioner of the appropriate department, * * * and by means of warrants on the city treasury, issued by the commissioner of finance. The commissioner of finance shall examine all pay rolls, bills and other claims and demands against the city; and shall issue no warrant for payment unless he finds that the claim is in proper form, correctly computed and duly certified that it is justly and legally due and payable. * * * He may require any claimant to make oath to the validity of a claim. He may investigate any claim and for such purposes may examine witnesses under oath. * * *"

An examination of this section satisfies us that it relates to the payment of unliquidated claims against the city. It will be noted that it requires the voucher and certificate of the department under which the claim arises. It also authorizes the commissioner of finance to put the claimant upon his oath and to examine witnesses in aid of his investigation of the propriety of the claim.

Bonds which are legal and outstanding obligations against a city are liquidated claims which must be paid upon presentation. They are contracts with the city, and when they provide for payment upon presentation alone the city may not require the holder thereof to submit his bond to an audit before payment or to accept a warrant upon the treasury upon transfer of his bond in lieu of the legal tender which the city contracted to pay for the bond upon delivery.

In a similar case the Supreme Court of the United States held that a statute requiring the submission of claims to the county auditor for allowance and approval did not apply to municipal bonds and interest coupons thereof, saying:

> "This question was presented in the case of County of Greene v. Daniel, 102 U. S. 187, 194, in which the court observed, speaking of bonds and coupons, that 'the claim was, to all intents and purposes, audited by the court when the bonds were issued. The validity and amount of the liability were then definitely fixed, and warrants on the treasury given, payable at a future day.'" Lincoln County v. Luning, 133 U. S. 529, 532, 10 Sup. Ct. 363, 364 (33 L. Ed. 766).

To the same effect is Leach v. Commissioners of Fayetteville, 84 N. C. 829, 830, where the court say:

> "While unadjusted claims are required to be audited and ordered to be paid, absolute and unconditional obligations already ascertained and audited are in themselves and upon their face an order and authority in the financial officer, possessing the means not otherwise appropriated, to pay on presentation."

The duty of the treasurer to pay the bond from the sinking fund upon presentation to him is fixed by the ordinance under which it was issued. The charter provisions to which our attention has been directed do not pretend to supplant these provisions of the ordinance. They do not in terms refer to the payment of the principal or interest upon municipal bonds. They cover the subject of the payment of claims and demands against the city in terms which in general usage refer to unliquidated claims and demands which require the approval of an auditing body before presentation to the treasurer for payment. We are satisfied that the provisions of the charter do not affect the duty of the treasurer as outlined by the ordinance under consideration.

Let a peremptory writ issue as prayed.

The evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding by the jury of the following facts: T. B. Young and Mrs. T. B. Young were the owners of certain mining claims located on the American river in Placer county. On July 15, 1918, they executed an instrument in favor of defendant, of which the following is a copy:

Stutsman, or his assigns, for the sum of four thousand dollars, upon the following terms: Two thousand dollars on or before Sept. 15, 1918; one thousand dollars on or before Dec. 15, 1918; one thousand dollars on or before March 15, 1918.

> "[Signed] T. B. Young.

Defendant testified that about the first part of November, 1918 (which was after the first payment on the foregoing offer would have been due had the offer been accepted), he arranged with Young to do the assessment work on the claims and look after the property, and that Young told defendant that defendant could take the property and handle it and organize it on any basis he saw fit, as long as the Youngs did not have to part with the title until they received the purchase price of $4,000. It was then orally agreed between defendant and Young that a deed of the property to defendant would be executed by the Youngs and placed in escrow, with instructions that no title pass until the full amount of $4,000 was paid to the grantors. About six months later, that is, on May 24, 1919, the Youngs signed an instrument by which they agreed—

> "to deliver by good and sufficient deed, relinquishing all our right, title, and interest therein to W. A. Stutsman, to own and control thereafter, upon the fulfilment of the terms as herein set forth, viz.:
> "Said claims are situated at the mouth of Sailor Ravine on the north fork of the American river, six miles south and one mile east of Cisco, Placer county, Cal. Said claims are known and recorded as the Hidden Treasure and Gypsy Queen.
> "The purchase price of said claims is $4,000, and is payable in cash at the time of the transfer of title.

> "Said transfer is to be in the following manner: Immediately upon receipt of deed properly filled out, the undersigned owners will place the same in a designated bank at Auburn, properly signed and ready for recording; said bank is to hold and not record until the full amount of four thousand and no/100 dollars is paid into said bank and the payment of the same to the undersigned owners.
> "Time is the essence of this agreement to deliver.
> "[Signed] T. B. Young.
> "Mrs. T. B. Young.
> "Witness: James R. Smith."

In pursuance of the terms of the foregoing instrument, on June 3, 1919, a deed was executed by the Youngs, and 15 days later was by them deposited in a bank, with oral instructions to the officers of the bank to deliver the deed only upon receipt of $4,000 to the credit of the Youngs. In the count of the indictment under which defendant was convicted it was charged that in the latter part of April, 1919, defendant stated to Charles Van Wey that he was interested in the mining claims belonging to the Youngs; that he had an option to buy them; that he had paid either $4,000 or $5,000 on account of the purchase price; that the claims were valued at $10,000; that he was forming a pool to pay off the balance of the money, and was selling units of interest; and that he wanted Van Wey to invest therein. The evidence further showed that, relying upon defendant's said representations, Van Wey did pay to defendant the sum of $500 for an interest in said claims, but that he had never received from defendant any evidence of ownership thereof, nor had any part of the $500 been returned to Van Wey.

Although several alleged false representations by defendant were set out in the count of the indictment upon which the conviction was had, the prosecution relied upon and confined itself to the proof of the single misrepresentation that defendant had an option on the Young claims.

Defendant contends that prejudicial error as against him was committed by the court in admitting evidence of an alleged similar transaction which occurred between defendant and a man named Engel at a time about 6 months later than the one of which the jury found defendant guilty of obtaining money by false pretense. There was no substantial difference between the representations made by defendant to Van Wey and those which were made by him to Engel, excepting that in the negotiations with Engel defendant proposed to sell an interest in five claims, rather than two claims, and which five claims included the two Young claims, and that defendant stated that the price of the Young claims was $8,000 instead of $10,000. The first point made by defendant hereunder is that, because at the time he negotiated with Engel the deed was in escrow, the statement by defendant that he had an option to purchase did not amount to a misrepresentation.

[1] Defendant urges that the admission in evidence of similar transactions was prejudicial to him; but that contention is disposed of by a line of authorities in this state holding that in cases of this character such evidence is admissible, where the object thereof is to show system or design. People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 Pac. 194; People v. McGlade, 139 Cal. 66, 79 Pac. 600; People v. Arnold, 17 Cal. App. 68, 118 Pac. 729; People v. Hansen (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 399.

From the record herein it plainly appears be considered "simply for the purpose of showing system and design." It is obvious that, while there were some variations in the procedure adopted by defendant as between the Van Wey transaction and the En- that the evidence was offered "for the purpose of showing system," and that the court instructed the jury that such evidence should gel transaction, yet they presented one general scheme to obtain money by false pretense. The evidence adduced in the Engel case was sufficient, prima facie, to support the conclusion that defendant was also guilty of an offense similar to the offenses of which he was charged in the indictment, and affects the motive or the intent which actuated defendant throughout the entire matter. The fact that other claims were added by defendant to the two Young claims in making his representations to Engel does not make any substantial difference in the plan to defraud. It is not necessary that the Engel transaction be identical with the Van Wey transaction. All that is required in that regard is that they be similar and of comparatively recent commission. In the case of People v. Hansen (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 399, there was a difference of 8 months between the date of the commission of the offense of which defendant was found guilty and the date of the offense of which evidence was introduced as being a similar transaction; and, while the question of the length of time ensuing between the two transactions is not discussed in the opinion, it is held that no prejudicial error resulted from the admission of the evidence.

Defendant also complains that several prejudicially erroneous rulings were made by the court. The first of these has to do with the refusal of the court to permit the introduction of evidence which would have tended to prove that assessment work was performed on the Young claims at the instance of defendant for the years 1919 and 1920. It is pointed out that the bearing which such evidence would have would be to show a consideration for the "option," which, it is claimed, was created under the agreement of May 24, 1919, and which was followed by Young depositing the deed with the oral instruction to the officers of the bank to deliver same to defendant on his paying to Young the sum of $4,000; also, that it would have tended to corroborate defendant's testimony relative to the so-called "new agreement" made between defendant and Young in November, 1918, and show that defendant performed his part of the contract.

[2] As has been heretofore indicated, in cases of the nature of that of which defendant is charged, the reason for the admission of evidence as to similar transactions is to show system, or design, or guilty knowledge, or something of that character. Such a matter presents a question of fact just as much as does any other relevant circumstance in the case. It goes without saying that as to any material issue presented by the prosecution the defendant has the undoubted right to make complete rebuttal along any lines included within the rules of evidence. If it was proper for the prosecution to show that defendant had apparently committed other acts of a kind similar to the one of which he was charged in the information, defendant should have been afforded full opportunity to either deny it completely or to explain the transaction in order to show its innocent character. State v. Germain, 54 Or. 395, 103 Pac. 521. If the sale to Engel was in all respects fair and just—if it was based upon an instrument purporting to be an option for which a consideration had passed from defendant to the owners of the property—defendant was entitled to show that fact in order that his good faith might appear in the matter, to the end that no inference of guilt of defendant as to the charge against him might be indulged in by the jury on account of such alleged similar occurrence. Seldom does it happen in cases where the rule permits evidence to be introduced of similar transactions that the defendant is apprised beforehand either of the broad fact that such evidence will be offered, or of the precise nature of the testimony which will be introduced. As to that feature of the case he is therefore oft times greatly embarrassed and considerably handicapped. It is but just that in such circumstances at least his every right should be accorded him. In the instant case the question of intent was predominant and most vital to defendant's case. The facts concerning the particular charge against defendant were not of that character which would justify the conclusion that defendant's guilty intent was manifest. It was a close question for the jury to decide; and without a finding thereon against defendant no verdict of guilty could have been reached in the case. The ruling by the court of which defendant complains, and which resulted in defendant being precluded from showing primarily that there was a consideration given by him for the option to purchase the property, to the end that in selling an interest in the mining claims described therein defendant had no guilty intent, but, on the contrary, was acting in all respects honestly and within his legal and moral bounds, was an invasion upon and most prejudicial to defendant's legal rights. A consideration of other alleged errors becomes unnecessary.

It is ordered that the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for new trial be and the same are reversed.

Evidence, in action to recover moneys paid to defendant by plaintiff's decedent, held to support finding in favor of plaintiff against contention that such moneys were paid in liquidation of loan by defendant.

2. Appeal and error ⚷995—Appellate courts do not weigh evidence.

Appellate courts do not weigh evidence and determine where preponderance lies.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine Judge.

Action by Frank J. Goodwin, administrator of the estate of William H. H. Goodwin, deceased, against Walter A. Pfunder. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Richard Kittrelle, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Benjamin M. Stansbury, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted to recover money delivered to defendant for the use and benefit of plaintiff's intestate. The delivery of said money to the defendant was denied by the answer. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

[1] The only point made by defendant upon this appeal is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the judgment. It was proven at the trial that the deceased, William H. H. Goodwin, on the 24th day of December, 1919, paid to defendant the sum of $1,250. The payment was made by means of a check for $1,250 sent to the defendant through the mail, which check, when admitted in evidence, bore the indorsement of the defendant, and also the stamp of the bank upon which it was drawn, showing the same to have been paid. Defendant admitted the receipt of said check, and that he had cashed the same and received the money thereon, but claimed that this money had been paid to him by Goodwin in payment of a loan in the same amount made by him to Goodwin. Upon cross-examination he was unable to show where or how he obtained the money loaned to Goodwin, except that he "had saved it up from different times from deals and things." He claimed he kept it in a safe-deposit vault prior to loaning it, although he admitted he had an account in a savings bank at the same time. He testified that he did not give Goodwin a check, but that he gave him the money itself, which he took from his safety deposit vault. The money paid him by Goodwin he deposited in the bank. He testified at the trial that he was to receive one per cent. a month interest on the loan to Goodwin, but it was shown that in the trial of another action he had testified that he was to receive eight per cent. interest per annum. He testified that he did not recall that there was any letter or writing accompanying the check which Goodwin sent to him, but at the trial of the other action referred to he testified that he had destroyed the letter sent with the check. He testified he took a note from Goodwin when he made the loan, and that this note was returned to Goodwin when the note was paid, but Goodwin's administrator testified that he was unable to find said note among the effects of the deceased when he took charge of the property of the estate of said deceased a few months thereafter. There were numerous contradictions and discrepancies in the defendant's testimony which rendered it unsatisfactory in the extreme. The evidence showed that Goodwin, during the time that he had these transactions with the defendant, was a man of considerable means and was worth in the neighborhood of $50,000, and that his property consisted of lands, notes secured by mortgage, shares of stock in the telephone company, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and other corporations. The testimony further showed that the defendant was a man of limited means and was then, and had been for years, working at a salary of not to exceed $125 per month, out of which he was compelled to support himself and family. A witness by the name of Vincent testified as follows:

> "I asked Mr. Pfunder [the defendant] how he came to get the car and he told me that he took it over with this money that Mr. Goodwin had loaned him, or he had loaned Mr. Goodwin."

[2] With this testimony before the trial court we are not able to say that it was not sufficient to justify the court in rendering judgment in plaintiff's favor. Defendant refers to other testimony given by the witness Vincent during the trial, to the effect that the deceased had told him that he had borrowed the money from the defendant. By reference to the reporter's transcript we find that this witness testified that the deceased "said that Mr. Pfunder managed to get the money for him." Conceding that this statement of the witness Vincent justifies the claim made for it by the defendant, this fact cannot be of any material assistance to the defendant on this appeal. We are not to weigh the evidence and determine whether the preponderance thereof is in defendant's favor or not. This was the duty of the trial court, and in the exercise of this duty it found in favor of the plaintiff. In our opinion this finding should not be disturbed.

For the reasons above stated we think the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

CUNNING v. CARR, County Auditor, et al. (SELVAGE, Intervener). (Civ. 2778.)

Appeal and error ⚷458(1)—Supersedeas will not issue unless necessary to preserve rights.

Supersedeas will not issue unless necessary to preserve rights of parties pending hearing, and will not be granted intervening taxpayer appealing from judgment for plaintiff in action against county officials to compel issuance of warrants for services, since defendants who did not appeal would pay at their peril and intervener would not be prejudiced.

Action by John Cunning against Thomas K. Carr, Auditor of the County of Humboldt, and another, in which T. H. Selvage intervened. There was judgment for plaintiff and intervener gave notice of appeal. On application by intervener for supersedeas to prevent action under writ of mandate, issued. Writ denied.

Selvage & Selvage, of Eureka, for intervener and appellant.

H. C. Nelson, of Eureka, for respondent.

A. W. Hill, Dist. Atty., and J. J. Cairns, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Eureka, for defendants.

PLUMMER, J. This matter is before the court upon an original application for the issuance of a writ of supersedeas herein. It appears from the intervener's petition that the plaintiff Cunning, upon his own and the assigned claims of five others, began an action in the superior court of Humboldt county against the auditor and treasurer thereof to compel the auditor to issue warrants for certain services performed by the petitioner and his assignors and also to compel the treasurer to pay the same. The petitioner herein thereupon filed his complaint in intervention. The cause went to trial, and the plaintiff had judgment. The petitioner filed a notice of appeal without giving any bond or undertaking to stay proceedings on appeal. The defendants, Carr and Hodgson, have taken no appeal. After the entry of judgment in favor of the plaintiff, a writ of mandate was issued under the hand and seal of the clerk of the superior court of Humboldt county, directing the auditor to issue warrants for the claims held by the plaintiff, and also directing their payment by the treasurer of Humboldt county. It is to supersede this writ of mandate that the petitioner now asks the order of this court.

Many authorities have been cited on the question whether the filing of the notice of appeal by the intervener stays proceedings by reason of the construction that has been given to sections 942 to 949, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure. On the part of the petitioner it is insisted that the filing of his notice of appeal stayed all further proceedings, and that the issuance of the writ of mandate was without authority of law, and therefore void. On the part of the respondent it is contended that, as the judgment neither required anything of the intervener nor granted him anything, no stay was effected by his notice of appeal, and that as to the defendants, neither of them having appealed, execution could run against them immediately. As we view this case, it is not necessary for the court to determine whether the filing of the notice of appeal by the intervener did or did not effect any stay or prevent the issuance of the writ of mandate herein referred to. We have carefully examined the pleadings and find that there is nothing in the entire action which would have prevented the auditor from issuing his warrant at any time during the pendency of the trial and that there is nothing in any order made by the trial court which at any time hindered or tended to hinder the issuance of the warrants sought by the petitioner or their payment by the county treasurer.

In this particular the case is exactly similar to the circumstances presented and considered by this court in Cotton-Macauley Co. v. Deshields, 52 Cal. App. 469, 198 Pac. 1026. The court there said:

> "As we examine the pleadings and judgment in the record before us, there appears nothing to prevent the appellant Deshields issuing a warrant in favor of the plaintiff at any time, notwithstanding the appeals now pending in this court. It is simply a matter of whether the auditor does or does not wish to assume such responsibility. There being nothing to prevent the auditor at the present time from issuing such warrant, we cannot very well see how any action of this court on the motion of appellant Deshields to have his appeal dismissed will in any way imperil the rights of the intervener. If the stop notices referred to as given by the intervener are ultimately held good, the intervener has his remedy, as payment made by any officer having proper notice thereof would be at his peril."

In that case the auditor was seeking to have his appeal dismissed and the intervener contested the auditor's application for dismissal. In the case at bar the defendants have taken no appeal and are preferring to take their chances in paying the plaintiff's claims without waiting for the judgment of this court upon the merits of the case. If the judgment of the trial court should be reversed, the intervener has lost nothing by reason of the action of the auditor and treasurer in paying the plaintiff's demands. The illegality of the claims would be established and the defendants and their bondsmen would simply be in the position of parties paying claims out of public funds not authorized by law. A writ of supersedeas issued in this matter and directing the auditor and treasurer and the plaintiff to restore the amounts of the claims included in the judgment of the trial court would be no more effective in preserving the petitioner's rights as a taxpayer of the county of Humboldt than the judgment of this court holding such claims illegal and fixing the liability upon all the parties concerned and the bondsmen of the two defendants. The rule being that a supersedeas will not issue, unless it is necessary to preserve the rights of the parties pending hearing, this latter reason would of itself be sufficient to necessitate the denial of the petition of the intervener. The denial of the petition for a writ of supersedeas herein is made without reference to the merits of the case or to any of the questions which may be presented to this court upon the appeal now pending in said cause.

It is ordered that the petition for a writ of supersedeas herein be and the same is hereby denied.

FAY IMPROVEMENT CO. v. RANKENBERG et al.

SAME v. HOMESTEAD REALTY CO. et al.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑567(2)—Complaints to foreclose liens for street improvement work held sufficient.

Complaints in actions to foreclose liens for street improvement work under St. 1911, p. 730, held to allege establishment of official line and grade, and that work was done to official line and grade.

2. Appeal and error 🔑909(3)—Plans and specifications not attacked in proceeding to foreclose street improvement lien presumed regular on appeal.

On appeal from judgment for plaintiff in actions to foreclose liens for street improvement work, under St. 1911, p. 730, plans and specifications not brought to attention of appellate court by record and not attacked must be presumed regular in all respects.

In Bank.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Actions by the Fay Improvement Company against Henry P. Rankenberg and others and the Homestead Realty Company and others, respectively. Judgments for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Sawyer & Sawyer, of San Francisco, for appellants.

John R. Daniels, of San Francisco, and J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. These actions were brought to foreclose liens for street improvement work done under the order and by the direction of the board of trustees of Daly City, county of San Mateo, as provided by the street improvement act, approved April 7, 1911. Stats. and Amendments 1911, p. 730. The same questions of law being presented by each, they have been consolidated for the purposes of appeal and presented as one cause.

Each complaint contains two causes of action, and each cause of action was demurred to on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The specific and only defect or ground of demurrer urged or presented by appellants is that the complaints fail to allege the establishment by said city of an official line and grade; further, that they fail to allege that the work was done to the official line and grade. Said demurrers were overruled. Appellants answered, and the court rendered a judgment in each case confirming the validity of the assessment liens imposed upon the property of appellants. The appeals are taken upon the judgment rolls alone. The findings of the court are amply supported by the records of the proceedings taken by the board of trustees.

In addition to alleging all necessary jurisdictional matters, the complaints contain the following allegation:

"That on the 12th day of July, 1920, the city engineer of said city of Daly City furnished to and filed with the city council of said city proper plans and specifications for constructing and completing certain public work and improvement in said city of Daly City, which said public work and improvement is hereinafter particularly set forth and described. That thereupon, to wit, on the same day last mentioned, the said city council by its resolution No. 186, duly adopted and approved said plans and specifications, and on the same day, to wit, the said 12th day of July, 1920, the said city council duly and regularly passed and adopted Resolution of Intention No. 19," in words and figures following, to wit: (The resolution in full follows.) "All of said work is to be done to the official line and grade in accordance with the said plans and specifications on file with the city clerk of said city of Daly City by the city engineer thereof on the 12th day of July, 1920, and which plans and specifications were adopted by the said board of trustees on the 12th day of July, 1920, as the official plans and specifications for said work, and reference is hereby made to said plans and specifications for further description of the said work and of the locations at which same is to be done and for further particulars."

[1] The complaints contain the further allegations that plaintiff commenced the work under its contract and caused the same to be completed as provided in said contract and specifications. The language in this respect is as follows:

"That said plaintiff fully performed on his part in every respect the said work, according to the specifications and terms of said contract, and with material complying with said specifications, all under the direction and to the satisfaction of the said superintendent of streets, and that the said work was duly approved and accepted by the said superintendent of streets."

The complaint contains a number of allegations of the same import as those we have above quoted, and we think it fully meets the objections now made by appellants. That appellants regarded the allegations of the complaint sufficient to put in issue the question of the "official line and grade" is made manifest by their denials and affirmative answers to the effect that no official grade had been established, and that the work had not been done to the "official line and grade."

The court, as well as the trustees of said city, upon the evidence presented in each proceeding, found against appellants on the objections above urged, as well as on all other litigated issues.

[2] The plans and specifications are not brought to our attention by the record, and, as the sufficiency of the same is not attacked, it must be presumed that they are regular in all respects and contain the matters to which reference is made by the resolution of intention as set forth in the complaint.

The judgments appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BAILEY et al. (Cr. 700.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 27, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 24, 1924.)

1. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Evidence as to character of I. W. W. held to sustain conviction of members for criminal syndicalism.

In prosecution of members of the I. W. W. for criminal syndicalism, in violation of St. 1919, p. 281, § 2, subd. 4, evidence as to character of organization held to sustain conviction.

2. Criminal law 🔑452(1)—Conclusions as to meaning of terms used and expressions found in books held admissible in prosecution for criminal syndicalism.

In prosecution of members of the I. W. W. for criminal syndicalism under St. 1919, p. 281, testimony of witnesses who derived their information while members of the organization and at meetings thereof as to meaning of certain terms used by members of organization, and as to whether passages from books expounding the doctrines of the organization indicated that it adhered to its former ideas, held admissible, though somewhat in the nature of conclusions.

3. Criminal law 🔑419, 420(1)—Testimony that members of I. W. W. had told witness that they had committed arson held not admissible.

In prosecution of members of the I. W. W. for criminal syndicalism, testimony that witness had talked to other members of the organization, who had told him that they had recently committed the crime of arson, held inadmissible.

4. Criminal law 🔑1169(2)—Erroneous admission of evidence held harmless, in view of other evidence.

In prosecution of members of I. W. W. for criminal syndicalism, testimony that witness had been told by other members that they had recently committed arson held harmless, in view of the large quantity of incriminating testimony presented against the defendants.

5. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—I. W. W. literature published before enactment of Syndicalism Act held admissible in prosecution thereunder.

In prosecution of members of the I. W. W. for criminal syndicalism under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, I. W. W. literature published prior to the passage of such act was admissible; the subsequent reformation of the organization being a matter of defense.

6. Criminal law 🔑400(1)—Parol evidence not admissible to prove contents of writings.

In prosecution of members of the I. W. W. for criminal syndicalism, parol evidence was not admissible to prove the contents of certain writings by which it was sought to prove that the organization had for some years renounced and condemned the policy which it at one time had advocated.

7. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Admission of list of I. W. W. members who had been arrested and charged with criminal syndicalism held error.

In prosecution of I. W. W. members for criminal syndicalism, in which an article contained in a magazine published under the authority of the organization, stating that the organization had adopted peaceful means for carrying out its objects, was introduced in evidence by the defendants, the admission in rebuttal of a list of members who had been arrested and charged with a violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act published in the same issue of such magazine, was erroneous.

8. Criminal law 🔑1169(2)—Erroneous admission of evidence held harmless, in view of other evidence proving defendant's guilt.

In prosecution of I. W. W. members for criminal syndicalism, the erroneous admission in evidence of a list of members of the organization who had been arrested and charged with criminal syndicalism held harmless, in view of other testimony by which defendants were overwhelmingly proven guilty.

9. Criminal law 🔑655(5)—Alleged misconduct of court held not ground for reversal.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism, remarks of court to defendant's attorney at different times held not ground for reversal, since jurors could not have been misled thereby.

10. Criminal law 🔑823(4)—Refusal of requested instruction defining "knowingly" held not error, in view of other instructions.

In prosecution of I. W. W. members for criminal syndicalism, refusal to instruct as to meaning of word "knowingly" held not ground for reversal, in view of other instructions on the subject of guilty knowledge.

11. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Instruction defining criminal syndicalism held not error.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, instructions defining the crime, though not as specific as they should be, held not erroneous.

A person who became a member of and engaged in a conspiracy to engage in advocating, teaching, or aiding and abetting criminal syndicalism, as defined by Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 1, was guilty of "criminal syndicalism."

13. Criminal law 🔑655(1), 706—Defendants charged with criminal syndicalism entitled to same fairness as persons charged with other offense, and prosecuting attorney and judge should use care in reception of evidence.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism the judge and the district attorney should exercise the most circumspect care in the presentation of evidence; the defendants in such a prosecution being entitled to the same fair and impartial trial as persons charged with any other crime.

14. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Statute requiring errors to be prejudicial does not change the rules of evidence.

Const. art. 6, § 4½, requiring an error to be prejudicial to constitute ground for reversal, does not change the rules of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Frank Bailey, William Joozdeff, P. Mellman, J. Orlando, John Wiza, F. Franklin, James Martin, and R. A. Gibson were convicted of criminal syndicalism, and from judgments of conviction and orders denying a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

R. W. Henderson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendants were jointly tried under an indictment found and presented to the superior court of Sacramento county by the grand jury of said county, charging them with the crime of "criminal syndicalism." The charge was based on subdivision 4 of section 2 of the "Criminal Syndicalism Act." Stats. 1919, p. 281. See, also, People v. Roe, 58 Cal. App. 690, 692, 209 Pac. 381; People v. Wagner et al. (Cr. 711) 184 Pac. 876, an opinion in which was filed by this court on February 21, 1924. The jury found each of the defendants guilty as charged, and they have brought the case here by appeals from the judgments and the orders denying them a new trial.

The verdicts are assailed on the grounds that there is no evidence which affords them sufficient support; that errors of a highly prejudicial character were committed by the trial court in rulings admitting and excluding certain evidence; that the court, during the progress of the trial, was guilty of misconduct which seriously militated against the rights of the accused in the trial of the charge against them, and that certain instructions proposed by the defendants were erroneously and to the positive prejudice of the rights of the accused disallowed.

The record here, in so far as its evidentiary features are concerned, is quite familiar to this court. Books, pamphlets, leaflets, magazines and other periodicals containing and setting forth in elaborate detail the principles and policies of the Industrial Workers of the World, and also containing dissertations and speeches by individuals upon the principles and ultimate aims thereof (all in the extreme commendatory and laudatory of the organization and its objects), were introduced in evidence, and are in the record as it is presented to this court. This documentary evidence is in all substantial respects the same evidence of that character which has been introduced in every case involving the prosecution of the same crime against others which, in the last three years, has been appealed to and reviewed by the Supreme and the appellate courts of this state, as we learn from the opinions in those cases. See People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 203 Pac. 78; People v. Taylor, 187 Cal. 378, 203 Pac. 85; People v. Roe, 58 Cal. App. 690, 209 Pac. 381; People v. La Rue et al. (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 627; People v. Flanagan et al. (Cal. App.) 223 Pac. 1014. In the opinions in the cases just named, the principles and purposes of the organization, as disclosed by its literature introduced in evidence in said cases and in this, are sufficiently set out to make it clear that the ultimate end of said organization is to completely destroy the existing systems of governments of the United States and the states, and substitute therefor a sort of cooperative government, or what the members of the organization denominate "a system of industrial democracy," the effect of the establishment of which would be to overthrow capitalism, and, to use plain terms, to destroy existing vested rights. To accomplish this radical result the organization proposes to take control of all machinery of industry, and all persons who work are to partake equally in the fruits of all industrial activities. The organization, so it is declared in its platform of principles, as the same is paraphrased by some of its members in magazines published by its author, "is not only industrial in form, but revolutionary in character," and is "based on the principle that 'the working class and the employing class have nothing in common,' and that 'labor is entitled to all it produces.'" According to the same interpreters of its creed, the capitalists are thieves and parasites, and their "sacred" property is plunder and "the state, church, press, and universities are tools of the exploiters," and that upon these institutions the members of said organization "look with contempt." There are in the numerous magazines, books, and literature in other forms, all published and circulated by and under the authority of said organization, many details of how its great ultimate object can be accomplished. It is unnecessary to give these space herein. It is enough to say, generally, that the methods openly advocated by the organization for overthrowing the capitalistic class, are, among others, to cause strikes, shirk the work to which the members may be assigned by employers, and to do any other act which may discommode the employers or cause their enterprises to become unprofitable; that if any attempt be made by the capitalists to close down their industries or cease operating them because of the labor conditions thus brought about, then the members themselves shall refuse to cease working, and, if necessary, take control of the industrial plants in which they may be employed and operate them.

The witnesses Townsend, Coutts, and Arada (the two first named ex-members of the said organization), each detailing the circumstances of crimes and other atrocities committed by members of the organization to further the ends thereof, again appear in the instant case as witnesses for the prosecution. Their stories of the crimes committed (arson in particular) at various points in the San Joaquin valley and other points in this and other states of the Union in the years 1916, 1917, 1918, 1920, and some other crimes as late as the year 1922, by the members of the organization, and resulting in the destruction of many thousands of dollars worth of property, as given in this case, are familiar chapters in a number of the judicial opinions of the higher courts of this state. The purpose sought to be attained by the commission of those crimes was, according to these witnesses, in accord with the then established policy of the organization to create throughout the state a reign of terror, in the hope that thus the people—the producers, capitalists, and employers generally—would, if not actually yielding to or acquiescing in the ultimate demands or objects of that organization, be so instilled with fear and alarm, and, indeed, utter helplesness, against an enemy carrying on its criminal warfare with a cunning subtlety that challenged detection, that would induce them to offer a sort of "armistice" or a plan of compromise which would operate only as a wedge for driving deep into our soil the radical and revolutionary principles of government for which that organization avowedly stands. It is unnecessary to repeat herein in detail the stories told by the witnesses referred to. It is conceded by counsel for the defendants that all the testimony in this case is substantially a repetition of the testimony in the cases above named.

[1] There can exist no ground for doubting that the testimony thus referred to is amply sufficient to support the verdicts. The defendants, proceeding upon the claim that since the commission of the offenses or the crimes concerning which Townsend and Coutts testified the organization had entirely changed its policy for carrying out its ultimate objects, introduced a number of witnesses, either members of the organization or former members thereof, who testified that the executive board of the Industrial Workers of the World had held a session at which were adopted resolutions denouncing and proclaiming against the resort by the members of the organization to the commission of acts of violence of any character in furtherance of the purposes thereof. Documentary evidence was also introduced to the same effect. Some of the witnesses for the defense testified that all literature containing either express or implied advocacy of acts of sabotage or other criminal violence as the means for accomplishing the purposes of the organization had been destroyed several years ago, or subsequently to the passage of the Criminal Syndicalism Act. They explained, however, that the destruction of said literature was because the Industrial Workers of the World did not desire to get into trouble with the courts. They also testified that they had never heard any member or members of the organization advocate acts of sabotage or other crimes for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the organization. Much of this testimony is at positive variance from the testimony of Townsend and Coutts, who stated that, while the literature advocating criminal violence by the members of the organization might have been destroyed at the time mentioned by the witnesses for the defense, such act was merely a subterfuge, and that it was understood among the members that the same destructive policy should be pursued as it had always been by said organization. It was for the jury to determine whether the testimony of the witnesses referred to or the documentary evidence introduced involved a statement or representation of the truth.

In the case of the People v. Roe, 58 Cal. App. 690, 209 Pac. 381, we declared that there is nothing, so far as we may judge from what on their face they purport to be, in the principles advocated by the Industrial Workers of the World which they are not at liberty to advocate. We still adhere to that declaration. In other words, we are not inclined to hold that, upon the face of its platform of principles, in advocating the practical application thereof, the Industrial Workers of the World are not within the rights guaranteed to all citizens by the federal and state Constitutions. It is obvious, though, that the scheme proposed to be established by the organization for the government of society is wholly fanciful and impractical. It is, indeed, a paradoxical notion of government. It would seem to involve a recidivation to that primitive society in which might stood for right. The jury would be entitled to weigh these considerations, in connection with the testimony showing that violent methods had been resorted to by the organization, in determining whether the said organization had reformed or still believed in, advocated, taught, and sanctioned such methods for establishing its propaganda.

The rulings as to the evidence and of which the defendants complain are very much of the same character as those considered in People v. Wagner et al. (Cr. 711), supra. A general reference to and consideration of these assignments will therefore be sufficient.

[2] The specific claim as to certain testimony given by the witnesses Townsend and Coutts is that they, in explaining the operations of the organization, were permitted to express their opinions and conclusions. For instance, Townsend was examined in detail, in connection with the alleged acts of violence advocated by the organization, with regard to the meaning of certain words or terms or phrases employed by the members of said organization in expressing the various criminal acts which were perpetrated or to be perpetrated by them in effecting its purpose to create a general state of terrorism among the people, particularly employers. Among numerous other questions on these lines, he was asked if he knew what the members understood from the term "sab cat," to which he replied that it had reference to those members who were engaged in commiting acts of sabotage. He further testified that, when property had been destroyed by members either by acts of sabotage or arson, the expression understood among the members was that the "cat had been turned loose." He was also asked what was understood by the members by the terms "scissorsbills" and "highjacking," and other terms wholly unintelligible to one not a member of the organization and who has not read its literature or heard those terms explained. "Scissorsbills," as a part of the nomenclature of the organization, he explained, referred to members of labor unions, with whom the Industrial Workers of the World were as much at war as they were with the capitalistic class, because the labor unions necessarily recognize the rights of employers, and that "high-jacking" referred to the robbery of "scissorsbills" or other persons not connected with the organization, a principle, so Townsend declared, which the organization fully indorsed as one of the means for disrupting labor organizations and creating terror among the people generally. These and other statements too numerous to mention specifically herein, relative to the methods adopted, practiced, and advocated by the organization as in aid of the attainment of its paramount objects, constituted largely the testimony of the witnesses Townsend and Coutts, which, as is the claim, involved the expression of the opinions and conclusions of those witnesses.

Townsend and Coutts testified that all the information they had obtained as to the methods of the organization for forcing its propaganda upon the people and all that they knew as to the meaning of the various cryptic terms employed by the members in indicating acts of violence which had been and which were proposed to be committed was acquired while they were members of the organization, and at meetings when the matters referred to were discussed and explained. We do not think that this testimony is subject to the objections urged against it. It is true that now and then the witnesses expressed their conclusions, but, considering their testimony as a whole, it cannot justly be said that the matters to which they testified did not constitute facts competent to be established in the case and pertinent to the issue. Naturally, in a case dependent for its establishment, as this is, upon the proof of certain political doctrines or principles, it would not be surprising if a witness giving testimony regarding the scope and the designed effect of those principles would occasionally make a statement involving more or less of an opinion or a conclusion, but such an opinion or conclusion under such circumstances would and should be regarded as a statement of facts where made by one who has indorsed, habitually practiced and followed said principles. Of course, a general commentary or dissertation upon the principles or doctrines, unless a defendant on trial was himself the author thereof, or unless shown to have been published or adopted by the organization itself, would not be admissible. It may further be explained that the same objection is urged here against the testimony of the witness Townsend with regard to the principles advocated by the organization as they were set forth in a book purporting to have been published under the authority of the organization. The witness was shown the book and asked by the district attorney whether or not he could find therein any language indicating that "the I. W. W. holds the same sort of ideas that it formerly had." Several such questions based upon the book were propounded by the district attorney, objected to by the defendants, and the objections overruled. As we understand the record, the witness, in response to those questions, merely read certain passages from the book to which his attention was called by the district attorney setting forth the principles of the organization, and answered the questions in the affirmative. We can perceive no reason for holding that the testimony thus elicited was not competent. No question was raised as to the meaning of the passages read by the witness to the jury, and it was proper for the latter to state whether or not the organization still adhered to the doctrines promulgated in said book to which his attention was directed by the district attorney.

Speaking generally of the character of the documentary evidence introduced in the case, it is to be remarked that, in a case of the character of the one before us, it would be difficult to present the theory of the people without securing from those who had been members of the organization, and who had made a study of the principles thereof, as Townsend and Coutts declared that they had, a statement as to what they understood to be the meaning and purpose of those principles. Certainly such testimony by witnesses who admitted that they had been members of the organization and had participated in acts involving the practical application of the principles of the organization would be competent and proper.

[3, 4] It is further contended that the testimony of Townsend to the effect that he had met and talked with other members of the organization when he was a member thereof, and that they had told him that they had but recently committed the crime of arson by setting fire to a number of buildings in the San Joaquin valley, was hearsay, and, therefore, incompetent. The Attorney General argues that this testimony was admissible upon the theory that the Industrial Workers of the World constituted a confederation or combination whose purpose was to accomplish its objects by unlawful or criminal means, and that it is a continuing conspiracy, and will remain so until its ultimate objects are accomplished; that therefore any acts or declarations of any members of the organization regarding the criminal activities thereof, whensoever made, are admissible under the rule. But the point has been decided the other way by the cases. See People v. La Rue (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 627; People v. Flanagan (Cal. App.) 223 Pac. 627, and the cases therein cited. It must therefore be held that the admission of that testimony was error, but, in view of the large quantity of incriminatory testimony presented against the defendants herein, we must conclude that, notwithstanding said error, a miscarriage of justice will not result therefrom.

[5] It is contended that much of the literature introduced by the people and allowed by the court, advocating, at least by implication, acts of violence by its members, was irrelevant to the case because of having been published a long time anterior to the passage of the Syndicalism Act. Some of this literature was of "ancient vintage"—that is to say, published prior to the passage of said act. But it was published under the authority of the I. W. W. and, as stated, some of it advocated, though in an indirect way, the resort to unlawful activities to carry out its great central idea. This evidence was not irrelevant or incompetent. Whether the organization had subsequently to the publication of said literature receded from the policies therein advocated and is now opposed to the employment of unlawful means for the achievement of its ends and aims was a matter of defense; and, even upon the introduction of evidence by the defense designed and tending to show that the organization no longer advocated the methods set out in the said literature as a part of its program to change our systems of government, it was for the jury to determine from all the evidence whether it had reformed its methods to accomplish its point, and, in thus considering the evidence, the jury, for the purpose of measuring its weight or probative value, were at liberty to, and, we may assume, did, take into account the fact that said literature had been published many years before the Syndicalism Act was passed. It is further to be assumed from the verdict that that fact did not in the minds of the jury detract any from the evidentiary significance of said literature.

There are several other assignments involving the same proposition as the one just considered. In reply to all such objections, we can say that no sound reason occurs to us why all the literature published by said organization, and which is shown to contain authoritative statements and interpretations of its purposes, principles, policies, activities, and methods of accomplishing results, is not competent evidence in a prosecution under the Criminal Syndicalism Act, regardless of the time at which such literature was so published and issued. None of the literature of the organization received in evidence in this case showed or tended to show any other crime than that charged in the indictments, to wit, that the defendants became and were members of the organization with knowledge of its unlawful character. It follows, therefore, that the cases cited by counsel for the defendants, notably, People v. Glass, 158 Cal. 650, 112 Pac. 281, are not in point.

[6] The complaint that the court erroneously excluded certain evidence offered by the defense is without substantial merit. There are many of these assignments, and we will not attempt to give them specific notice herein. It will be sufficient to say, generally, that much of the evidence offered by the defense and excluded by the court was incompetent in that it involved an attempt to prove the contents of certain writings by parol. The court permitted the defendants to introduce a large amount of evidence tending to show that the organization for some years last past had renounced and condemned the policy which once it had advocated of pressing its principles to the accomplishment of its purposes by unlawful methods. Indeed, the court seemed to give the defense considerable latitude in the matter of the introduction of evidence tending to show that the organization had not for many years advocated or believed in the practice of criminal acts as in furtherance of its objects.

[7, 8] The defense introduced in evidence an article contained in a magazine published in the year 1920 under the authority of the I. W. W., stating that said organization had adopted peaceable means for carrying out its objects, and that it was unalterably opposed to the use of violence or criminal acts for its purposes. In rebuttal, to offset the effect of said article the district attorney was permitted to introduce in evidence a list (published in the same issue of said magazine) of the members of the I W W who had been arrested and charged with a violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, some being convicted, others acquitted, and others as to whom indictments were dismissed, all these proceedings being inaugurated subsequent to the time at which, according to said magazine article, the organization declared that acts of criminal syndicalism would no longer be practiced or sanctioned as a part of its program. The ruling allowing that testimony was clearly erroneous. A man cannot be convicted of crime by proof of the fact that he had previously been convicted of or charged with a similar or some other crime. The fact that these men were arrested, prosecuted, and convicted or acquitted would not be competent proof that the organization continued to preach and practice acts of sabotage. But we cannot believe that the testimony operated prejudicially against the defendants. We doubt not that there was not a member of the jury trying the defendants here but that knew that since the date of the publication of the magazine referred to (in the year 1920) there had been many prosecutions and convictions under the Syndicalism Act in the state of California. At all events, the testimony of guilt in this case is so overwhelming that we cannot well say that a miscarriage of justice will result from the upholding of the verdicts herein, notwithstanding the error adverted to.

[9] Certain misconduct on the part of the trial court is assigned. There is so large a number of specifications under this head that it would be impossible to notice all of them. The alleged misconduct occurred at different times during the trial, and involved remarks of the court when ruling on objections to certain evidence. On one occasion, when counsel for the defendants was examining his own witness and endeavoring to keep him within the scope of the questions asked, the court, in effect, stated that greater progress would be made in the trial if the attorney for the defendant would take the witness stand and let the defendant take the chair of the attorney. On another occasion the court, in the course of a discussion with the attorney for the defendant relative to the admissibility of certain testimony, addressing the said attorney, said, "If you want to show the transactions of your organization, why it is your duty to present the best evidence of it." It is further complained that the court, in ruling upon an objection to the cross-examination of one of the witnesses for the defense (a member of the organization) as to a certain provision of the constitution of the I. W. W., said:

> "That portion of the constitution was read in evidence by Mr. Cowan (assistant district attorney) this morning which provides that the official literature shall bear or carry the seal of the organization."

It is also claimed that the court prejudiced the rights of the defendants by unjustifiably rebuking one of the attorneys for the defense. The incident arose as follows: One of the witnesses for the defense was testifying as to the form of an application for membership of the organization, and upon being shown by the district attorney a blank form purporting to be such an application identified the same as the ordinary form of application. He was then asked some other questions concerning the application, when the attorney for the defendants objected to further examination with reference thereto on the ground that the witness had failed to identify it as the official form of application. The witness interrupted, and said, "Well, your Honor, I did not fail to identify it. I absolutely do identify it"; to which counsel for the defendants remarked, "I suppose the witness wants to correct his answer"; and the witness replied, "No corrections." After further discussion, the attorney for the defendants stated: "I note an exception to the remark of the court as intimating that I have deliberately misstated a statement of the witness"; to which the court replied, "You are mistaken. The court did not intimate anything. The court means just what it said, and does not mean anything else but what it did say, and does not intimate anything else."

The above constitute the principal grounds upon which it is urged that the court was guilty of misconduct which seriously prejudiced the rights of the accused The court should have omitted some of the remarks referred to; but we see nothing in any of them which would justify this court in holding that a jury of intelligent men and women would be influenced thereby in determining so serious a question as that of the guilt or innocence of persons charged with a public offense.

[10] The next and the last consideration will be as to the complaint that the court erred in giving and refusing to give certain instructions. The defense proposed an instruction upon the question of scienter which was considered in the case of People v. Wagner et al. (Cr. 711), supra, and therein it was held that said instruction was not wholly a correct statement of the law, and that the court, having elsewhere in its charge, as it did in this case, given two instructions which, rationally construed, as presumptively they were so construed and understood by the jury, was not required to accept the instruction proposed by the defendant and give it to the jury after so modifying it as to make it conform to a correct statement of the law. We held in the Wagner Case, following the case of People v. Flanagan, supra, that scienter or guilty knowledge was an essential element of the offense charged in the indictment there, and we reaffirm our adherence to the conclusion so reached. The court here, as in the Wagner Case, read the section of the Criminal Syndicalism Act upon which the indictment here is predicated, and also gave another instruction in which it was plainly stated that persons charged under that section of the act must be shown to have knowingly joined or become members of the organization, and by this it was intended to be said, as the instruction certainly must be construed to mean, that "knowingly" meant guilty knowledge or knowledge of the unlawful character of the organization when they became and remained members thereof. The court also gave an instruction proposed by the defendants, which was to the effect that evidence as to certain acts done and declarations made by certain members of the Industrial Workers of the World should be considered solely for the purpose of enabling the jury to determine whether the said organization was organized "to teach, practice, advocate, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism, as that term has elsewhere been defined to you in these instructions." This instruction was clearly founded upon the theory that the gist of the offense was in the means by which the said organization proposed to carry out its objects, and it seems to us would necessarily imply that persons, to be guilty of the offense charged, must have had knowledge, when becoming members or remaining such, of the criminal methods advocated by the organization. The court, however, did reject the following instruction proposed by the defense: "The word 'knowingly,' as used in this indictment, means knowing the Industrial Workers of the World was organized for the purposes charged in the indictment." This instruction could and should have been phrased in such language as to have made the proposition therein declared more complete or as the statute itself defines the crime of criminal syndicalism; but it would not have been improper to give it in its present form. We do not think, however, in view of the entire record and the abundance of proof of guilt, that a miscarriage of justice has resulted or will result from the verdicts by reason of the refusal of the court to accept and give said instruction. In fact, we cannot persuade ourselves that the jury were not sufficiently enlightened upon the subject of knowledge by the instructions given. It will be borne in mind that the court in this case did not, as in the case of People v. Flanagan, orally interpret to the jury, contrary to what we conceive to be the proper meaning and intent of subdivision 4 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, the written instructions given upon the subject of scienter or guilty knowledge.

It is further contended that the court erred in giving the following instruction, the claim being that it does not contain a correct statement of the law of the case:

> "You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the I. W. W. organization and its members was, at the time charged in the indictment, engaged in a conspiracy which had for its object the commission of the acts denounced by the criminal syndicalism statute of this state, and which I have read to you, and if you further believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that such conspiracy, if conspiracy there be, on the part of the I. W. W. organization and its members, was still continuing, at the time charged in the indictment, not having yet accomplished its purpose, and if you further find that the defendants, or either of them, knowingly became members of the said I. W. W. organization, and continued such membership at the time charged in the indictment, then I instruct you that by so knowingly becoming members of such organization they thereby adopted and became coconspirators, and it is your duty to return a verdict of guilty as charged."

[11, 12] The above instruction is not as specific as it should be, but we are unable to see that it is in any respect erroneous. It in a very general way states the law correctly. Certainly if any person became a member of and engaged in a conspiracy which had for its object the commission of the acts denounced by the criminal syndicalism statute of this state—that is, to engage in advocating, teaching, or aiding and abetting criminal syndicalism as the same is defined by section 1 of said act—he would be guilty of the crime charged in the indictment. The court in this case gave several instructions correctly explaining the essentials of the crime of conspiracy.

We have now considered, in a very general way, it is true, the more important points urged for a reversal. It cannot be denied that in a number of instances the court committed error in the reception and exclusion of evidence; but, viewing the record as a whole, and accepting the evidence, as we must, at its face value, we are unable to persuade ourselves that from any errors committed in the trial of the case a miscarriage of justice has been or will be the consequence of the verdicts returned.

[13, 14] We may with propriety take occasion to remark that in the trial of cases of this character the judge presiding and the district attorney prosecuting should exercise the most circumspect care in the matter of the presentation of evidence to support the charge preferred against the accused. The defendants in a criminal syndicalism prosecution are entitled to the same fair and impartial trial as are persons charged with any other offense known to the law. Nothing should be brought into the record, either by way of side remarks or upon any unsupported pretext whatsoever, which is not relevant and competent and calculated to aid in a just determination of the ultimate question of the guilt or innocence of the accused. It should also at all times be borne in mind that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution was never intended as a shield for the torturing of the rules of evidence. These rules are the same to-day as they have always been, and they alone should be the guide in the trial of all cases, whether criminal or civil. These remarks are addressed to all judges and district attorneys trying cases of a similar character.

For the reason herein given, the judgment and the order as to each of the defendants are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TOU JUE. (Cr. 1146.)

1. Criminal law ⚷1159(4)—Credibility of witnesses not reviewable.

Unless the testimony is insufficient to support the verdict, or is wholly improbable, the decision of trial court, and jury, on the credibility of a witness, will not be disturbed.

2. Criminal law ⚷1153(4)—Witnesses ⚷330(1)—Extent of cross-examination, to determine credibility, discretionary, and reviewable only for abuse of discretion.

The extent of cross-examination of a witness to determine his credibility is within the court's discretion, and reviewable only for abuse thereof.

3. Criminal law ⚷1169(1) — Admission of weapon carried concealed by defendant, in narcotic prosecution, not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for selling narcotics, admission of a weapon, carried concealed by defendant when arrested, though irrelevant, held not prejudicial.

4. Criminal law ⚷1172(2)—Instruction as to credibility of testimony held not prejudicial.

An instruction, that "a witness that is false in one material part of his testimony may be mistrusted in other parts," though followed by particular emphasis on fact that falsity in "material" evidence alone must be considered, held not prejudicial, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Tou Jue was convicted of violating the act relating to the sale and use of poisonous drugs, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Peckham, of San Jose, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was convicted of a violation of the act relating to the sale and use of poisonous drugs. Two inspectors employed by the state board of pharmacy laid a trap for defendant, and on the day in question posted themselves directly across the street from defendant's place of business. From this point they observed the witness Bowman, who was acting under their instructions, enter defendant's restaurant and engage him in conversation. Thereafter Bowman left the restaurant and was followed a short time after by the defendant. The two met on the street and shook hands. At this point the two inspectors approached and arrested the defendant and Bowman, and an immediate search disclosed that the defendant had in his possession three silver coins which had previously been marked by the inspectors and delivered to Bowman for the purpose, and that Bowman had in his possession a small package containing morphine, which he testified he had obtained from the defendant in exchange for these coins. Testimony was offered that at the time of the arrest a revolver was found in the pocket of defendant, and this was offered in evidence during the course of the trial.

The appeal is based upon the claim that the whole case was framed upon the appellant, and that the witness Bowman and one of the inspectors employed by the state board of pharmacy were men of questionable character and bad reputation, and that for this reason their testimony should have been wholly disregarded. It was further argued in this connection that the trial court unreasonably curtailed the cross-examination of these witnesses, which was directed to the purpose of disclosing their reputations. Some criticism is also made of the instructions which the trial court gave to the jury.

[1] In cases of this nature the appellate courts must necessarily rely upon the trial court to see that substantial justice is given to the party on trial. It is impossible for this court to analyze the testimony of the witnesses as written in the record and from that analysis to determine whether such witnesses are entitled to be believed. In the trial of the action all these witnesses must appear before the trial court and the jury, and it is the function of the jury, in the first instance, and of the trial court, after verdict, to pass on the credibility of the witnesses who have appeared before them. Unless the testimony which appears in the record is insufficient to support the verdict or is wholly improbable, we are not in a position to disturb the verdict.

[2] Complaint is made that the trial court unnecessarily limited the cross-examination of the witness McEnerney, who had been called by the prosecution. The criticism is directed to that part of the cross-examination relating to the credibility of this witness. It has been frequently held that the extent to which such cross-examination may be pursued is within the discretion of the trial court, and we do not believe that in this instance this discretion was abused.

[3] One of the witnesses testified that when the appellant was arrested he was carrying a concealed weapon, and this weapon was then offered in evidence. The arrest was made upon a charge of selling narcotics, and we do not see the relevancy of the offer of the weapon; but we cannot say that its admission was error prejudicial to the cause of the appellant.

[4] Particular criticism is made of the instruction advising the jury that "a witness that is false in one material part of his testimony may be mistrusted in other parts." It is said that in adding the word "material" to the instruction the court went beyond the provisions of section 2061, subd. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Stress is laid upon the fact that the trial court followed this instruction with particular emphasis of the fact that falsity in material evidence alone must be considered. The portion of the instruction quoted has heretofore been approved by the Supreme Court. People v. Plyler, 121 Cal. 160, 53 Pac. 553. We have carefully examined the instructions which were given, and, taking them in their entirety, we do not find any prejudicial error.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TORTERICE. (Cr. 1056.)

1. Perjury 🔑7—False oath for marriage license an offense.

In view of Pen. Code, § 118, defining perjury, not limiting oath to court proceeding and Civ. Code, § 69, stating requisites for issuance of license to marry female under age of 18 years, information alleging that defendant, to obtain license, made affidavit that female was then of age of 19 years, well knowing that statement of age was false, stated public offense.

2. Perjury 🔑22—Information held to allege that officer before whom oath administered had jurisdiction to issue marriage license.

Certificate at end of affidavit, set forth in information showing that affidavit to procure license to marry was subscribed and sworn to before deputy county clerk, held sufficient to show that officer had jurisdiction to issue marriage license.

3. Perjury 🔑33(8)—Evidence showed perjury in procuring marriage license.

Evidence held to leave no reasonable doubt that female was under age of 18 years, which fact was known to defendant, and that she had not been previously married, and supported conviction for perjury in oath before deputy county clerk to obtain license to marry.

4. Perjury 🔑10—Irregularity in taking oath not defense.

In prosecution for perjury under Pen. Code, § 129, it is by section 121 no defense that oath was administered in irregular manner, if accused caused officer to certify that it had been taken or administered.

5. Criminal law 🔑829(12)—Refusal of instruction on proof of corroborating circumstances held without prejudicial error.

Where age of female, alleged in defendant's affidavit to obtain marriage license to be 19 years, was proved to be less than 18 years, and, although record contained testimony of only one witness that he subscribed to affidavit, affidavit and fact that license was issued at same time were corroborative circumstances, and birth certificate under St. 1919, p. 448, § 21, was prima facie evidence, defendant was not prejudiced by refusal to instruct that before accepting corroborating circumstances jury must test sufficiency of circumstances alone without aid of other testimony, where court instructed on rule of Code Civ. Proc. § 1968, providing that perjury must be proved by two witnesses or one witness and corroborating circumstances.

6. Criminal law 🔑553—Jury not bound to decide in conformity to mere numbers of witnesses.

Jury is not bound to decide in conformity with declarations of number of witnesses which do not produce convictions in their minds against less number or against presumption or other evidence satisfying their minds.

7. Perjury 🔑37(3)—Instruction held applicable to testimony.

In prosecution for perjury in procuring license to marry female under legal age, instruction that if jury found that clerk required defendant to make affidavit and subscribe to it and at same time required him to take oath prescribed and that oath was administered and that marriage license was issued thereon, etc., held not inapplicable though the evidence showed the oath was administered with reference to application blank rather than in connection with signing the affidavit.

8. Perjury 🔑10—Contention that oath was to application blank and not to affidavit held without merit.

In prosecution for perjury, contention that if defendant only swore to the truth of facts contained in application blank for marriage license it would not constitute crime was without merit.

9. Criminal law 🔑834(1)—Refusal of instruction with concrete examples of criminal intent not error.

In perjury prosecution where instruction defined criminal intent necessary and was complete without concrete examples, there was no error in refusing illustrative additions thereto.

10. Criminal law 🔑788—Refusal of instruction on unexplained failure to call material witness held not error.

In prosecution for perjury in procuring license to marry female not of legal age where defendant stated that female's mother had said that daughter was going to be 19, there was no error in refusing instruction as to inference from unexplained failure to call material witness, as witness was available as well to defendant as to state.

11. Criminal law 🔑814(5)—Refusal of instruction defining elements of perjury held without error.

Where information not only charged that defendant made and subscribed to affidavit to procure marriage license, but also that he did falsely depose and swear, etc., there was no error in refusing instruction which defined elements of perjury and kind of evidence necessary, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1968, to prove it, which limited charges of perjury on affidavit.

12. Criminal law 🔑402(1)—Foundation properly laid for introduction of affidavit to procure marriage license.

Where deputy clerk stated that facts as stated in affidavit to procure marriage license were transferred from statement of facts in application blank and that defendant made oath to their truth, in view of Pen. Code, § 118, foundation was sufficiently laid for introduction of affidavit.

13. Criminal law 🔑429(1)—Birth certificate of female properly admissible in prosecution for perjury in procuring marriage license.

In prosecution for perjury in procuring license to marry female not of lawful age, in view of St. 1919, p. 448, § 21, making birth certificates prima facie evidence of facts therein stated, exhibit purporting to be birth certificate of female held properly admitted.

14. Criminal law 🔑696(5)—Denying motion to strike after evidence received held not abuse of discretion.

Where there was no timely objection to admission of application blank to procure license to marry female not of lawful age because no foundation was laid as to oral testimony as to its contents, there was no error in overruling motion to strike after testimony had been given.

15. Criminal law 🔑1128(1)—Assignment of error not sustained by record not considered.

Assignment of error not sustained by record cannot be considered.

16. Criminal law 🔑1129(1)—Misconduct in offer of incompetent witness not considered where not assigned as error.

Misconduct in an offer by the state as a witness of a girl who admitted she had been married to defendant cannot be considered when not assigned as error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Victor Torterice was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. Morgan Marmaduke, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial in an action wherein he was convicted of the crime of perjury.

The alleged act of perjury related to an oath, taken by the defendant before a deputy county clerk of Orange county, for the purpose of obtaining a license to marry one Jennie Patt. In the information it is alleged that for the stated purpose the defendant made and subscribed his name to an affidavit which stated, among other things, that Jennie Patt was then of the age of 19 years; that said affidavit was delivered to said officer by the defendant as true; that the defendant then and there well knew that the statement that said Jennie Patt was of the age of 19 years was false, and that in fact her age was 17 years; that the defendant did then and there willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, falsely, and feloniously depose and swear that said Jennie Patt was of the age of 19 years, well knowing at the time that she was not of the age of 19 years, but in truth and in fact was of the age of 17 years; that the marriage license applied for was then and there issued by the deputy clerk, by whom the defendant was duly sworn to testify and certify truly concerning the matters stated in said affidavit.

[1] Appellant contends, first, that the information does not state a public offense, and does not allege commission of the crime of perjury. Counsel for appellant contends that the making of a false affidavit, as alleged in the information, is not a public offense, except when intended to be used in a court proceeding. The sole authority cited by him in support of this proposition does not sustain his contention. Section 118 of the Penal Code, defining perjury, is not in terms limited to the taking of an oath in a court proceeding. We are not aware of any decision which limits the section in that manner. Section 69 of the Civil Code states the facts which must appear in order to authorize the issuance of a license to marry a female who is under the age of 18 years and who has not previously been married.

> "For the purpose of ascertaining all the facts mentioned or required in this section, the clerk, at the time the license is applied for, may, if he deems it necessary in order to satisfy himself as to matters in this section enumerated, examine the male applicant for a license on oath, which examination shall be reduced to writing by the clerk, and subscribed by him."

It thus appears that the oath was administered in a case provided by law, and related to a material matter concerning which, according to the information, the defendant knew that his statement was false.

[2] It is further contended by appellant that the information is lacking in a vital element necessary to properly charge the offense of perjury, in that there is no allegation that the person or officer before whom the oath was taken or affidavit made was a person then having jurisdiction of the proceeding in which the oath was administered or affidavit made and filed. The information shows that the deputy clerk before whom the oath was taken was acting in behalf of the clerk in the matter of the issuance of said marriage license. The certificate at the end of the affidavit immediately following the signature of the defendant sets forth that the affidavit was subscribed and sworn to before the county clerk, acting by said deputy. These facts were sufficient to show that the officer then and there had jurisdiction of the proceeding, to wit, the issuance of the marriage license.

[3] It is next contended by appellant that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, in that perjury is not proven thereby. We have read the evidence on which counsel relies in support of this contention. Among other things, the deputy clerk testified that the applicant was sworn to the truth of the information set forth in the application blank; that the facts were then written out by the clerk (by transfer from the application) as an affidavit. "Then I had him swear to this affidavit and then filled out the balance of it myself." There was no explanation showing what the witness intended by the phrase "then filled out the balance of it myself." But the "balance of it," so far as appears, consisted of nothing more than the jurat or officer's certificate to the oath. It is true that, according to the testimony of the officer, the information to which the oath referred, as administered by him at that time, was the information contained in the application blank; that the formal affidavit itself had not yet been written, signed, or certified. It is upon this claimed irregularity in the transaction that appellant bases a claim that the evidence does not prove that he made oath to the affidavit, and that the court erred in admitting the affidavit in evidence. But we think that since the oath was directed to the truth of the identical facts (the statements in the affidavit being contained in the application), and the application and the affidavit, together with the issuance of the license, were all parts of one transaction, this irregularity affords appellant no avenue of escape.

[4] It is provided in section 121 of the Penal Code that it is no defense to a prosecution for perjury that the oath was administered or taken in an irregular manner, "* * * if such accused caused or procured such officer to certify that the oath had been taken or administered." And section 129 of the Penal Code reads as follows:

> "Every person who, being required by law to make any return, statement, or report, under oath, willfully makes and delivers any such return, statement, or report, purporting to be under oath, knowing the same to be false in any particular, is guilty of perjury, whether such oath was in fact taken or not."

The evidence leaves no reasonable doubt that Jennie Patt was under the age of 18 years, and that this fact was well known to the defendant, who was her cousin. Only 3 months before making this affidavit he had been present at the family celebration of her seventeenth birthday. It may be true, as counsel contends, that there is no direct statement that Jennie Patt had not previously been married. It does appear, however, from the evidence of her father and other witnesses that she still bore the family name, and that down to the time of the transactions here in question she had lived with her parents as a member of their family. The entire tenor of the testimony not only assumes, but tends to prove, that this young girl had not previously been married.

Appellant claims that the court made certain errors in the instructions given to the jury, and in refusing to give certain instructions requested by the defendant. As the instructions are not numbered, we are obliged to identify them in a less convenient manner. (a) Refusing the instruction found in clerk's transcript, line 14, of page 30, to line 6, of page 32. (b) Instruction given; clerk's transcript, page 17, line 18, to page 18, line 9. (c) Instruction given; clerk's transcript, page 21, lines 5 to 8. (d) Instruction given; clerk's transcript, page 18, lines 21 to 24. (e) Instruction given; clerk's transcript, page 20, line 16, to page 21, line 3. (f) Instruction given; clerk's transcript, page 22, line 10, to page 24, line 9. (g) Instruction refused; clerk's transcript, page 27, line 20, to page 28, line 8. (h) Instruction refused; clerk's transcript, page 38, lines 9 to 15.

[5] Concerning the refused instruction "a": This was in substance an instruction containing and commenting upon section 1968 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that perjury must be proved by the testimony of two witnesses or one witness and corroborating circumstances. The proposed instruction, after quoting that section, states that—

> "Corroborating circumstances in this case would be such credible testimony, as standing alone and without the aid of any other testimony given during the trial would tend to prove the fact in question, to wit: that Jennie Patt was on the 11th day of June, 1923, under the age of 18 years and that defendant made and subscribed to the affidavit as set forth in the information, and in determining whether there is credible testimony of such corroborating circumstances in this case, you must test the sufficiency of such testimony by considering it alone and apart and without the aid of any other testimony which you have heard in this case and after considering such testimony alone and as if you had heard no other testimony in the case, you believe it tends to prove that the girl Jennie Patt was on the 11th day of June, 1923, under the age of 18 years and defendant made and subscribed to the affidavit set forth in the information, it is competent evidence for you to consider along with the testimony of the other witness to the same fact, if you believe there is such other credible testimony given by a witness, and unless you so find, in addition to the other necessary facts to be proven as set out in another part of this instruction, you should acquit the defendant."

The court did give an instruction (c) stating the rule as found in said section 1968, Code of Civil Procedure. The gist of appellant's complaint is that the court refused this instruction (a) which undertook to explain and apply to the case the meaning of the phrase "corroborating circumstances."

Assuming that there is no valid objection to the statement of the meaning and effect of the phrase "corroborating circumstances," as set forth in the requested instruction, yet we think that the refusal was not prejudicial error sufficient to warrant a reversal of the judgment in this case. The age of Jennie Patt was, by the testimony of at least two witnesses, proven to be less than 18 years. And, although the record contains the testimony of only one witness directly to the fact that the defendant made and subscribed to the affidavit, the affidavit itself, with the signature of the defendant appended thereto, and an official certificate in due form showing that it had been subscribed and sworn to by the defendant, together with the fact that the marriage license was issued to the defendant at the same time, are corroborating circumstances in relation to the testimony that the defendant made and subscribed to the affidavit. A properly certified record of any birth or death or marriage, registered as provided by law, is "prima facie evidence in all courts and places of the facts therein stated." Section 21 of the act concerning vital statistics, as amended; Stats. 1919, p. 448. These circumstances corroborating the testimony are so plain and easy to understand, and were so thoroughly established, without contradiction, that we cannot see how the defendant was prejudiced by failure of the court to tell the jury that before accepting such corroborating circumstances, together with the testimony of the witnesses tending to prove these particular issues of the facts, the jury must test the sufficiency of the testimony of such corroborating circumstances alone and apart and without the aid of any other testimony which they have heard in the case.

The instruction "b" pointed out the distinctions existing between direct and circumstantial evidence. The instruction "c" gave the rule stated in section 1968, Code of Civil Procedure, which we have set forth, in substance, in our discussion of the refused instruction "a." There was no error in giving these instructions.

[6] The court did not err in giving that part of the instruction "d" reading:

> "* * * The jury are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses which do not produce convictions in their minds against a less number, or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying their minds."

[7] The court did not err in giving the instruction (e), wherein the jury were instructed that if they should find "that the clerk at said time required of said Victor Torterice the making of an affidavit and the subscribing to the same, and that the same was done, and that at the same time the clerk required the said Victor Torterice to take the oath prescribed by law, and that said oath was administered to him, and that a marriage license was issued thereupon, that it would be immaterial as to whether a marriage ceremony was performed or not and the act of said clerk in requiring the oath to be administered would be conclusive as to its materiality." The argument is that this instruction could not be applicable under the testimony because the only testimony to the transaction in question showed without conflict with the oath was administered with reference to the application blank and not in connection with the writing out and signing of the affidavit. This argument is answered by the fact that the oath was administered, and the affidavit executed, as parts of one and the same transaction, and all for one and the same purpose. And, therefore, under the sections of the Penal Code and Civil Code above cited, the instruction was correct.

[8] The court did not err in giving the instruction "f," which instruction sets out the information. The point urged here is that the information, if found to be true, would not constitute a crime, and that, even if it did state the commission of a crime, the instruction is erroneous in view of the testimony which disproved that the defendant was sworn to answer truly any questions propounded to him relating to the age of the girl, but that the defendant only swore to the truth of the facts contained in the application blank. There is no merit in this assignment of error.

[9] The court did not err in refusing to give defendant's instruction "g." The court gave the first portion of this instruction, which defined the criminal intent necessary, but refused the illustrative additions thereto requested by the defendant. The instruction was complete without the concrete examples.

[10] It is contended that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction (h) requested by the defendant:

> "You are instructed that the unexplained failure to call and examine as a witness a person who has peculiar knowledge of material facts at issue warrants the inference that his testimony would have been unfavorable to the party to whom the witness was available and who would naturally be expected to produce him under the circumstances."

Appellant bases his claim of error on this point on the fact that defendant testified to a conversation with the mother and father of Jennie Patt wherein Mrs. Patt stated that Jennie was going to be 19 and Mr. Patt said 17 years old; that Mrs. Patt said her daughter would be 19 years old on the 23d day of February; that at the birthday party Mrs. Patt again stated that the girl's age was 19 years. Mrs. Patt was not called as a witness at the trial of this case. So far as appears, she easily might have been called to rebut this testimony of the defendant if it had not been true. But it is equally true that Mrs. Patt might have been called by the defendant to support his testimony concerning statements made by her if his testimony had been true. In view of the fact that the direct testimony of the witnesses, together with the registered certificate of birth, strongly establishes the fact that on the 23d day of February, 1923, the age of Jennie Patt was only 17 years, it becomes improbable that the mother would have stated at that time that the girl's age was 19 years. Under these circumstances, even assuming that the instruction itself states a correct rule of law, we hold that no prejudicial error was involved in the refusal to give the requested instruction.

[11] 9. The court did not err in refusing to give defendant's instruction (j), which defines the elements of the crime of perjury and the kind of evidence necessary, under section 1968, Code of Civil Procedure, to prove perjury. This instruction, as requested by defendant, limited the case of the prosecution to the charge that the defendant did under oath make and subscribe to the affidavit set forth in the information. It will be noted, however, that the information not only charged that the defendant made and subscribed his name to the affidavit, but also directly charged that at said time and place the defendant did falsely depose and swear, etc.

[12] Appellant contends that the court erred in overruling the objection of the defendant to the introduction in evidence of the so-called affidavit, as set forth in the information, and to the order of the court overruling the objection of the defendant to the admission of an exhibit purporting to be a birth certificate of one Jovana Patti. With reference to the affidavit the point is that the affidavit was secondary evidence, if it could have been evidence at all, and that no foundation had been laid for its admission; that in fact the witness Morrison, deputy clerk, testified that the so-called affidavit was written up and signed after the defendant had been sworn to the truth of the statements contained in the "application blank," which was first written; and that the application blank was not introduced in evidence. We find, however, that Morrison testified that the facts, as stated in the affidavit signed by the defendant, were transferred from the statement of facts set out in the application blank, and that the defendant made oath to the truth of those facts. In view of the provisions of the section of the Penal Code, to which we have referred, we think that a sufficient foundation was laid for the introduction in evidence of said affidavit.

[13] Concerning the birth certificate, appellant suggests that it was introduced in the hope that it would be a corroborating circumstance to support the direct testimony of Frank Patt that the girl was, on the 11th day of June, 1923, of the age of 17 years and not of the age of 19 years; that no other direct testimony than that of Frank Patt was given as to the age of the girl; that the birth certificate was inadmissible, particularly because no foundation was laid for its introduction. We have cited, supra, the statute by which such certificates are made admissible evidence. Frank Patt testified that the first name of his daughter, Jennie Patt, in Italian is spelled Jovana, and that the family name in Italian is Patti; that the name of Mrs. Patt in Italian is Vinguenza, and that her maiden name was Torterice. The record of the birth certificate, as introduced in evidence, shows the birth, on February 23, 1906, of a female child, Jovana Patti; that the father was Frank Patti, and that the mother's maiden name was Virgenia Tartarige. There is no reasonable doubt that this was the certificate of birth, filed on the date of her birth, of the said Jennie Patt. We find, also, that the sister of Jennie Patt testified that Jennie's age was "17 last February."

[14] Appellant claims that the court erred in overruling his objection to the testimony of witness Morrison as to what the so-called application blank contained, it not being in evidence and no foundation being laid as to oral testimony as to its contents. The "objection" was not a timely objection, but was a motion to strike out, after the testimony had been given. There was no abuse of discretion in denying this motion.

[15] On direct examination of Louise Proftia, sister of Jennie Patt, as a witness for the people, in response to the question:

> "What conversation did you hear between Victor Torterice, the defendant, and your father?"

She replied:

> "My father told him to get out of the house because he had a wife in Chicago; he shouldn't write to Jennie."

Then this occurred:

> "Q. What did he say, if anything? A. He didn't say anything; he said he didn't write that letter."

Defendant's counsel then said:

> "I ask that that answer be stricken out till I have the time to object, rather that part of it referring to the statements which have nothing to do—doesn't charge this defendant with any knowledge of the age of the girl—and ask that the jury be advised to disregard it."

This motion was denied. The terms of the motion are so indefinite and so placed in the record that we cannot say that they applied to anything except the last answer. The claim that the court erred to the prejudice of the defendant in refusing to strike out the statement indicating that the defendant had a wife in Chicago is not sustained by this record.

[16] Jennie Patt was introduced as a witness for the people. She stated that her age was 17 Counsel for defendant objected to the introduction of any testimony of the witness on the ground that she is the wife of the defendant. The court permitted defendant's counsel to ask preliminary questions on that point. He thereupon asked the witness: "Are you the wife of the defendant?" She replied, "No; because he has another wife in Chicago." On motion of counsel for defendant this answer was stricken out. The witness having then admitted that she did marry the defendant, she was not permitted to testify any farther. The court afterwards gave the instructions requested by the defendant to the effect that offers of evidence not allowed by the court are not to be considered as any evidence of the existence of the facts thus offered to be proven, and that the jury must not consider anything except the instructions of the court and the evidence produced at the trial. In connection with the offer of this evidence it is to be noticed that there is no assignment of misconduct in the offering of the testimony of this witness, so that that point cannot be considered at this time.

It is evident, from the record, that the defendant had a fair trial and was justly convicted.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ALLEN v. CROSS. (Civ. 4185.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 7, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 5, 1924.)

Specific performance 🔑29(1)—Parol contract to buy home in consideration for services held enforceable.

Parol contract to buy for another person home better than one referred to by name, in consideration for services to be rendered, held not too indefinite for enforcement, in view of evidence as to place referred to, and part performance by entering into a contract for purchase of home worth more than that referred to, in view of Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 6, and section 3538.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Louise C. Allen against B. C. Cross, executor of the last will and testament of B. F. Childs, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. L. Richardson, of San Diego, for appellant.

Henry C. Ryan and F. F. Grant, both of San Diego, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Plaintiff brought an action for damages against defendant as executor of the last will of B. F. Childs, deceased, based upon the failure of said Childs to comply with the terms of an alleged oral contract by which it was agreed that if plaintiff would give up her home in the state of Kansas and come to California with the said Childs and there continue to serve him as she had done in the state of Kansas in the capacity of housekeeper, cook, companion, and nurse so long as he lived, he would buy for plaintiff a home better than "Maple Crest" (which was the name of the home of said Childs in the state of Kansas), and that he would also see that plaintiff would be comfortable the rest of her life, and would afford her an opportunity to educate her young daughter Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

The points presented by appellant are: That the alleged contract was too indefinite and uncertain to admit of enforcement; that the findings of the court, the conclusions of law, and the judgment therein are not supported by the evidence.

The findings of the court were to the effect that the alleged contract was actually made by the parties; that pursuant thereto plaintiff performed her part of the agreement; that in accordance with said agreement and as a part thereof said Childs purchased a home for plaintiff in the city of San Diego, Cal., at an agreed price of $10,000 and caused the same to be conveyed to plaintiff; that said Childs paid in cash on said purchase the sum of $3,000, leaving a balance of $7,000 to be paid on or before five years, with 7 per cent. interest, in accordance with the terms of a promissory note secured by a mortgage on the premises executed by plaintiff at the request of said Childs; that Childs thereafter died without having paid said $7,000, the balance of the purchase money; that the plaintiff was obliged to and did pay interest on said indebtedness amounting to the sum of $490; and that she duly presented her claim for the sum of $7,490 against the estate of said Childs, which claim was by the defendant herein, as said executor, rejected. As conclusions of law, the court found that plaintiff was entitled to recover the sum of $7,490 from defendant, and judgment was ordered accordingly.

While the evidence in the case is not of that character which might be called conclusive, it is substantial in quality and fully authorizes the conclusions reached thereon by the trial court.

A general rule, supported by many authorities not only in this state, but as well in other jurisdictions, is that contracts of the nature of that upon which action is brought herein are valid and enforceable, provided only that the precise act which is to be done be clearly ascertainable. Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 6. The contract here in question, as determined by the findings, is perfectly clear as to the nature and the extent of the services to be performed by plaintiff. It is only as to what was promised to be done by the other contracting party to the agreement that any doubt is expressed and as to which any question is raised regarding its certainty or definiteness. So far as this case is concerned, the only language of the contract which requires consideration is that part therein whereby plaintiff was promised a home in California "better than Maple Crest." One of the maxims of jurisprudence, as laid down in section 3538 of the Civil Code, is that "that is certain which can be made certain." While the language of the contract itself, to one unacquainted with the circumstances surrounding the making thereof, is perhaps not understandable, in the light of the evidence adduced on the trial of the case it appears that "Maple Crest" was the name given to the former home of Mr. Childs in the state of Kansas, and that it had a value of $6,000. As thus interpreted, the contract would then read that, in consideration of certain specified services to be performed by plaintiff, Childs obligated himself to give to plaintiff a home in California of greater value than $6,000. As heretofore set forth, the court found that carrying out the said agreement Childs did purchase a home for plaintiff "at an agreed price of $10,000 and caused the same to be conveyed to plaintiff." The court further found, and the evidence sustains the finding that all the money paid on account of the purchase price was furnished by Childs, and that, while the balance in terms was to be paid by plaintiff, in truth and in fact it was the indebtedness of Childs, and that he promised to pay the same. It thus appears that that which was uncertain in the contract in its inception was made clear and intelligible by the acts of the parties thereto. By their conduct they placed an interpretation on the contract which all might read and readily comprehend. They declared by their acts, if not by their words, that the intention of the parties when they agreed upon a home "better than Maple Crest" was that it should cost the sum of $10,000. In a note occurring in Ann. Cas. 1912A, at page 750, the rule of law is laid down to the effect that on a sale of real property where the description of the land in the contract is defective the defect will be considered cured where the vendee has been put in possession of the land, and many authorities are cited in support thereof. The same principle should apply to the facts here. Although the exact consideration to be paid for the services of plaintiff is wanting in the language of the contract, the defect was cured by the parties thereafter, expressed by their conduct.

The judgment of the lower court was right and just, and it should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. SCOTT. (Cr. 1062.)

1. Larceny 🔑64(7)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

Evidence that stolen property was found in defendant's possession shortly after it had been stolen, and defendant's flight after his arrest, held sufficient to sustain a conviction for grand larceny.

2. Criminal law 🔑753(2)—Court's advice to jury to acquit defendant of burglary charges held not to invade province of jury.

Court's statement to jury before argument that he would advise them to acquit defendant on burglary charges, leaving a charge of grand larceny, did not invade jury's province; court merely performing its duty as prescribed by Pen. Code, § 1118.

3. Criminal law 🔑1168(6)—Error in authorizing acquittal of burglary charges held to favor defendant.

If the court erred in advising jury to acquit defendant of burglary charges, leaving a charge of larceny, as to which evidence justified submission to jury, defendant could not complain.

4. Indictment and information 🔑132(2) — State not required to elect between burglary and larceny charges.

The state was not required, in a prosecution for burglary and larceny, to elect between the different charges, in view of Pen. Code, § 954.

5. Criminal law 🔑1168(1)—Dismissal of burglary charges after conviction for larceny held not erroneous.

Court's dismissal of burglary charges after receiving verdict finding defendant guilty of larceny without any finding as to burglary charges, did not constitute prejudicial error, same result being obtained as though jury had followed court's advice and acquitted defendant on such charges.

6. Criminal law 🔑730(10)—Remarks of prosecuting attorney on defendant's failure to testify held not misconduct requiring reversal.

Remarks of prosecuting attorney on defendant's failure to testify, in violation of Pen. Code, § 1323, was not misconduct sufficient to require reversal, where court promptly sustained defendant's objection to improper remarks, instructed jury to disregard them, and admonished attorney not to repeat offense, and evidence clearly showed that defendant was guilty of crime charged.

7. Criminal law 🔑1171(1)—Remarks of prosecuting attorney, referring to charge on which judge instructed jury to acquit defendant, held not misconduct requiring reversal.

Remarks of prosecuting attorney, referring to a charge on which court advised jury to acquit defendant, was not misconduct sufficient to require a reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Albert Scott was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Clarence B. Conlin, of El Centro, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CURTIS, J. The information in this action contained three counts: One charging the defendant with the crime of burglary in entering, with intent to commit larceny, the house of F. E. Ginder; the second, with the crime of grand larceny in taking, stealing, and carrying away certain personal property of the said F. E. Ginder; and the third, with the crime of burglary in entering, with intent to commit larceny, the house of Ellis Gray. The court advised the jury to acquit the defendant upon the burglary charges. The jury returned a verdict, however, simply upon the charge of grand larceny, finding the defendant guilty thereof, and failed to render any verdict whatever on either of the charges of burglary. A new trial was granted defendant upon the charges of burglary, and they were thereupon dismissed by the court. Defendant has appealed from the judgment finding him guilty of grand larceny and from the order denying his motion for a new trial on said charge. His first assignment of error is that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment.

The testimony in the case shows that one of the complaining witnesses, Ellis Gray, about the middle of February, 1923, missed certain articles of personal property from his house, and on the 13th day of March, 1923, the other of the complaining witnesses, F. E. Ginder, also missed from his house certain personal property which he had seen in his house on the day before. The property belonging to Ellis Gray, and which he had missed from his house, was afterwards found in the possession of a second-hand dealer, to whom it had been sold by the defendant about the 1st of March, 1923. The property of Ginder was found in the defendant's room on the 15th day of March, 1923, at the time of the latter's arrest, at which time he told the arresting officers that he had bought the property about ten days prior thereto from a man by the name of Tex. The defendant at this time was placed under arrest, but on the way to the police station he escaped from the officers, and was not rearrested until the following July. The defendant did not testify in the case, nor did he introduce any evidence at the trial.

[1] It is defendant's contention that this evidence shows only that the stolen property was found in his possession, and he cites the well-established rule that mere possession of stolen property, however recent, is not sufficient to warrant a conviction of larceny. Defendant apparently overlooks the fact, established at the trial, that after his arrest he escaped from the officers. Flight of a defendant, under the circumstances proven in this case, is always a circumstance to be taken into consideration by the jury, with the other facts proven in the case, in determining the guilt or innocence of a defendant. We think that there can be no question that evidence that the stolen property was found in the possession of the defendant shortly after the same had been stolen, coupled with evidence of the flight of the defendant after his arrest, was sufficient to justify the jury in finding a verdict of guilty. People v. St. Clair, 5 Cal. Unrep. 294, 44 Pac. 234; People v. Cox, 29 Cal. App. 419, 155 Pac. 1010; People v. Gill, 45 Cal. 285; People v. Vidal, 121 Cal. 221, 53 Pac. 558; People v. Cole, 141 Cal. 88, 74 Pac. 547. Furthermore, the defendant gave a false account of the manner in which he had acquired possession of said property. This was also a circumstance which could be taken into consideration by the jury in determining his guilt, and, taken in connection with proof of his possession of the stolen property, was sufficient to justify a verdict of guilty. People v. Cole, supra.

[2] The defendant takes exception to certain language used by the court just prior to the argument of the case before the jury as follows:

> "I want to say to you that the court has considered the evidence in this case, and, in view of the information and commitment and evidence in the case, has decided to advise the jury to render a verdict of not guilty upon count No. 1 and upon count No. 3 of the information (being the counts charging burglary). * * * You will be advised to consider only the question of whether the defendant is guilty or not guilty of the crime of larceny as charged in count 2 of the complaint. I make that statement at this time in order that you may understand why counsel do not argue that phase of the case."

Defendant contends that the court by the above statement invaded the rights of the jury by intimating to them that, while, in the opinion of the court, the evidence was not sufficient to justify the submission to them of the charges of burglary, yet it was sufficient to warrant the consideration by the jury of the charge of grand larceny. The only statement made by the court regarding the evidence it will be observed, was made in connection with his statement to the jury that he would advise them to render a verdict of acquittal upon the two burglary charges. This was followed by a further statement of the court that under the advice of the court they would only consider the question of defendant's guilt upon the charge of grand larceny. The law makes it the duty of the court to advise the jury to acquit the defendant, if, at any time after the evidence on either side is closed, it deems the evidence insufficient to warrant a conviction. Pen. Code, § 1118. In its statement to the jury, which is objected to by the defendant, the court merely performed its duty as prescribed by this section of the Penal Code. By its reference to the evidence in this statement the court did not invade the rights of the jury, nor would the jury, in our opinion, be likely to draw any inference therefrom unfavorable to the defendant.

[3] Defendant further complains that the court, by advising the jury to acquit the defendant of the burglary charges, must have believed that the defendant did not take the goods from the house of Ginder, the complaining witness, and that, unless he did take the goods from Ginder's house, he would not be guilty of larceny. We are not advised of the reasons upon which the court based its instruction to advise the jury to acquit the defendant upon the burglary charges. Neither are those reasons essential to the decision of this appeal. The court might have erred in so advising the jury, but, if so, its action was favorable to the defendant, and he cannot complain. There was no error on the part of the court upon the evidence before it in submitting to the jury the charge of grand larceny, and that is the only question that concerns us at this time.

[4, 5] The contention of defendant that the court erred in refusing to direct the prosecution to elect between the different charges set forth in the information is without merit. Pen. Code, § 954. Nor was it error on the part of the court, of which the defendant can complain, to receive the verdict finding the defendant guilty of larceny, and thereafter dismiss the burglary charges. The same result was obtained, so far as the burglary charges were concerned, as if the jury had followed the advice of the court and acquitted the defendant on these charges.

[6] The only remaining question to be considered on this appeal is the objection made by the defendant to the remarks of the deputy district attorney in his argument to the jury. As we have before noted, the defendant did not take the stand at the trial. In his argument before the jury the deputy district attorney conducting the prosecution made the following statement: "I am not allowed to comment on the fact that this defendant did not take the stand, and I do not so comment—." Upon the objection of the defendant the court instructed the jury to disregard this remark of the prosecuting officer. Whereupon the latter, continuing his argument to the jury, stated, "I am merely stating a fact, and it is a fact—." The defendant again objected to the remarks of the attorney, and the court sustained the objection, and admonished him not to refer to the subject again. Defendant now assigns this conduct of the deputy district attorney as error prejudicial to his rights. There can be no question that these remarks of the prosecuting officer were in direct violation of the express mandate of section 1323 of the Penal Code. No prosecutor in his zeal to secure a conviction should allow himself to so far forget his duty, both to the defendant as well as to the public, as to transgress the plain provisions of this statute upon this subject. While the courts of this state have uniformly held such improper conduct on the part of the prosecuting officer to be error, they have not in all cases held it to be such error as to entitle defendant to a reversal of the judgment. A recent case decided by the Supreme Court lays down the rule as follows:

> "It has been the disposition of this court where timely objection was not made or where the court has by appropriate instructions to the jury withdrawn such improper comment from their consideration to deny a reversal, if the evidence in the case was such as to clearly support a conviction." People v. Mayen, 188 Cal. 237, 259, 205 Pac. 435, 444 (24 L. R. A. 1383).

In the present case the court promptly sustained the defendant's objection to the improper remarks, instructed the jury to disregard them, and admonished the attorney not to repeat the offense. The defendant therefore was not prejudiced by such remarks, if the evidence in the case showed clearly that he was guilty of the crime charged. We have already held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the judgment, but it does not necessarily follow therefrom that the evidence was so conclusive against the defendant that his rights may not have been prejudiced by the improper conduct of the prosecuting officer. The evidence against the defendant, as before referred to, showed that the stolen property was found in his possession some two or three days after it had been stolen from the owner, at which time he stated to the officers that he had bought it ten days before from a man by the name of Tex; after his arrest, and while the officers were conducting him to an automobile, he escaped from them; they fired three shots at him in an endeavor to stop his flight; the shots missed him, although fired from a relatively short distance from him, and he made his escape, and was not recaptured until some months thereafter. It seems incredible to us that an innocent man would have risked his life in an endeavor to escape from officers attempting to arrest him. Evidently the defendant, after being caught with the stolen property in his possession, and being unable to deceive the officers by his statement that he had purchased it, rather than submit to arrest, trial, and punishment, determined to escape, even at the risk of being shot down by the officers. We believe that any reasonable jury, in viewing the evidence in this case, would have found the defendant guilty of the charge upon which he was tried. We feel that, had the prosecuting officer refrained from the improper comment complained of, the jury would have returned a verdict of guilty against the defendant. Quoting further from the case of People v. Mayen, supra, page 259 (205 Pac. 444) our views are aptly expressed in the following language:

> "The conduct of the district attorney was clearly error, and would demand a reversal of the verdict, * * * if it appeared that any miscarriage of justice had resulted. Under the testimony presented to the jury we fail to see how it could have avoided a verdict of conviction. The evidence against the defendant was conclusive and * * * uncontradicted. * * * While in no manner justifying the improper comments of the district attorney, we think it is a case for the application of section 4½ of article 6 of the constitution."

[7] The deputy district attorney, in his opening argument to the jury, also made the following statement:

> "There is evidence here also of the kind of a man this defendant is; there is evidence here that he goes to a pawnshop; that he there sells other goods which are stolen; that he there signs another name not his own."

An objection was made by the defendant to this statement, but it was overruled by the court. The prosecuting officer in this statement evidently referred to the goods missed by Ellis Gray from his house, and which the defendant sold to a second-hand dealer a few days thereafter. The court had already advised the jury to acquit the defendant on this charge. The jury, however, were not bound by this advice. In view of the court's instruction, the better practice, we apprehend, would have been for counsel to have refrained from discussing any of the facts involved in this charge, but we are not advised of any authority that prohibits him from so doing.

The judgment and order denying motion for new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by E. M. Lincoln against Jennie M. Hoggard and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Milton K. Young, Lyndol L. Young, William K. Young, and Forrest F. Murray, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank C. Prescott and Frank G. Falloon, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Plaintiff brought an action against defendant for breach of a contract, arising out of an alleged failure to keep a certain covenant in a lease between them, as follows:

> "If the lessor wishes to cancel the lease and gain possession of the property, the lessee agrees to accept $3 per acre for such land as he has plowed and seeded or $2.50 per acre for land that is plowed but not seeded. At any time up to and within 60 days of the time of harvest. Within 60 days of time of harvest the lessee will be allowed to harvest his crop. After harvesting of the crop and up into the time of the spring or fall plowing the lessee will surrender lease and give possession upon payment to him of $500 in cash, plus the price per acre of any land plowed as per above schedule."

The lease also contained, among other provisions, the following:

> "It is agreed between the parties hereto that the lessor shall share 50 per cent. in everything produced or raised on said leased property, and lessee shall share 50 per cent. in everything produced or raised on said leased property during the continuance of said lease."

The property described in the lease was sold shortly after plaintiff went into possession thereof; and thereupon, according to the findings of the court, "plaintiff and said defendant agreed to divide certain crops on said premises according to the terms of said contract, and plaintiff agreed to surrender possession of said premises and to cancel said contract according to its terms."

The crops were divided in accordance with the said agreement of the parties, but defendant failed to pay to plaintiff the sum of $500, which plaintiff claimed to be due to him under the terms of the lease. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $500 defendant appeals to this court.

[1] It is contended that, because the crop was growing on the land at the time the lease was executed, plaintiff was not entitled to 50 per cent. thereof; but the plain language of the lease to which we have adverted will bear no such interpretation. The findings of the court, which are supported by the evidence, are that the parties "agreed to cancel said written contract according to its terms, and agreed to allow the lessee (plaintiff herein) to harvest his crops; that said crops were thereafter harvested; that, after the harvesting of the crops, and before the time of the spring or fall plowing, the lessee (plaintiff herein) surrendered his lease and gave up possession of the demised premises in accordance with the terms of said lease."

Appellant also urges the point that the court failed to find upon an issue raised by the answer to the effect that the one-half of the crop was given and transferred by defendants unto plaintiff as full consideration and compensation for the surrender of said premises. But the lease itself provides for just such a division as was made between the parties; and the court found on substantial, although conflicting, evidence that the parties to the lease agreed to cancel the lease "according to its terms, and agreed to allow the lessee (plaintiff herein) to harvest his crops; that said crops were thereafter harvested"; and that they agreed to divide the crops "according to the terms of said contract"; that "plaintiff agreed to surrender possession of said premises and to cancel said contract according to its terms."

[2, 3] The finding of the court as to what was the agreement between the parties at the time the lease was canceled is a complete statement as to what took place; every other thing is presumed to be excluded. The implication is that the allegation contained in the answer to the effect that the division of the crops was in full consideration and compensation for a surrender of said premises is untrue. From the finding as made by the court it is apparent that, if there had been a direct and specific finding upon the question of whether or not the division of the crops was in full consideration and compensation for a surrender of the premises, it would have been against defendant's contention; and the rule is as laid down in the case of Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 452, 26 Pac. 504, that, if the omitted finding must have been adverse to the appellant, its omission will not constitute an error sufficient to authorize a reversal of the judgment. To the same effect see Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Whitaker, 109 Cal. 274, 41 Pac. 1083; Reed v. Johnson, 127 Cal. 541, 59 Pac. 986, and cases there cited; Gerth v. Gerth, 7 Cal. App. 737, 95 Pac. 904, and cases cited; Furlong v. White, 51 Cal. App. 272, 196 Pac. 903; U. S. Trading Corporation v. Newmark Grain Co., 56 Cal. App. 191, 205 Pac. 29.

[4] The findings, which were ample to dispose of the material issues in the case, are sufficient to uphold the judgment; and the failure to make other findings upon other issues which, if made, would not invalidate the judgment does not make the decision against law, nor amount to a mistrial. Sharp v. Pitman, 166 Cal. 505, 137 Pac. 234.

HELLMUTH et al. v. BANK & TRUST CO. OF CENTRAL CALIFORNIA.
(Civ. 2673.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 19, 1924.)

1. Banks and banking ⚿154(8)—Finding as to amount of deposit held supported by evidence.

In action for deposit, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that plaintiff, claiming to have deposited $935 on certain date, deposited only $35.

2. Appeal and error ⚿1011(1)—Rule as to noninterference with findings on substantially conflicting evidence applies to expert or opinion testimony.

Rule that reviewing courts will not interfere with trial court's findings of fact, where there is substantial conflict in evidence, is binding as to expert or opinion testimony, probative value of which is for trial judge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by Mary M. Hellmuth and husband against the Bank & Trust Company of Central California. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Frank L. Simons and Edward Schary, both of Fresno, for appellants.

Harris & Hayhurst, of Fresno, and Alfred C. Skaife, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiffs are husband and wife. In the month of December, 1915, the plaintiff Mary M. Hellmuth opened a savings deposit account with the savings department of the defendant, and continuously thereafter, and until the 23d day of April, 1920, the time of the filing of the complaint herein, carried and maintained said savings account therein. The defendant, upon the opening of the account, issued and delivered to said plaintiff a savings bank book, in which the amounts of such deposits as were made by her in said account from time to time from December, 1915, to January 2, 1920, were duly noted. On the last-named date the said plaintiff appeared at the bank and deposited in her savings account a sum of money. The controversy between the parties is as to the amount of the deposit made on said 2d day of January.

The complaint alleges that on the 2d day of January, 1920, the plaintiff Mary M. Hellmuth had to her credit in the savings department of defendant the sum of $2,000.01; that she thereafter made demand in writing on the defendant to pay said sum to her, and that her account in said bank be closed; that the defendant then refused and still refuses and ever since said demand was made has refused to pay her said sum of money and to accept her order for the withdrawal thereof and to close her account in said bank.

The answer admits all of the allegations of the complaint, except the allegation as to the amount of money which the said plaintiff had on deposit in the defendant bank at the time this action was instituted, and as to this it is alleged that said plaintiff, on the said 2d day of January, 1920, had on deposit with defendant the sum of $1,100.01 only, and that defendant was indebted to her on said date by reason of said deposit or savings account in no greater sum than that last named; that of the said sum of $1,100.01 so on deposit with defendant, the sum of $35, and no greater sum, was deposited by Mrs. Hellmuth on the 2d day of January, 1920; that after said last-mentioned deposit of $35 was made, as alleged, some person other than defendant or any of its agents or employees, and without the knowledge or consent of the defendant "did willfully and fraudulently, and with the intention of defrauding and cheating this defendant, enter in said savings bank book in front of and near said record entry therein of said deposit of $35 above mentioned so made by the said employee of said bank who received said deposit of $35 a figure 9 in front of and near the said entry of $35 so as to make said deposit and the record thereof in said savings bank book appear to be $935 instead of $35," etc.

The findings are in accord with the claims of the answer, and judgment passed for defendant accordingly. The appeal is by the plaintiffs from said judgment.

The single question to be determined here is whether the finding that the plaintiff did not deposit the sum of $935 in the savings department of the defendant on the 2d day of January, 1920, but on said date deposited the sum of $35 only, derives sufficient support from the evidence.

At the time the deposit in dispute was made Mrs. Hellmuth had to her credit in the savings department of the defendant the sum of $1,065.01. If, therefore, she deposited on the 2d day of January, 1920, the sum of $935, then, manifestly, she had to her credit on said day, after said deposit, the sum of $2,000.01. If, on the other hand, her deposit on said day amounted to the sum of $35 only, then, quite clearly, she had to her credit in the bank, after said deposit, the sum of $1,100.01 only. The receiving teller of defendant, one Roy D. Crippen, who received the deposit from Mrs. Hellmuth on the 2d day of January, 1920, testified that he had no distinct independent recollection of the circumstance of the deposit made by Mrs. Hellmuth on the day mentioned. He explained, though, that the 2d day of January having immediately succeeded a holiday, on which no business was transacted by the defendant, an unusually large number of persons were in the bank that day and transacted business with the savings department, and that that fact accounted for his inability to recall the particular transaction in question. He further explained that the customary method in vogue in said bank in the matter of handling savings deposits made therein was as follows: That the customer would present his passbook at one of two wickets maintained on the bank counter, together with the amount he desired to deposit; that the receiving teller would thereupon count the money, and, while the money still remained on the counter, would enter the amount thereof in the passbook, and then add said amount to the balance or total of the deposits which had therefore been entered therein, thereby showing the total of the deposits made up to and including that date. After this part of the transaction was completed, the teller would then, among other things, note the amount deposited and the total amount of the account on a deposit tag, place the tag on a spindle which was used for that purpose by all the receiving tellers in the savings department, deposit the money received in a drawer, used in common by all the tellers for that purpose, and later in the day, generally when the day's business was near its close, the deposit and the total of the account would be transferred to the ledger cards. Crippen testified that that course or custom in receiving savings deposits was invariably followed by him.

W. W. Parsons was, on the 2d day of January, 1920, and had been for some years prior thereto, the manager of the defendant's savings department, and as such exercised superior authority in said department over Crippen and other clerks and employees in that department. At some hour of the afternoon of said January 2d Crippen, assisted by Parsons, commenced posting the "individual ledger"—that is, they were jointly engaged in transferring to the ledger the deposits made by the different depositors on that day. Parsons, as he testified, "happened to post that particular deposit (Hellmuth deposit) to the individual ledger," following, of course, the deposit slip or tag on which said deposit was noted by Crippen when receiving the money. It was then that the discrepancy in the Hellmuth account was discovered by Parsons, who thereupon, addressing Crippen, said, "Roy, I guess you made a bull in this account. You have added the '35' to the '65' and carried your '1' over to your thousandths." Crippen replied, "By Jove, I guess I did." The account, as transferred to the ledger, was corrected or inserted in said book upon the basis of a deposit of $35 on the said 2d day of January. Assuming that the same error had been made in the passbook, Parsons and Crippen decided to call the attention of Mrs. Hellmuth thereto, but concluded that the matter might well be allowed to remain in abeyance until that lady next called at the bank. A few days thereafter—the exact date was not shown—Mrs. Hellmuth appeared in the savings department of the defendant, and Crippen told her of the error that had been made in her account. She insisted that she had deposited the sum of $935 on the 2d day of January, 1920, and handed her passbook to Crippen to show that she had. Crippen, upon examining the book, found to his great amazement, so he testified, that the book contained an entry of the sum of $935 as the deposit made on said date. As he supposed he had done, he had noted in the passbook as the balance of the account after the deposit in dispute was entered the sum of $2,000.01, which sum, as we have seen, would represent the correct balance, if the deposit in question had actually amounted to the sum of $935. Crippen, while admitting that the figures $2,000.01 as representing the balance in the passbook had been written therein by him, positively asserted that it was erroneously done, and, furthermore, that the figure "9" before and next to the figures "35" in the passbook was not written by him, but has been placed there by some other person; that said numeral "9" was not in his handwriting. Parsons, before whom Mrs. Hellmuth was taken by Crippen, undertook to convince said plaintiff that there had been a mistake on the part of Crippen in noting the balance in her passbook on the 2d day of January after she had made a deposit on that day, but she insisted that no mistake had then been made. She declared that she deposited the sum of $935 on said day, and that Crippen received that sum from her, and he himself inserted that amount in the passbook. At the trial Crippen repeatedly and positively testified that he did not write the numeral "9" which appeared before the figures "35" in the passbook, making the deposit on January 2, 1920, appear to have been the sum of $935. He stated that the only way in which he could account for the notation of a balance of $2,000.01 on that day, after the deposit in question was made, both on the deposit slip and in the passbook, was that he erroneously carried the sum of $1,100.01, which represented the actual balance "to the thousandths column, making $2,000.01 instead of $1,100.01." He should have placed the true balance, so he testified, in the "hundredths column" in the passbook and on the deposit tag. Thus he was led, so he stated, to erroneously make the figure "2" instead of a figure "1" as the initial numeral of the figures representing the balance.

Parsons testified that he was familiar with the writing of Crippen and the characteristic manner in which he formed his figures or numerals; that he would state without qualification that Crippen made the figures "3" and "5" constituting parts of the number "935" in the passbook, but that he was of the opinion that Crippen did not write the figure "9" in said number. Parsons further testified that there was, at the close of the day's business on the 2d day of January, 1920, no overplus of cash in his department of the bank, except in the sum of five dollars and some cents, but, he stated, that sum was accounted for before the day's business of the bank was closed, and, as we understand his testimony, it had no relation to the account of the plaintiffs.

It appears that, after the alleged discrepancy in Mrs. Hellmuth's account was discovered, the defendant turned the matter over to its attorneys for investigation. The theory of the bank was then, as it is now, that the passbook of Mrs. Hellmuth having been erroneously made to indicate a balance to her credit of $2,000.01, some party, other than any of the bank officials or employees, subsequent to the deposit of $35 on January 2, 1920, had observed the mistake, and thereupon placed the figure "9" before the figures "35" so as to make the total of the deposits correspond with the total balance as indicated by the passbook. Acting upon this belief, the attorneys for the defendant called on the plaintiffs, and obtained two canceled bank checks, admittedly in the handwriting of the plaintiff, William Hellmuth, and in each of which there were numbers containing the numeral "9." Hellmuth, at the request of said attorneys, also wrote on a blank piece of paper several different numbers, each of which was partly made up of the figure "9." These several writings were used as exemplars at the trial. Prior to the trial, however, the passbook, the exemplars, and specimens of figures made by Crippen were submitted to E. O. Heinrichs, a handwriting expert, then residing at Berkeley. The opinion testimony of Heinrichs cannot be followed in detail in this opinion. It will suffice, for the purpose of this decision, to state generally herein the substance of his testimony. First it may be stated that he testified that he had had many years of experience in the business of examining and passing on questions of the authorship of disputed handwritings; that he is a graduate of the College of Chemistry of the University of California, and that at the time of this trial was, and for some years prior thereto had been, a member of the summer faculty of the university, "giving the course there in criminal investigation, including the subject of disputed handwritings." He had had "a professional experience, examining disputed handwritings, and appearing in courts, covering the last ten years, nearly eleven years, and studying and practicing on the subject, including a professional experience of about 26 years." He had given testimony, as a handwriting expert, in a large number of the state courts, as well as in some of the United States and the military courts. He testified that the several exemplars and the passbook of Mrs. Hellmuth had been submitted to him without information as to the identity of the parties that wrote the same; that he made a thorough examination by the usual scientific methods of the several exemplars referred to and a like comparison of them, one with the other, particularly directing his investigation to the figure "9" as shown by the exemplars and in the passbook in question, and that it was his positive opinion, based upon his examination of said several writings, that the figure "9," as shown in the passbook, and which constituted a part of the number "935" contained in said book as purporting to show the deposit made by Mrs. Hellmuth on January 2, 1920, was not made by Crippen or Parsons, but that it was made by the party who made the figure "9" in the canceled checks of William Hellmuth and on the blank piece of paper on which said Hellmuth had written several numbers containing the numeral "9." In other words assuming, as the evidence warranted, that William Hellmuth made the figures contained in the canceled checks signed by him, and also certain figures on the blank piece of paper adverted to, Heinrichs' opinion was that Hellmuth wrote the figure "9" before the figures "35" in the passbook.

[1] The above is a sufficient statement of the testimony introduced by defendant to show that there is ample support for the findings that neither Crippen nor any other person connected with the bank wrote the numeral "9" before the number "35" in the passbook; and that said figure "9" was written by some other person, not connected with the bank, with the fraudulent purpose of making it appear that Mrs. Hellmuth deposited $935 on the day mentioned, when in truth and in fact she deposited the sum of $35 only.

The plaintiffs, as might naturally be supposed or expected, introduced testimony tending to show that Mrs. Hellmuth deposited in the defendant bank on the 2d day of January, 1920, the sum of $935. It is not necessary to detail this testimony herein. One of the witnesses for the plaintiffs, however, was an expert on handwriting, and expressed the opinion that the figures "935" and "2,000.01" in the passbook of Mrs. Hellmuth "were made at the same time, by the same pen, same ink, and the same person." This witness had previously had some 23 years of experience in passing upon disputed handwritings, and was besides being a handwriting expert, a chemist by profession.

[2] Thus it is to be observed that there is a sharp conflict between the testimony given in behalf of the defendant and that presented by the plaintiff. The rule that reviewing courts will not interfere with the findings of fact of the trial court, where, as here, there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, is so thoroughly established and so well understood that the citation of authorities in confirmation of this statement would be wholly superfluous, and this rule is no less binding on reviewing courts as to expert or opinion testimony than it is as to testimony of a positive or direct kind. There is nothing inherently improbable in the testimony of Heinrichs, the expert witness of the defendant, nor is there any such infirmity in the like testimony of the plaintiffs. The probative value of this testimony, as is true of any other character of testimony, was a question for solution by the trial judge. In this connection it may be observed that the testimony of William Hellmuth in a certain particular seems to be of such a character that it is probable that the trial court, in forming its conclusion as to the facts, did not feel compelled to rely solely on the testimony presented by the defendant. It appears that, in a certain respect, said Hellmuth's testimony was such as justly to excite some degree of doubt as to its verity. He testified that the $935 which it is claimed his wife deposited on the 2d day of January, 1920, was of the sum of $950 which he gave her a day or two prior to the date of said deposit. Asked where or how he secured that sum, he explained that he had accumulated it from time to time, and that as he did so deposited it in a safe deposit box he had rented in the Farmers' National Bank of Fresno, until it reached the sum mentioned. He testified that at some time between the 15th and 20th days of December, 1919, for the purpose of giving it to his wife, to be deposited by her in the defendant bank, in the first part of January, 1920, he removed the money from his safe deposit box and carried it on his person, inclosed in a pocket book, continuously from said time until the day he gave it to his wife—a period of two weeks. He admitted what was obviously true that any sum of money would be safer against loss when kept in a safe deposit box in a bank than it would be when carried on the person of an individual. He could not, at least he did not, give a rational reason for doing such an improvident act. It is manifestly true that a person of average intelligence (and we judge from his answers to questions propounded to him that William Hellmuth was the possessor of that degree of intelligence and sense) would not, in the absence of a special or an urgent reason for so doing, remove so large a sum of money from a place of perfect safety against its loss and carry it about on his person for approximately two weeks and thus subject it to the chance of being lost, mislaid, or taken from him. Doubtless, the trial court took this view of that portion of Hellmuth's testimony and regarded it, as well it could, as materially derogating from the evidentiary value of his entire testimony. At all events, as before declared, we cannot perceive any legal justification from the record before us for disturbing the findings of the trial court, although we feel no embarrassment in saying that, if, upon the evidence as it is disclosed by this record, the trial court had given plaintiff the decision, we would, in such case, be no less bound to sanction and uphold the findings than we are as they stand here.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑706(7)—Contributory negligence of pedestrian injured by automobile held for jury.

Woman who, after seeing street car leave preceding stop and looking for on-coming automobiles between her and it, crossed line of traffic and stood two or three feet from rails with umbrella over head, held not contributorily negligent as matter of law precluding recovery for injuries from automobile.

2. Negligence 🔑82—Contributory negligence must be a proximate cause of injury.

To support a plea of contributory negligence, plaintiff's negligence must be established, and also that it was a proximate cause of injuries sued for.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑706(7) — Pedestrian's negligence as proximate cause of injury held for jury.

Evidence held not to establish as a matter of law that negligence of pedestrian standing in street with umbrella over head while waiting for street car was proximate cause of injury by automobile.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Myrtle Bolles against W. R. Boone. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for appellant.

H. S. Craig, of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $6,000 for personal inpuries sustained by her when struck by an automobile driven by the defendant on one of the public streets of the city of Oakland. The facts of the case are that one rainy night in February, 1922, at about 7:45 p. m., plaintiff, a foot passenger, endeavored to board a Telegraph avenue street car at a regular stopping place on Telegraph avenue near Thirty-Eighth street. She stood upon the curb and looked to her left, watching for the approach of a car. As a car approached she went through the traffic to the street car track, but the car failed to stop, and she returned to the curb. She remained at the curb watching for the approach of another car from her left. When she saw a car leave the last stopping place, one block away, she again went through the traffic and took a position about 2 or 3 feet from the outer car rail, where she awaited the approach of the car. While standing there, she had an umbrella over her head to protect herself from the rain, and after taking that position she did not look to her left to observe the approach of other vehicles. Before she left the curb she noted that no other vehicles preceded the street car as it came upon the track. While standing there she was struck by the defendant's automobile, which was traveling astraddle of the outer rail of the car line at a rate of speed of about 30 miles an hour. The force of the impact was so great that she was thrown or carried a distance of 30 feet and suffered injuries which were within the award of damages made by the jury. At the time of the collision the defendant was proceeding in an admittedly careless and negligent manner and in violation of the motor vehicle statute, without any warning of his approach, and with his vision obscured by the rain upon his windshield so that he did not observe the presence of the plaintiff until after she had been struck. The evidence of this negligence on the part of the defendant is so plain and unmistakable that the only ground urged upon this appeal is that, conceding this, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The only question, therefore, before us is whether the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law requiring us to set aside the verdict of the jury on that issue.

The case is closely allied in facts to that of Haines v. Fewkes (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 490, the only difference being that in that case the pedestrian had crossed the street car tracks and had taken a position which she assumed to be a place of safety to await the passage of an automobile approaching from the south, when she was suddenly struck by another automobile coming from the same direction; while in this case the respondent carefully looked in the direction of approaching traffic before she left her place of safety on the curb and took a position which she assumed to be a place of safety for the purpose of boarding the street car, when she was struck by an automobile which has swerved in front of the street car and approached her unawares. In the Haines Case the Supreme Court held that it was not contributory negligence as a matter of law.

A similar case is Mann v. Scott, 180 Cal. 550, 554, 182 Pac. 281, 283, where the court said:

> "And it may be that if the jurors in this case rejected, as improbable, respondent's testimony that she looked and saw no approaching automobile, they, nevertheless, concluded—as well they might—that if she did see the automobile before leaving the sidewalk, she reasoned that its driver would comply with the city ordinance, referred to in the court's instructions, requiring an automobile traveling behind a street car to stop ten feet in the rear of the car if it stops to let off or take on passengers, until the passengers have safely alighted from or boarded the car. Whether, if she saw the automobile, respondent would have been warranted in going toward the street car without further watching the automobile approach, relying upon a compliance by the appellants with the requirements of the ordinance, was a question upon which men's minds might well differ, and hence it was properly a case for the jury."

[1] Here the undisputed facts are that the respondent, before she left her place of safety on the curb, looked in the direction of approaching traffic and saw that the street car had left its last stopping place one block to her left and that no automobile was traveling ahead of it. She had the right to assume, therefore, that any vehicle coming from that direction would observe the statutory regulation as to rate of speed and that, if any such vehicle attempted to pass the street car at the intersection where she stood for the purpose of boarding the car, such vehicle would observe the provisions of the statute requiring it to pass at least six feet from the right running board or steps of the street car. Whether it was her right to assume that no vehicle would suddenly pass the street car within the block and proceed upon its right of way at a rate of speed greatly in excess of the statutory rate, especially upon a dark rainy night, was a question which was properly left to the jury.

The case before us differs in this respect from Klusman v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 38, and Atkins v. Bouchet (Cal. App.) 223 Pac. 87, where the pedestrian walked blindly into a place of danger without using any means of care for his own safety.

In support of the appeal the appellant insists that—

> "The conclusion is irresistible that respondent. had she looked, could have seen and avoided the danger, and it is the sole purpose of this brief to show that it was her duty as a matter of law to look."

[2] More than this is necessary to support a plea of contributory negligence. Mr. Justice Myers, in Gett v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 221 Pac. 376, 380, in discussing the plea of contributory negligence, said:

> "In this defense the burden is upon the defendant to prove two things: (1) That the plaintiff was negligent; (2) that such negligence was a proximate cause of the injuries complained of. If he fails to prove either of these things, this entire defense falls."

So with the case before us it is purely a matter of conjecture whether the respondent could have avoided injury if she had looked to her left after she had taken her position near the street car rail. She was attempting to board the street car at a regular stopping place at which a "stop" sign was exhibited. The automobile traffic on that side of the street was very heavy, especially at that time of night. This was brought out by appellant's cross-examination of the witness Claypool, who was attempting to board the same car with the respondent. This witness testified:

> "Q. On this night you walked out into the street, or rather to the car tracks on the street, when this first car came along? A. As I recall it, I did not get out as far as the car track because of the automobiles that were passing. They were racing past and the motorman did not see us as he passed. Q. There were lots of automobiles going on Telegraph avenue that night? A. I would not say 'lots.' Q. A great many? A. From time to time. Q. When this first car came along, this car that did not stop, there were so many automobiles coming along Telegraph avenue, going in a southerly direction, that you could not get out to flag the car; that is true? A. Yes, as I recall it. * * * Q. And all that time you were standing there were automobiles proceeding along the westerly side of Telegraph avenue, going south? A. I don't recall any particular number of cars. Q. I appreciate that, but the fact which I am simply trying to find out from you, young man, is if there were not automobiles continually going in a southerly direction on the westerly side of Telegraph avenue as you stood there? A. There probably were."

[3] It is true that this witness, a young man of about 20 years, who stood 10 feet away from the respondent, saw the approach of defendant's automobile in time to jump to a place of safety. But it is purely a matter of conjecture whether this respondent could have saved herself from injury if she had looked. On this phase of the case appellant offered no proof, his whole plea of contributory negligence depending upon the evidence that the respondent held an umbrella over her head and that she did not look to her left as she stood at a point three feet from the car rail awaiting the approach of the street car—a position which she assumed to be a place of safety. It cannot be said with certainty, therefore, that if she had looked to her left or had not held the umbrella over her head she would have escaped the injury. If the conditions were such that she could have escaped had she so looked or had she not held the umbrella over her head, those were matters which it was incumbent upon the appellant to prove. Upon the record before us, therefore, we are unable to say that the respondent was guilty of negligence as a matter of law. See, also, Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 Pac. 125, and Burgesser v. Bullock's (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 649.

3. Criminal law 🔑554—Uncontradicted evidence of defendant does not control jury if circumstances in case incompatible.

Defendant's account of killing, though uncontradicted by direct evidence, does not control jury if there is any well-established circumstance which may reasonably be regarded as incompatible with defendant's theory of killing.

4. Criminal law 🔑475—Direction of gunshot wound in body not matter of expert opinion.

Question whether direction of gunshot wound in body indicates relative positions of person firing shot and deceased is not matter of expert opinion or opinion evidence.

5. Criminal law 🔑1169(9) — Admission of opinion of physician as to relative position of deceased and person firing shot held prejudicial.

Admission of opinion of physician as to relative positions of defendant and deceased, as indicated by direction of gunshot wound, held reversible error.

6. Criminal law 🔑1186(4) — Application of constitutional provision as to evidence erroneously admitted.

Whenever court is unable to determine whether defendant would have been convicted had erroneously admitted evidence been withheld from jury, Const. art. 6, § 4½, cannot be applied to uphold a conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Cruz Salaz was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Reversed.

Wm. T. Aggeler, Public Defender, and Charles E. R. Fulcher, Deputy Public Defender, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Upon an information charging him with the murder of Ignacio Gonzales, defendant was convicted of manslaughter, and now appeals from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial.

Defendant, who in the trial court admitted the killing, but claimed that it was done in necessary self-defense, claims here that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. The salient facts in the case are these: Decedent lived with his wife and family in a house located about a block and a half from the scene of the tragedy, which occurred near the intersection of Gabriel and Effie streets, in the city of Los Angeles. Some time prior to the homicide the deceased had had illicit relations with Manuela Gonzales, a married woman who had separated from her husband and who seems to have been the cause of the jealousy which led to the deadly encounter. Though the woman and decedent bore the same surname, they were not related either by consanguinity or affinity. An illegitimate child was the result of their meretricious relations. Manuela Gonzales lived with her father at 1758 Gabriel street, about a half block north of Effie street. Defendant worked at El Segundo, in Los Angeles county. He had a brother whose residence was about two or three blocks from the home of Manuela Gonzales.

On the afternoon of July 7, 1923, defendant left El Segundo for Los Angeles, arriving in the latter city in the evening at about 40 minutes past 6 o'clock. He went to a grocery store kept by one Jose Martinez, situated one block east of the spot where the killing took place. After purchasing some bread he left the store, accompanied by the decedent. Following the exchange of a few words, the nature of which will presently be stated, the two men separated, defendant proceeding to the home of Manuela Gonzales, to whom he was engaged to be married. He remained there about 30 minutes, talking to Manuela and her father. About a month previously defendant had purchased the pistol with which the shooting was done. It had been left by him at the house of Manuela Gonzales for the purpose, so he claimed, of affording protection to the house against burglars or other possible intruders. On the evening in question, before leaving Manuela's house, defendant procured the pistol from the woman, and some time between 8 and 9 o'clock he left the house with the intention, so he says, of calling upon his brother, who, as we have stated, lived near by. Proceeding southerly on the easterly side of Gabriel street, defendant, on arriving at or near the northeast corner of Effie and Gabriel streets, saw the deceased, who, according to defendant, was standing on the opposite corner. The night was dark; there were no street lights, and, with the exception of the two participants, there were no eyewitnesses to the shooting. Defendant fired five shots, three of which took effect.

Two of the bullets entered the front of the body and one entered near the anterior aspect of the left shoulder. Dr. A. F. Wagner, the county autopsy surgeon, who examined the body two days after the homicide, called as a witness for the prosecution, testified that he found three bullet wounds in the body of the decedent. These he described as follows: One bullet entered an inch above the left nipple and about three-quarters of an inch from its outer side. It passed backward and slightly inward and downward through the second rib, the inner margin of the left lung, the upper posterior of the left ventricle of the heart and through the fourth rib near its attachment to the spine, finally lodging just beneath the skin in the midline of the back, about three inches lower than the level of its entrance. Another bullet entered the outer surface of the left shoulder near the anterior aspect. It passed inward and downward in front of the bone, out in the armpit, and, entering the chest in the inner side of the armpit, it proceeded downward and through the soft tissues of the left thoracic wall, grazing the adjacent margin of the lung. It perforated the diaphragm, penetrated the inner margin of the spine and the left end of the stomach, tore a large hole in this part of the stomach, and, passing through the abdominal wall in the back near the spine, lodged just beneath the skin in the back, at a point two inches to the left of the midline and about three inches below where the first-mentioned bullet was found. Another entered just to the right of the navel, passed towards the right through the abdominal muscles and slightly downward, struck the crest of the ilium or hip bone, where it lodged, lying just beneath the skin at about the anterior superior spine of the hip bone. The witness further testified that the general course of all the bullets was downward; that the course of one was approximately from left to right, and that the courses of the other two were also from left to right, but not in the same degree; that death was caused by the gunshot wounds in the heart and abdomen, and that a bullet through the heart usually produces instant death.

Immediately after the shooting defendant proceeded one block easterly to the grocery store of Jose Martinez, arriving there about 5 minutes after the occurrence. Laying his pistol on the counter, he told the proprietor that he had shot a man, exhibited to the grocer a swelling on his left wrist, such as might be caused by a blow from a club or stick, and asked Martinez to call the police. The latter complied with the request. The call was received at the police station about 9 o'clock. Defendant remained in the store until the arrival of the police, 15 minutes later, when he told the officers that he had shot Gonzales after the latter had attacked him with a club.

There are no curbs or sidewalks on either Gabriel or Effie street. When the officers examined the surroundings where the killing occurred they found the body lying about 10 or 15 feet north of the northerly line of Effie street. Its distance from the east line of Gabriel street was variously estimated by the several witnesses. The body was found lying on its right side, with the right hand extended above the head. A club or stick about 2 feet long, 3½ inches in circumference and of hard wood was found lying parallel with the body, about 2 or 3 feet from the right hand and in line with the body. One of the officers testified that the stick, which he described as resembling a piece of hoe handle, looked as if it had dropped out of the decedent's hand as he fell. On arriving at the police station the officers found on defendants' left wrist a bruise about 2 inches long, an inch wide and swollen to about half an inch.

All of the witnesses but one testified that the spot where the body lay was east of the center line of Gabriel street. One of the officers testified that it lay west of the center line of that street—that it lay about 20 feet from a fence on the west side of the street. Another officer testified that the body was found lying on the east side of the street, between the center line of Gabriel street and the east curb line. Still another officer testified that it lay about one foot west of where the easterly curb would have been had there been a curb or sidewalk. The grocer, Jose Martinez, testifying as a witness for the people, said that the body was lying on the east side of Gabriel street—the side of the street on which the house of Manuela Gonzales was—and about 8 feet from a fence on the east side of the street. Whether the body when found was lying on the east or west side of Gabriel street is a material factor in the case, as later will appear.

The evidence for the prosecution consisted of the testimony of the county autopsy surgeon, who described the nature of the wounds found on the body and gave his opinion as to the relative positions of the parties when the shots were fired; the testimony of decedent's wife to the effect that her husband left their home at about 7 o'clock in the evening, that she did not see him carrying any stick or club when he left, and that about an hour later she heard the fatal shots; the testimony of the grocer and the officers as to the statements made to them by the defendant, the condition of the body when found and how it lay; the testimony of an interpreter who interpreted for the officers the statements which were made to them in Spanish by the defendant; the testimony of Manuela Gonzales as to what transpired that evening when defendant called upon her just prior to the shooting; a written statement, in Spanish, which the defendant wrote and gave to the officers, and an English translation thereof. This statement, or rather the translation, is set forth infra. It tends to show that the killing was done in self-defense. Except as to the precise spot where the shooting occurred—and it unquestionably occurred where the body was found, for without doubt the decedent fell as the five shots were fired—defendant's testimony is not materially contradicted by the testimony of any of the witnesses for the people.

Defendant was a witness on his own behalf. The case presented by his testimony is substantially as follows: After purchasing bread of Jose Martinez he left the grocery store with the intention of calling upon Manuela Gonzales. Decedent, who happened to be in the store at the time, left when defendant did. As the two walked from the building decedent asked defendant where he was going. Defendant replied that he was going to the house of Manuela Gonzales. Whereupon decedent told defendand that if he went to the woman's home he (decedent) would "beat him up." Defendant told decedent that he could not do that, and that he (defendant) was going over to Manuela's house. Nothing further was said, and the two men parted, decedent taking a direction which led towards his own home and defendant proceeding to the house of Manuela Gonzales, where he remained for about half an hour. Before taking leave of Manuela he asked the woman for the pistol which he previously had left with her. He told Manuela that decedent had threatened to "beat him up," and that he wanted the pistol in order to defend himself in the event that he should be attacked. She gave him the weapon, and shortly thereafter he left, telling Manuela that he was going to his brother's house. He proceeded southerly on Gabriel street towards Effie street, walking on the easterly side of Gabriel street—on the part where the easterly sidewalk would have been had there been any sidewalk. As he approached the northeast corner of the crossing formed by the intersection of Gabriel and Effie streets he saw Ignacio Gonzales standing on the northwest corner. From this point defendant's testimony, reduced to narrative form, is substantially as follows:

> Gonzales asked me to go with him on to the park. I told him I would not go—that I was going to my brother's house. Then he came after me right away. I was backing up, and he came after me, trying to strike me. He struck me, struck at me two or three times. He struck at me twice, at my hat, along each side of my head, and then, acting in my own defense, I pulled the gun from my pocket. He continued to strike at me. He struck me on the wrist, just about the wrist of my left hand. When he struck me I was backing up. When I shot we were almost together—right close together. The encounter occurred on the east side of Gabriel street near the crossing. When he first spoke to me, I was on one corner and he was on the other. When I told him I would not go to the park with him, he came over to the corner where I was. He came at me right away. When he came after me and began to strike me, I began to back and back. I fired all five shots in succession as fast as I could shoot. He was striking at me, and I was shooting. His body fell where I shot him. He did not fall until the last shot. I do not know which shots hit him. When he fell, his body was about four or five steps inward from the corner on the east side of the street. I was backing up toward Manuela's home. When I began backing, I was about 2 feet from where the curb of the sidewalk should be on the east side of the street. I was jumping backward. I did not say anything when he struck me. He came right after me. It was very dark. I could not see what he had in his hand. I thought it was a large piece of iron or a stick or a knife. I didn't know what it was, and I had to defend myself with what I had. I was afraid he would kill me or do me great bodily injury. It appeared to me that he was about to kill me. When I shot him, I was in front of him. I pointed the gun at him because he was right in front of me. I shot neither to his right nor to his left. I just shot. After I shot Gonzales, I walked to Mr. Martinez' grocery store and told him to notify the police.

The English translation of the written statement which defendant gave to the police officers, and which the prosecution put in evidence as a part of its case, is as follows:

> "Well, I arrived from the camp and went straight into the store; I bought the bread, I met the man and greeted him and told him I was going to the house of Manuela, and I went straight to the house, arrived there and greeted her and all her family and remained there in conversation for about one-half hour. I then asked her for the gun and then she said that if she gave it to me her father would scold her. Well! but if this man wants to strike me what have I got to face him? Well, I think he is going to beat me and I cannot face him with my finger nails merely. I left the house, and the first thing I found was him at the corner, and he invited me to fight and I told him that I did not want to and then he came after me, endeavoring to strike me and I began to back up and when I saw he was going to strike me on the head, then I pulled the gun and began shooting, and I discharged all of the five shots and I then went to the store to tell that I did not want to be a criminal."

Dr. Wagner, over defendant's strenuous objections, was permitted to testify that in his opinion, based entirely upon the result of his examination of the body and the course taken by the bullets, the man who did the shooting was in front and towards the left of the decedent. Asked by the district attorney if, from his examination of the body and the course of the bullets, he could tell in what position the decedent was when he was shot, the witness replied:

> "In a general way I could. I can positively state that the man [who did the shooting] was in front and towards the left. He was not immediately in front, but what we might call diag-

[1] Appellant, as his first point, urges with much earnestness that, upon all the evidence, but one conclusion can be drawn, and that is that it was only in the necessary defense of his own person that he killed Gonzales.

[2] The jury could not have found, from the evidence for the people, that the killing was done by appellant except upon the latter's admissions, which carried, in close and immediate connection with proof of the killing, circumstances of necessary self-defense. Since, therefore, the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the act of appellant was justifiable, there was, at the close of the people's case, no presumption against the accused that he had committed an unlawful homicide. No presumption of guilt weighed against the presumption of innocence. "Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." Pen. Code, § 1105.

[3] But it does not necessarily follow that appellant's account of the killing, though uncontradicted by direct evidence, should control the jury. If there be any well-established circumstance in the case which may reasonably be regarded as incompatible with the theory of the defense that the killing was justifiable, then the jury, from a consideration of all the evidence, was warranted in finding that the act amounted to an unlawful homicide. The question therefore is: Does the record furnish evidence of any circumstance which cannot reasonably be reconciled with the theory that appellant acted in self-defense? Though a majority of the people's witnesses agree that the spot where the body was found is east of the center line of Gabriel street, and though one of the officers even testified that the body was found quite near where the easterly curb line would be, the jury nevertheless would be justified in accepting as true the evidence of the officer who testified that it was found west of the center line of the street. And if, as the witness last referred to testified, the body was found west of the center line of Gabriel street and about 20 feet from a fence on the westerly side of the street, then that is approximately where the shooting occurred, for the five shots were fired in a volley or in rapid succession, as though by the convulsive hand of an hysterical person wrought to a pitch of excitement, and one bullet passed through the upper posterior of the left ventricle of the heart. Indeed, appellant himself admitted at the trial that the deceased fell as the last shot was fired. If, then, the shooting did occur west of the center line of the street, it may be argued that there thus is afforded some ground for the inference that appellant, seeing Ignacio Gonzales on the opposite corner, and inflamed with a rage born of jealousy, advanced and sought a quarrel, with the design of forcing a deadly issue so as to create a real or apparent necessity for the killing. But we doubt if such an inference can be said to rest upon any very substantial foundation. The finding of the body on the west side of the street, if indeed that is where it was found, does not seem to amount to anything more than a circumstance which raises only a suspicion of guilt. As an incriminating circumstance it seems to be equally compatible with innocence. Appellant testified that while he was shooting he was "jumping backward." It is not an unreasonable inference that on this dark night appellant, in the excitement of the moment and while "jumping backward," lost all sense of direction, and that though he supposed he was backing up on the east side of the street he was in fact jumping backward in a diagonal direction, and took more jumps backward than he thought he did. This hypothesis—an hypothesis which, when we pause to consider the nervous excitement engendered by the heat of a deadly encounter, is not an unreasonable one—would account for the fact, if it be a fact, that the body fell, with the last shot, on the west side of the street instead of on the east side, as appellant supposed, or, rather, as he testified. It has been said by our Supreme Court that, where "every circumstance relied on as incriminating is equally compatible with innocence, there is a failure of proof necessary to sustain a conviction, and the question presented is one of law for the court." People v. Staples, 149 Cal. 425, 86 Pac. 894. At any rate, if it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the evidence in this case is insufficient to support the verdict, the question is a close one—so close that it may readily be seen how appellant must have been greatly prejudiced by the action of the court in permitting the county autopsy surgeon to give his opinion as to the position in which appellant stood when he fired the fatal shots. And this leads us to a consideration of what we deem to be a fatal error in the case and the ground upon which we are satisfied the judgment should be reversed.

[4, 5] That grievous error was committed when Dr. Wagner was permitted to testify that he could "positively state" that the man who did the shooting was in front "and towards the left," that "he was not immediately in front, but what we might call diagonal towards the left and in front of deceased," is clearly demonstrable. The question whether the direction of a gunshot wound in the body of a deceased indicates the relative positions of the person firing the shot and the person receiving it is not a matter of expert or opinion evidence, and it has been held by our Supreme Court that it is error to allow a physician to testify to his opinion upon that question. People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 54 Pac. 833; People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 303; People v. Smith, 93 Cal. 445, 29 Pac. 64. There are other factors besides the course of the bullets in the body which must be looked to in order to determine the relative positions of appellant and decedent when the shots were fired. Indeed, the slightest consideration of the facts of this case will suffice to show that the question of the relative positions of appellant and Gonzales during the shooting was not one which an expert or any other person could determine merely from the course of the bullets, but was essentially a question for the jury, and for the jury only, to be determined by it from a careful consideration and weighing of all the evidence. For example, if decedent, at the instant when the shot was fired which entered near the anterior aspect of his left shoulder, was striking at appellant with the piece of wood which was found at the scene of the tragedy, then it is not improbable that the former, in order to deliver an effective blow, raised his right arm, advanced his left foot and partially turned upon his waist line in such a manner as to swing the right side of the upper portion of his body backward, thus presenting his left shoulder toward appellant just as the shot was fired. If this supposition be true, and it is not inherently improbable, then the fact that the bullet entered near the anterior aspect of the left shoulder would not conflict with appellant's statement that he was directly in front of the deceased and was backing away as he fired the shots. Or it may be that the first shot which struck the deceased was the one which entered just to the right of the navel. We can readily perceive how the impact of a bullet so received might force the right side of the person thus shot to turn with a backward movement and in such a manner as to bring his left shoulder in line with a pistol held directly forward by a person standing immediately in front of him. These illustrations will suffice to show that neither a physician nor any other person could tell the relative positions of the parties merely from the course of the bullets. And yet Dr. Wagner presumed to say, and over defendant's objection was permitted to testify, that he could positively state that the man who did the shooting was not immediately in front of the decedent, but was "what we might call diagonal towards the left." The fact that to this description the witness added the words "and in front of the deceased" did not cure the error. It still remains that the doctor claimed that, as an expert, he could positively state that the person who fired the shots was not immediately in front of the deceased.

That the appellant's position during the shooting in its relation to that of the decedent is an element of prime importance in the case admits of no doubt. For if, as appellant testified, he was directly in front of the deceased as he fired the shots, then the position of the parties harmonizes with appellant's testimony that he was "backing up" or "jumping backward" when he fired the fatal shots. On the other hand, if he stood somewhat to the left of the deceased when the shots were fired that fact might lend color to the theory that appellant was advancing upon Ignacio Gonzales from a point of vantage of his own choosing and that he was the aggressor—that instead of receiving the attack from the deceased on or near the northeast corner of the crossing, he himself, when he espied Gonzales on the opposite side of Gabriel street, sought out the quarrel and closed in on his victim.

[6] While it is true that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution confers upon this court the power to weigh, to a limited extent, the entire evidence upon which a conviction was had, still "we are not substituted for the jury. We are not to determine, as an original inquiry, the question of defendant's guilt or innocence." We are to "decide whether, in our judgment, any error committed has led to the verdict which was reached." People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 Pac. 1042. (Italics ours.) And whenever we are unable to determine whether the defendant would have been convicted had erroneously admitted testimony been withheld from the jury's consideration, this section of the Constitution cannot be applied to uphold the judgment. People v. MacPhee, 26 Cal. App. 218, 146 Pac. 522. See, also, People v. Columbus, 49 Cal. App. 763, 194 Pac. 288; Freeman v. Adams (Cal. App.) 218 Pac. 600, and People v. Roe, 189 Cal. 548, 209 Pac. 560. After a most careful consideration of the entire cause, including the evidence, we are unable to determine whether the jury would or would not have convicted appellant had Dr. Wagner's opinion as to the position of the parties been withheld from them. This being so, we do not think that the judgment can be upheld by reason of this provision of the Constitution.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

BARCLAY McCOWAN CO. v. STEELE et al.
(Civ. 3922.)

1. Contracts 🔑175(3)—Evidence held sufficient to warrant finding plowing was to be three or four inches and not six.

In action for damages for breach of contract to plow land, evidence held to sustain finding that defendants agreed only to plow three or four inches deep and not six inches.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Determination of facts prima facie for trial court.

Determination of issues of fact is prima facie for trial court, and findings will not be overthrown unless totally unsupported by substantial evidence.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1056(4)—Exclusion of evidence as to damages held harmless in view of verdict.

Sustaining of objections to questions to show amount of damage was harmless, where jury found that plaintiff had no right to recover.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by the Barclay McCowan Company against W. C. Steele and others, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Steele & Thompson. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. T. Helms, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for the alleged breach of an oral agreement by defendants to plow plaintiff's land. Plaintiff's demand is based upon the claim that defendants undertook to plow the land to a depth of six inches. Defendants contend that the agreement was to plow to a depth of approximately three to four inches. Whether the agreement was what plaintiff claims it was, or whether defendants' version of it is the correct one is the crucial point in the case. The findings of fact were favorable to defendants; judgment was entered accordingly; plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied; and from the judgment for defendants plaintiff now appeals.

The trial court found that defendants did not agree to plow to a depth of six inches, but did agree to plow the land "to a depth sufficient for ordinary dry wheat farming, namely, approximately three or four inches in depth." Appellant's first point is that the evidence is insufficient to support this finding. While a contrary finding, if it had been made, would have been sustained by this court, it cannot be held that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain the finding as made. The agreement was arrived at in the course of a conversation between the defendant Steele and Barclay McCowan, the president of the plaintiff corporation. McCowan, in whose office the conversation took place, testified:

> "I told Mr. Steele I wanted section 25, 30—29 plowed for summer fallow, * * * and that I would pay him $2 an acre for plowing that land six inches deep. He said he would do it. He would plow the land six inches deep for $2 an acre, to be paid for when the job was finished."

One Daniel Bidwell, who says he overheard the conversation, corroborated McCowan's version of it. Steele's account of the transaction is as follows:

> "I walked into Mr. McCowan's office. * * * I wasn't in there but a few minutes with him, and I says, 'Well, Mr. McCowan, I came up here to see about that plowing that we was talking about some time ago.' He said, 'All right,' and he asked me what I would plow it for. I told him that I would plow it, give him good ordinary wheat plowing, for $2. That is just the words that was said. * * * Mr. McCowan says, 'Well,' he says, 'it ought to be plowed six inches,' and I never said a word more about it. Just before I got ready to go away, I says, 'Well, I'll give you a good ordinary wheat plowing for $2.' Mr. McCowan says, 'Very well.' I says, 'I'll do the best I can for you.' That is just the words, the whole thing."

[1, 2] From the foregoing it will be seen that there was a conflict in the testimony as to what was said by the parties when entering into their oral agreement, and that the evidence supports the finding that the agreement was to plow to a depth of approximately three or four inches, unless, as appellant claims, Steele's testimony, when correctly interpreted, is in harmony with that given by McCowan and Bidwell. We are unable to give our assent to appellant's interpretation of Steele's testimony. There is evidence to warrant the conclusion that by the words "good ordinary wheat plowing," as used by the witness Steele, the parties understood that the plowing was to be to a depth of approximately three to four inches. This explains why McCowan, when Steele said he would "give him good ordinary wheat plowing for $2," replied that it "ought" to be plowed six inches. That is, if we interpret Steele's testimony most favorably to respondents and in the light afforded by all the evidence, as we are required to do, it shows that Steele was willing to plow to a depth of three to four inches for $2 an acre; that he so informed McCowan; that the latter thought that a depth of three to four inches was not sufficient—that he thought the ground ought to be plowed to a depth of six inches—and that finally, when Steele repeated his offer to do "good ordinary wheat plowing for $2," i. e., to plow to a depth of approximately three to four inches, McCowan replied, "Very well." The rule that the determination of issues of fact is primarily for the trial court, and that the findings of that court are to be overthrown on appeal only when they totally lack the support of substantial evidence, has been announced so often that it has become trite. In Fowden v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 149 Cal. 162, 86 Pac. 182, it is said:

> "It is the firmly settled law of the state that this court will not disturb the ruling of the court below on a motion for a new trial upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence, if there be a substantial conflict in the evidence, even though this court may, upon the record, consider the verdict greatly against the weight of the evidence."

In cases of mere conflict of evidence the conclusion of the trial jury and judge, says the court in Still v. San Francisco, etc., Ry. Co., 154 Cal. 564, 98 Pac. 674, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 322, 129 Am. St. Rep. 177, "are conclusive on the question as to which side produced the 'preponderance of evidence.' "

[3] In view of our conclusion that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding that the agreement was what respondents claim it to be, it will not be necessary to consider appellant's contention that the court erred in sustaining objections to certain questions. The sole purpose of the questions to which the objections were made was to show the amount of appellant's damage. But since respondents did not breach the agreement which the court found was the only one which was entered into, there can be no recovery. From this it necessarily follows that appellant could not possibly be prejudiced by the rulings of which it now complains.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOLDSMITH v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF SACRAMENTO CITY HIGH SCHOOL DIST. et al. (Civ. 2642.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 12, 1924.)

1. Schools and school districts 🔑141(2) — Statute allowing board to "dismiss" held to authorize suspension of school teacher.

Under Pol. Code, § 1609(j), as amended by St. 1921, p. 1666, empowering school boards to dismiss teachers for unprofessional conduct, a judgment of suspension against a teacher for unprofessional conduct was not void, in view of Civ. Code, § 3536; the word "dismiss" vesting a discretion in the board to determine whether an accused teacher should be permanently or temporarily dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Dismiss.]

2. Statutes 🔑184 — Ambiguous statute construed with manifest purpose.

Where a statute is reasonably susceptible of either of two constructions, that construction which will render it reasonable and harmonious with its manifest purpose will be adopted.

3. Schools and school districts 🔑141(2) — Statute allowing school boards to dismiss teachers for unprofessional conduct held not void.

Pol. Code, § 1609(j), as amended by St. 1921, p. 1666, empowering school boards to dismiss teachers for unprofessional conduct, is not void because of allowing too much discretion to boards in dismissing teachers.

4. Schools and school districts 🔑141(4)—Advocacy of political candidacy held "unprofessional conduct" warranting teacher's suspension.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Mandamus by A. L. Goldsmith against the Board of Education of Sacramento City High School District and others, as members of the Board of Education. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Elliott & Atkinson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

C. F. Metteer, of Sacramento, for respondents.

HART, J. On and prior to the 11th day of September, 1922, the appellant was a teacher in the Sacramento high school. On said date the city superintendent of schools of the city of Sacramento presented to and filed with the city board of education of said city, then consisting of the persons named in the title hereof as defendants and respondents herein, written charges against the appellant as follows:

"That on the 1st day of September, 1922, at the high school, before his class, in session and under discipline, he stated and remarked among some other notices as follows: 'Many of you know Mr. Golway, what a fine man he is, and that his hopes are to be elected soon. I think he would be more helpful to our department than a lady, and we need more men in our schools. Sometimes your parents do not know one candidate from another; so they might be glad to be informed. Of course, if any of you have relatives or friends trying for the same office, be sure and vote for them.' I charge that said conduct on the part of said A. L. Goldsmith is and was unprofessional, in that it is contrary to the law of the state of California."

It should be explained that Golway, mentioned in the charges, was a candidate before the voters for election as superintendent of schools of Sacramento county at the time the alleged objectionable remarks were made by appellant.

On the 22d day of September, 1922, said day having previously been fixed for that purpose by said board, and the appellant duly notified thereof, the charges were called for hearing and the same were publicly heard and testimony taken thereon, both the city superintendent of schools and the appellant being represented at said hearing by counsel. On the conclusion of the taking of testimony, and after the issue was argued by counsel for the respective parties, the board ordered and took a recess for 10 minutes for the purpose of going into executive session and therein considering the evidence and a verdict. Within a brief time thereafter, and on the same evening, the board returned a written finding adjudging that the charges preferred against the appellant were sustained by the evidence, and were true. As a conclusion of law from said finding, it was found that the appellant was guilty of "unprofessional conduct as charged in the complaint." The judgment following the finding and conclusion of law was that the said A. L. Goldsmith "be and he is hereby suspended without pay for a period of ten weeks, beginning on the 22d day of September, 1922, and ending on the 30th day of November, 1922," and that the president of the board of education publicly reprimand said Goldsmith. Upon announcing the finding and conclusion of law and judgment the president of the board reprimanded the appellant.

On the 5th day of October 1922, the appellant filed this action in the superior court in and for the county of Sacramento, in which he sought and prayed for a writ of mandate to compel the defendants to reinstate him to the use and enjoyment of the right to perform services and duties of teacher in said Sacramento high school, "and for such other and further order as is proper in the premises," etc. The complaint in said action alleged that plaintiff, after having been regularly employed as a teacher in said high school for a long number of years, was by said board of education, on said 22d day of September, 1922, wrongfully and without right suspended from said position, and denied his right to perform and discharge the duties thereof. The return to the writ contained a recital of all the proceedings culminating in the order and judgment of the board of education suspending and depriving the appellant of the right to exercise the duties of teacher of said school.

Upon hearing the matter, the court below rendered judgment denying the writ of mandate and discharging the order to show cause. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals. This cause was appealed to the Supreme Court, the transcript having been filed in said court in February, 1923, but later that court transferred the same to this court for hearing and decision. Subsequently the defendants noticed a motion in this court for a dismissal of the appeal on the ground that the same involved a moot question for the reason that the period of suspension of the appellant, at the time of taking the appeal, had expired, and for the further reason that, after said period of suspension had terminated, and at the time the appeal was taken, he had resigned his position as teacher in said high school. The motion was denied by this court for reasons stated in the opinion filed on denying the motion. 218 Pac. 296.

The question first raised by the appellant is as to whether the charges preferred against him, and of which he was found guilty by the said board of education, are authorized by any law of this state as the grounds for the suspension of a teacher in the public schools. His contention is that there is no warrant in any law of the state relating to the public schools for the filing of such charges against such a teacher. So far as we are advised by the discussion in the briefs, if the proceedings taken against the appellant are to be sustained, it must be upon the authority of either section 1609(j) as amended by St. 1921, p. 1666, or section 1672 of the Political Code. The first-mentioned section contains an enumeration of the powers of boards of school trustees, and subdivision (j) thereof reads as follows:

> "To dismiss permanent teachers, principals, or supervisors of special subjects, except as hereinafter provided, only for one or more of the following causes, after a fair and impartial public hearing. Causes for dismissal are immoral or unprofessional conduct, incompetence, evident unfitness for teaching, persistent violation of or refusal to obey the school laws of California, or reasonable rules prescribed for the government of public schools."

Section 1672 provides:

> "No publication of a sectarian, partisan, or denominational character must be used or distributed in any school, or be made a part of any school library; nor must any sectarian or denominational doctrine be taught therein. Any school district, town, or city, the officers of which knowingly allow any schools to be taught in violation of these provisions, forfeits all right to any state or county apportionment of school moneys; and, upon satisfactory evidence of such violation, the superintendent of public instruction and school superintendent must withhold both state and county apportionments."

The learned judge by whom this action was tried filed a written opinion setting forth his reasons for the conclusion at which he arrived, and which conclusion is embraced in the decision of the court. In said opinion it is declared that the charges against the appellant, as framed and filed, do not come within the provisions of the section last hereinabove quoted. In other words, the judge declared in his opinion that, since the appellant was not specifically charged with issuing or distributing a publication of a partisan character in the school, or teaching therein any sectarian or denominational doctrine, the conduct of the appellant, as indicated by the charges filed against him, does not come within the ban of said section. It was his opinion, however, that the charges were authorized by section 1609, subdivision (j), of the Political Code.

We agree with the judge of the court below that the charges as they are alleged do not, strictly speaking, fall within the condemnation of section 1672 of the Political Code, but that if they are sustainable at all under any law of the state it is upon the authority of subdivision (j) of section 1609. We are not prepared to hold, however, that, if any teacher in the public schools should teach or advocate, ore tenus, any doctrine of a sectarian, partisan, or denominational character his conduct in that regard would not come within the purview of section 1672. And this view is based upon the principle that the law will not suffer that which is directly prohibited to be done indirectly or by indirection. Nor are we prepared to declare that the oral advocacy by a teacher in a public school before a body of students of the election of a single or a particular candidate for a public office is any the less an act of partisanship, within the meaning of section 1672, than would be like advocacy of the election of all nominees of a particular political party. If such conduct does not come within the spirit, even if not the letter, of section 1672, then the very practice which said section specifically condemns may be indulged in by a teacher with impunity But, in view of the character of the charges filed against the appellant, this question does not require further discussion herein.

[1, 2] As stated, we agree with the trial judge that the charges against the appellant are clearly embraced within the contemplation of subdivision (j) of section 1609 as expressed in the general language "unprofessional conduct." But it will be noted that said subdivision does not in terms provide that a judgment of suspension may be imposed by the school board in the case of the commission by a school teacher of acts constituting "unprofessional conduct." The provision is that for such acts and for all other acts mentioned in the section a teacher may be dismissed. This peculiar phraseology of said subdivision gives handle to the appellant to urge the point (for the first time in this court) that the judgment of suspension is void because it is not within the express words or the intention of the section as evidenced by its language. It may be conceded that, as generally used in connection with legal proceedings in the courts of justice the word "dismiss" means putting an end to a proceeding, as, for instance, to dismiss a particular action or a motion, etc. It does not always or necessarily mean, though, the final ending or termination of the litigation of the subject-matter of the action or of the motion dismissed. We are of the opinion, however, that the word "dismiss" as used in the section in question could not have been intended by the Legislature so to restrict the power of the board as to require it in all cases of guilt under said section to impose as a punishment the permanent dismissal of the offending teacher. It is certainly true that the Legislature intended that for any of the offenses enumerated or contemplated by said section there should be some sort of punishment. We will not assume that the Legislature, in enacting said section, acted upon the sanguinary theory upon which Draco ordained in his code of criminal laws that all offenses, whether petty or aggravated, should be punished with death, because, as he seemed to conceive, the least deserved it while there was no greater human punishment which could be inflicted for the more heinous. To hold that the meaning of the word "dismiss" as used in said section was intended to limit the power of the board to the imposition of no other punishment than that of permanent dismissal in any and all cases arising thereunder, regardless of whether the particular offense charged is of sufficient gravity to warrant such a penalty, would give to the section a construction which, in its application to conceivable cases, would be so unreasonable as that the courts might be justified in declaring it to be void. It is a cardinal rule of statutory construction that, where the language of a statute is, upon its face, reasonably susceptible of either of two constructions, one which, in its application, will render it reasonable, fair, and just, and harmonious with its manifest purpose and another which, in its application, would be productive of absurd consequences, the former construction will be adopted. Giving the word "dismiss" an interpretation in accord with the common understanding of its meaning will impart to the section the force of a sensible enactment, and at the same time exonerate the Legislature from the charge, otherwise justifiable, of a preposterous intention in passing the section. Colloquially, or as used in common vernacular, the word "dismiss" is often used interchangeably with the word

"suspend," and it is clear that the interpretation of that word as so used is the only one that may be given it to relieve the section from the imputation of being absurd or of authorizing, when applied in certain cases, unjust and, in truth, nonsensical consequences. Indeed, we think that if necessary to effectuate what appears to be the clear intent of the Legislature as to said section, the established legal maxim, "The greater contains the less" (section 3536, Civ. Code), should be applied in this instance, and that therefore the word "suspend" should be held to have been intended by the Legislature to be included within the word "dismiss" as used in said section. So interpreting, then, the word "dismiss," and as it is believed the Legislature intended it should be understood as so used, the section vests in the board the discretion of determining, in any given or particular case, whether the accused teacher should be permanently or only temporarily dismissed.

But there is still another view which may well be taken of the question of the right of the board of trustees of a school district to impose penalties upon teachers for the violation of their duties as such. The board, under the law, has supervisory power over the common schools and also the duty of employing teachers. The right of a person to teach in the public schools arises out of contract. Let us suppose that notwithstanding the existence of such power in the board of trustees over the schools and teachers, there was no statutory provision expressly empowering such board to dismiss or suspend a teacher for unprofessional or other conduct inconsistent with the exactions of his position. Would it be contended for a moment that the board for such conduct would not be empowered to rescind and terminate the contract and so put an end to the teacher's employment as such? No negative reply to this question would, we apprehend, be vouchsafed. If, under such circumstances, the board may terminate the contract then for conduct of the teacher while exercising the duties of his position which is inconsistent therewith but which justly would not call for absolute severance of the teacher from the school, such board would be authorized to exercise the right to discipline such teacher or impose a penalty for his violation of his contract which would be less drastic than permanent dismissal.

[3] The remaining points in the case were satsfactorily discussed and disposed of by the trial judge in a very able opinion in which he stated the reasons impelling him to the conclusion crystallized in the findings and the judgment of the court. We therefore approve and adopt the following portions of said opinion as the opinion of this court:

"The accusation stands as a specific allegation that certain things were said by the plaintiff in the presence of his assembled students and while he was acting in the course of his employment as a teacher. The charge then sets forth that the language used under the conditions alleged constituted 'unprofessional conduct.' In defense the plaintiff does not deny that the language used was improper nor claim that it did not establish a condition of such gravity as would have warranted punishment if there was any valid law under which the charge could have been brought. But it is claimed that the term 'unprofessional conduct' is so general, so undefined, so vague, that there is no way by which what is meant by it can be determined, that any act might be claimed to constitute it, and that to make it a ground upon which a teacher might be removed would be to make his employment dependent upon the whim and caprice of changing official authority. As a consequence it is claimed that the cause 'unprofessional conduct' as a ground of removal is meaningless and illegal and that no charge can be said to legally come within it, and that the charges here attempted, having no foundation, are void. If this be true it leaves California with a very large number of teachers to whom she has given permanent employment with no power reserved in her boards of education or other governing authority to prohibit the grossest misuse of their privileges. If 'unprofessional conduct' as a ground of dismissal is void because it leaves too much to the judgment or discretion of the board of education in determining what constitutes it, then 'immoral' conduct, 'incompetence,' and 'evident unfitness for teaching' must likewise be held void for the same reason, and practically all of the vitally necessary power of the boards will be stripped from them. A decision which involved such radical consequences should be reluctantly arrived at and reached only for reasons which are unanswerable. The meaning of the term 'unprofessional conduct' as a ground for suspension from certain kinds of professional employment, or for revoking a license for such practice, has been on many occasions before the courts of many states, and has been variously supported and condemned. Counsel are familiar with cases stating these different views, and it would be of little value for me here to recollect and analyze them. They have been admirably assembled in the recent case of State v. Robinson, 253 Mo. 271, 161 S. W. 1169. There the court, after collecting and grouping these decisions, says: 'There is such a great divergency in judicial thought on this subject that, after reading it all, we find ourselves groping in a wilderness of confusing precedents.' The court then continues: 'In considering precedents it is usually safest to keep an eye on the rules of common sense.' 253 Mo. 290, 161 S. W. 1174. This wise rule I will attempt to apply in the discussion which follows.

"A review of the cases collected will disclose that all of them that do not relate to criminal statutes have to do with the revocation of the licenses of physicians and dental practitioners. Two California cases are cited with those claimed to hold the invalidity of laws providing penalties for 'unprofessional conduct.' Ex parte McNulty, 77 Cal. 164, 19 Pac. 237, 11 Am. St. Rep. 257, had to do with a criminal charge growing out of an attempted revocation of a medical license upon a charge of 'unprofessional conduct.' Hewitt v. Board of Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 590, 84 Pac. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750, was a case in which a physician resisted the cancellation of his license to practice upon a charge of 'unprofessional conduct.' The revocation was sought under a specification of 'unprofessional conduct' which in reality was an extension of the ordinary meaning of that term. The specification constituted in fact the statement of a new group of revocation. The decision did not condemn the general ground, but the loose language of the specification under which the charges were brought. The objections to this specification were so obvious that its illegality could not well be denied. It will thus be seen that our California courts have never held that, where the term 'unprofessional conduct' was stated by the Legislature as a ground for the revocation of the license of one practicing a profession under authority of law, it was void for uncertainty. In Ex parte McNulty the judgment on this point was distinctly reserved by one of the concurring Justices, he holding the provision invalid only as a basis of criminal punishment.

"It seems probable, however, that, should the sufficiency of the term 'unprofessional conduct' as a ground for the revocation of the license of a physician or dentist be raised in our California courts, they would align themselves with the courts of the states which have held it insufficient, and therefore invalid. I say this, although our court in a recent decision involving a somewhat indefinite criminal statute say: 'In this connection it may be stated that there has been a tendency to a much more liberal construction of such statutes in the more recent decisions.' Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 646, 192 Pac. 442, 21 A. L. R. 1172. But would our courts hold invalid such a law in a case involving the employment of a teacher in the public schools? They have never done so, nor, so far as I have been able to discover, has any other state in the Union.

"In this state the court sustained a charge alleging 'evident unfitness to teach,' 'insubordination,' and 'unprofessional conduct' against a teacher. McKenzie v. Board of Education, 1 Cal. App. 406, 82 Pac. 392. And in Kentucky one of the first states to take a positive position that such a charge as 'unprofessional conduct' was too vague to justify a proceeding against a physician, the court asserted the authority of the school board to remove a teacher for 'incompetence, improper conduct or inattention.' Thompson v. Gibbs, 97 Tenn. 489, 37 S. W. 277, 34 L. R. A. 548. In these cases the point made here was not raised, and they are significant only in that it was not raised. As has been stated, if plaintiff is correct here in claiming that the school board has no power to proceed against a teacher for any breach of what the statute designates as 'unprofessional conduct' because the term is too general, and leaves too much to the discretion and judgment of the board, then other statutory grounds of removal are equally invalid, and the school boards of this state are almost totally without authority over the teachers they employ. This is not only so of California, but is equally true of every other state in the Union so far as a thorough search has enabled me to discover. The statutes of the several states provide for removal of teachers or the revocation of their certificates generally for such causes as 'general neglect of the business of the school,' 'general neglect,' 'lack of patriotism or refinement,' that the teacher lacked the qualities of success, that the teacher has 'become unworthy,' for 'other demoralizing vice,' 'neglect of duty,' 'willful neglect of duty,' or 'when he has become unworthy to remain a teacher.'

"Further specification is unnecessary; all of the states seem to provide grounds of removal or dismissal in the broadest terms, leaving to the board or superintendent to determine what acts come within these general provisions.

"Whatever may be said about physicians, dentists, and other similar statutes in the case of teachers this seems to be the only course that could be pursued. It is not, as was denied in State v. Robinson, 253 Mo. 271, 161 S. W. 1174, with reference to physicians, that teachers are more willing to commit offense than men of other callings, and that in consequence it would be impossible to be specific in their enumeration. It is that the calling is so intimate, its duties so delicate, the things in which a teacher might prove unworthy or would fail are so numerous, that they are incapable of enumeration in any legislative enactment. The intimate personal life and habits of a physician or dentist do not necessarily affect his usefulness; he deals with adult persons or children under his protection. But the teacher is intrusted with the custody of children and their high preparation for useful life. His habits, his speech, his good name, his cleanliness, the wisdom and propriety of his unofficial utterances, his associations, all are involved. His ability to inspire children and to govern them, his power as a teacher, and the character for which he stands are matters of major concern in a teacher's selection and retention. How can all of these things be provided for and offenses against them be particularly specified in a single statute? The delicacy of the questions involved in a teacher's employment is illustrated by a Missouri case where it is said: 'There may be causes for the removal of a teacher affecting the discipline of the school over which he presides, entirely outside of any question of his learning, ability, power of enforcing discipline, or moral qualities, and outside of his own acts.' McLellan v. Board, etc., 15 Mo. App. 365. And the court there permitted the removal of a teacher upon the ground that his wife had charged him with flagrant infidelity, and the fact that the charges had become notorious. How could such a condition as this be anticipated or provided for? The inexpediency, not to say impossibility, of attempting to so specify them is illustrated by the law relating to the power of a teacher to suspend or expel a pupil from his school. In discussing this question a learned author reviews the general obligations of the student and then states: 'These obligations are inherent in any proper school system, and constitute, so to speak, the common law of the school. Every pupil is presumed to know this law, and is subject to it, whether it has or has not been reenacted by the district board in the form of written rules and regulations. Indeed, it would seem impossible to frame rules which would cover all cases of insubordination and all acts of vicious tendency which the teacher is liable to encounter daily and hourly.' Voorhees, The Law of Public Schools, § 71, p. 175. This language applies with peculiar appropriateness to a teacher as well as to his pupils. His duties to them and to the public are coextensive with their obligations to the school. To enumerate them in one case would be as 'impossible' as in the other. To restate them would be equally unnecessary, as the professional proprieties of a teacher's employment has likewise become the 'common law of the school.' The board of education is responsible for the proper conduct of our schools. They administer them through the teachers they employ. To enable them to discharge this obligation they must have such power over their teacher as is necessary to promote the efficiency of the schools and to prevent or to punish offenses against it. In occupations involving a high degree of personal, as distinguished from mechanical or technical service, specification of acts of unfitness are wholly impossible and have never been attempted. They 'have never dared to do so,' as was stated by counsel for plaintiff in quoting a prominent educator of the state.

"In the case of attorneys they may be disbarred for 'any act involving moral turpitude.' Section 287, Code Civ. Proc. In the army a commission can be revoked for 'conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman.' Articles of War, subd. 95. In the church, where the highest degree of personal propriety is demanded, governing bodies are almost unrestricted in their discretionary power to deal with offenses against a discipline that is itself unwritten.

"I have considered the right to dismiss a teacher as interchangeable with the power to revoke his certificate. But the cases are different. This case is not one where a board or commission has sought to revoke the license of a physician, dentist, optician, or pharmacist. No effort is being made here to revoke the certificate of the plaintiff or to prohibit him from continuing the employment of teaching a public school. For this reason the cases such as Hewitt v. Board of Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 590, 84 Pac. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750, and Matthews v. Murphy (Ky.) 63 S. W. 785, 54 L. R. A. 415, relied upon by plaintiff, have no application. Section 1609 of the Political Code, under which the defendants acted in this case, has no relation to the revocation of a teacher's certificate; it provides only for his dismissal, or suspension, from some one particular employment, leaving his right to seek similar employment elsewhere unimpaired. With all of the protection which the law surrounds the right of a physician or dentist to prosecute his profession and to earn his living by it, nowhere is the right of those who employ them to dismiss them anywhere restricted. Any one who employs any one else in such callings can dismiss them or employ others in their stead at will, for any reason or for no reason. Ordinarily it would be so with boards employing teachers. The Legislature could provide that they might be dismissed 'at the pleasure of the board.' Voorhees, The Law of Public Schools, § 69, p. 160. But with us our Legislature has wisely seen fit to deny to the employing board the power of unrestricted control. In the cases of dentists and physicians they may now be employed by the governing bodies of our prisons, reformatories, and hospitals, and unless they are protected by some civil service regulation they may be discharged at will, notwithstanding the doctrine of the cases invoked by counsel for plaintiff. The cases would be parallel if the employment of such physicians and dentists were protected by civil service restrictions, as our teachers are by the limitations of section 1609 of the Political Code. It cannot be questioned but that the civil service protection would be only such as the Legislature specified. It could provide for the dismissal of these physicians and dentists upon 'charges filed,' without specification, 'for good cause shown,' for 'inefficiency,' for 'inattention to duties,' or countless other general grounds.

"Cannot the Legislature likewise provide for the dismissal of a teacher from a particular employment for such actions as in the sound discretion of the board of education amount to 'unprofessional conduct'? It would seem clear that it could. In both cases the dismissal has been only from a particular employment, leaving the person dismissed free to prosecute his professional employment elsewhere. There is an undeniable difference between the qualification of a man for the general practice of a profession and his fitness for some particular employment. Transient and local causes may render him undesirable in the latter case, although his general fitness might be conceded. There is a vast difference between the right of a board to take away a man's right to practice a profession by revoking his license and subjecting him to dismissal from a single employment after he has become subject to a substantial objection of his employer. This difference the Legislature has recognized in section 1609 by permitting an employing board to dismiss a teacher without giving it the power to revoke his certificate or prevent or interfere with his employment elsewhere. Whatever may be said as to the too general language of the grounds of revocation of certificate as contained in section 1519a as amended and section 1771 of the Political Code, the sufficiency of section 1609 seems beyond question.

"I have been discussing this question upon the assumption that the position of a teacher was of the same general character as that of a physician or dentist or optician, differing only in the delicacy of the trust, in its more personal nature, and in the countless number of particulars in which its duties and proprieties might be offended against. But the cases are wholly different, and this difference accounts for the general terms used in stating the grounds upon which a teacher may be removed, and why these statutes have been so universally administered without challenge.

"The right to work in the treatment of diseases, the care of teeth, the manufacture of optical instruments, and similar tasks is a natural and inherent one. Subject to a limited police power in the state, the right to labor at these occupations can no more be taken away from a man than can his right to work at hoeing corn or laying brick. But because of the nature of these callings, in the exercise of such police power, and for the protection of the public health and safety, the Legislature may prescribe the qualifications of those who are to be permitted to practice them, 'and may commit to a board created by it the authority to ascertain whether an applicant for permission to practice possesses the necessary qualifications; and also the power, after notice and opportunity to be heard, to revoke the license of any who become disqualified either morally or intellectually.' Aiton v. Board of Medical Examiners, 13 Ariz. 354, 114 Pac. 962, L. R. A. 1915A, 691; State v. Robinson, 253 Mo. 271, 161 S. W. 1169; Green v. Blanchard, 138 Ark. 137, 211 S. W. 375, 5 A. L. R. 84; 8 Cyc. 876, 877. And the charges made as a basis of removal must involve acts bringing the case within the purview of such police power. Hewitt v. Board of Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 590, 84 Pac. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750. The practitioner's natural right to labor can only be taken away or circumscribed when the public health and saftey demand it, and only for reasons involving these considerations. But with a school teacher the case is entirely different. No one has a natural or inherent right to teach a public school. * * * And the Legislatures of our state and the other states in the Union have seen fit for reasons of public policy to make the right to teach in any particular school subject to a broad discretion in the school authorities to dismiss for causes which come within very general designations. I believe these statutes are valid; I believe that the term 'unprofessional conduct' is sufficiently specific as a basis of action leading to the dismissal of a teacher. * * * If the board of education should take advantage of these general provisions, if it attempts frivolous charges, or acts arbitrarily or capriciously upon substantial ones, the courts will protect the teacher whose rights have been invaded. But in this case the board of education seems to have acted in good faith and within the limits of the authority given them by law. Within these bounds their power is supreme, and their order in this case is therefore beyond the jurisdiction of this court to change, criticize, or review."

[4] Lastly, noticing the assertion of counsel for the appellant in their briefs that the conduct of the latter involved "minor matters," it is to be observed that the advocacy before the scholars of a public school by a teacher of the election of a particular candidate for a public office—the attempt thus to influence support of such candidate by the pupils and through them by their parents—introduces into the school questions wholly foreign to its purposes and objects; that such conduct can have no other effect than to stir up strife among the students over a contest for a political office, and the result of this would inevitably be to disrupt the required discipline of a public school. Such conduct certainly is in contravention not only of the spirit of the laws governing the public school system, but of that essential policy according to which the public school system should be maintained in order that it may subserve in the highest degree its purposes.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment is affirmed.

STUCKENBRUCK v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY et al.

(Sac. 3563.)

1. Health 🔑4—Health district with county boundaries held not invalid.

The fact that a health district, organized under St. 1917, p. 791, with the same boundaries as a county in effect superimposed upon the county a public corporation, held not to render the district invalid; the functions to be performed by it being essentially different from those of the county.

2. Health 🔑4—Legislature may organize health districts.

It is within the power of the Legislature in the exercise of health and police powers to provide, as in St. 1917, p. 791, for the organization of health districts.

3. Health 🔑4—Health district having same boundaries as county held not invalid as requiring two sets of officials for same duties.

The organization of a health district under St. 1917, p. 791, having the same boundaries as a county, held not to so provide for two sets of officials within the district exercising the same functions as to render it invalid; the duties of such officials being essentially different.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Suit by E. G. Stuckenbruck against the Board of Supervisors of the County of San Joaquin and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. H. Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel V. Marceau, of Stockton, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court of the county of San Joaquin denying the right of the plaintiff to an injunction restraining the defendant board of supervisors of said county from proceeding with the levy and collection of a certain tax upon the property of taxpayers within the exterior boundaries of said county. The tax which it was sought to have imposed and collected was based upon certain proceedings for the formation and functioning of a health district, undertaken pursuant to an act of the Legislature, approved May 21, 1917, entitled, "An act to provide for the formation, government, organization, operation," etc., "of local health districts," etc. Stats. 1917, p. 791. The said act provided that local health districts may be organized, incorporated, and managed as provided in said act and may exercise the powers therein granted or necessarily implied; that such districts may include incorporated or unincorporated territory or both in any one or more counties, provided the territory of each district consists of contiguous parcels and that no municipal corporation is divided. The act then proceeds to provide the method for the formation of such district through the presentation to the board of supervisors of the county in which said district or portion thereof is situated, signed by registered voters in a certain proportion to the number of votes cast for Governor at the last general election. If an incorporated city or town is to be included in any such district, the governing body thereof shall by resolution request the inclusion of the city or town within the proposed health district. The petition or petitions shall set forth and describe the boundaries of the district, and after certain posting and publication of notices the matter of the granting or denial of such petition shall come before the board of supervisors for hearing, at which time the said board shall determine whether the public necessity or the welfare of the inhabitants of the proposed territory requires the formation of such district, and if it so appears to the board it shall enter an order so declaring and shall further by its said order establish the said district as a "local health district." The county clerk shall thereupon file a certified copy of said order with the secretary of state, which official shall within 10 days thereafter issue and deliver to the said county clerk a certificate showing that the said local health district has been duly formed under the provisions of said act. Thereupon the board of trustees for the newly formed district shall be appointed as provided in said act and shall proceed to function, and in so doing shall exercise the powers specifically designated under the terms of said act. For the carrying into effect of said enumerated powers the board of trustees of the districts shall annually furnish to the board of supervisors of the county or counties in which such district or portion thereof is situated an estimate of the amount of money necessary for the exercise of its purposes and powers for the next ensuing fiscal year; whereupon it shall be the duty of the said board or boards of supervisors to levy and proceed with the collection of a special tax upon all of the property within such district sufficient in amount to effectuate such purposes. Pursuant to the foregoing provisions of said act of 1917, a local health district, the exterior boundaries of which were coterminous with the exterior boundaries of San Joaquin county, was formed and proceeded to function up to the point of procuring the board of supervisors of the county of San Joaquin to proceed with the levy and collection of the special tax requisite for its activities. Whereupon this action to enjoin the board of supervisors from proceeding further with the levy and collection of such tax was commenced and prosecuted by the plaintiff herein, a taxpayer of said county subject to such tax.

[1, 2] The plaintiff in said action conceded in the trial court, and concedes here, that in so far as the formation of the district was concerned the proceedings therefor were conducted in conformity with the terms of said act; but it was his contention there, and is also here upon this appeal, that in attempting to create a health district having the same identical boundaries as the county within which it was sought to be formed the board of supervisors of said county acted beyond its powers, since the effect of its attempted action under the terms of said statute was to superimpose upon the county of San Joaquin a public corporation exercising powers and duties which were already wholly covered and exercised by the county itself under the acts governing its formation. We are unable to agree with that conclusion for the following reasons: While it is true that the boundaries of the said local health district are identical with the boundaries of the county of San Joaquin, no objection can be found within the terms of the act of 1917 for the fixation of the boundaries of such a district at an extent of area which shall be less than or equal to or greater than that bounded by the exterior lines of any one or more counties of the state of California. In point of fact, both county and municipal boundary lines may be disregarded in the formation of such health district; the former by the action of those whose petition initiates, and whose official sanction creates such district; the latter by the consent of the governing bodies of the municipalities which may lie within the exterior boundaries set for the district by those who form it. It was the evident intent of the Legislature in providing by this act for the organization of health districts throughout the state of California that county and municipal boundaries might not be considered in their formation; and this brings us to the second point to be discussed, which is that the Legislature in the adoption of the act of 1917 was engaged in the exercise of those health and police powers which it has exercised in the formation and organization of irrigation, reclamation, and drainage districts, and for the government and control of these, not under the narrower form of municipal, or even county government, but upon a district plan by which they would be constituted state or governmental agencies for the accomplishment of the purposes for which they were designed. The power of the state to exercise the powers of legislation was exhaustively considered by this court in the case of In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 318, 28 Pac. 272, 276 (14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106), where this court said:

> "Whenever a special district of the state requires special legislation therefor, it is competent for the Legislature, by general law, to authorize the organization of such district into a public corporation, with such powers of government as it may choose to confer upon it. It is not necessary that such public corporation should be vested with all governmental powers, but the Legislature may clothe it with such as, in its judgment, are proper to be exercised within and for the benefit of such district. Being created for the purpose of discharging only one public purpose, it is not requisite that it have power not necessary therefor, or which would be appropriate to a corporation organized for some other purpose. Neither is it requisite that such corporation should have legislative or judicial powers conferred upon it. It may be organized for the mere purpose of exercising executive and administrative functions, with the added power of making such prudential rules and regulations as may be necessary for the exercise of the particular functions intrusted to its charge. The powers committed to a public corporation organized for the administration of a public park, or for the government of a levee district, or for the control of the police department, need be only such as are peculiarly appropriate to such organizations."

The principles above laid down have been generally adopted and applied in the organization and government of the increasing number of irrigation, reclamation, drainage, and sanitary districts throughout the state of California, and as to their applicability to the formation, functioning, and maintenance of health districts of the sort contemplated by the act under review we entertain no doubt. In the comparatively recent case of Pixley v. Saunders, 168 Cal. 152, 141 Pac. 815, the subject of the formation of a sanitary district within an area of which a municipal corporation exercising certain powers of sanitation had come to form a part, this court held that the matter of sanitation, which is merely one of the subjects within the general health powers of the state, was not a municipal affair within the inhibitions of sections 12 and 13 of article 11 of the state Constitution, but fell within that class of public purposes such as irrigation and reclamation, which the Legislature had undoubted authority to commit to governmental agencies through general laws. In that case, also, this court considered the case of Petition of Sanitary Board of East Fruitvale Sanitary District, 158 Cal. 453, 111 Pac. 368, upon which the appellant herein chiefly relies, and pointed out that the question as to the power of the Legislature to provide a single and comprehensive scheme of sanitation over an area embracing both incorporated and unincorporated territory was expressly reserved from consideration in the East Fruitvale Case.

[3] The argument of the appellant herein that the effect of the act of 1917 is to permit the formation of a health district having the same area and exercising the identical powers of a county would be to create two sets of officials exercising the same powers, and hence likely to cause duplication, confusion, and impose needless burdens upon the taxpayer, would seem to find sufficient answer in the fact that, as the record herein discloses, the powers to be exercised by the local health district in the instant case differ materially from and are much broader in their scope than those which would be exercised by the county officials of the county of San Joaquin. Perhaps the most vital difference between these two sets of powers consists in the fact that under the county government act affecting the county of San Joaquin the health regulations of the county have no application to incorporated cities and towns, of which there are several in that county, while under the act of 1917 a health district when formed may, with the consent of the governing bodies of such cities and towns, acquire jurisdiction to operate within as fully as without their boundaries.

The appellant makes the further contention that the act in question is unconstitutional for the several reasons stated in his application herein. Practically every question discussed by the appellant in urging these objections to the constitutionality of said act was discussed and passed upon adversely to the appellant's contention in the case of In re Madera Irrigation District, supra, on the authority of which we hold the constitutional objection of appellant to said act to be without substantial merit.

PEOPLE v. REID. (Cr. 2598.)

1. Criminal law 🔑433—Context of defendant's letters held to sufficiently show writing after crime.

Undated letters of defendant held sufficiently shown by their context to have been written after the crime, relative to admissibility.

2. Criminal law 🔑442—Failure to call recipient of letters held to go only to weight of evidence of time of writing.

That the prosecution did not call the recipient of undated letters from defendant—by their context indicating almost certainly that they were written after the crime—to fix definitely their date, did not render them inadmissible, but merely went to the weight of the evidence of their having been written after the crime. Code Civ. Proc. § 2061.

3. Homicide 🔑311—Requested instruction as to determining penalty objectionable as making jury's discretion arbitrary.

Requested instructed held objectionable as making arbitrary the jury's discretion in determining penalty to be imposed on a verdict of first degree murder.

4. Homicide 🔑311—Instruction as to jury's discretion in fixing punishment for first degree murder held correct.

Instruction as to jury's discretion in determining penalty in case of verdict of first degree murder held a correct statement of the law.

5. Homicide 🔑237—Conviction supported, as against defense of insanity.

Evidence held to support a verdict of first degree murder, carrying the death penalty, as against defense of insanity.

6. Homicide 🔑237—Morphine addict not necessarily insane.

That defendant at the time of the killing was a morphine addict is not conclusive that he was at the time insane.

7. Criminal law 🔑48—Showing required under defense of insanity.

Defense of insanity requires defendant to show that at time of crime he was so mentally deranged that he was not conscious of the wrongful nature of his act and did not know it was criminal.

8. Homicide 🔑270—Question for jury on prosecution for killing in robbery, under defense of insanity, stated.

Killing in the attempt to commit a robbery being, under Pen. Code, § 189, murder, the law superadding the intent to kill to the intent to commit the robbery, the question for the jury in such a case, under the defense of insanity, is whether defendant at the time was so mentally deranged as not to know that the act of robbing was wrongful and criminal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeves, Judge.

Clarence Reid was convicted of first degree murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

E. M. Torchia and Charles Matthews, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and J. L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

LENNON, J. Defendant was accused in an information filed in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles with the crime of murder, and upon the trial the jury found him guilty of murder in the first degree and fixed the penalty at death. From that judgment defendant appeals.

The murder occurred in the rear end of a trunk store, located at 419 South Spring street in the city of Los Angeles, at about 6 o'clock p. m. on January 21, 1923. There were present in the store at the time six persons, Munson, Safady, Mason, Ingham, Charles Weingarten, the deceased, and David Weingarten, brother of the deceased and proprietor of the business. The defendant, accompanied by one Lawrence McMullen, entered said place of business through the front door, which was slightly ajar. As they entered the store they were met by David Weingarten, who thought they had come on business. Both the defendant and his companion were carrying guns. The defendant commanded David Weingarten to "stick 'em up" and forced him to walk back to the rear of the store where the safe was located. Charles Weingarten seized the defendant's arm and held it up. While in that position the gun in the defendant's hand went off, the bullets striking the ceiling. With his other hand the defendant reached into his pocket, procured another gun, and fired straight at the deceased, killing him. The shuffling and the shooting all occurred in the space of a few seconds. After the shooting the defendant and his companion fled from the store. Jumping on the running board of a moving automobile, the defendant succeeded in making his escape. In his flight the defendant had dropped the hat he was wearing in the store. Meeting the former owner of the hat that evening about 7 o'clock and knowing that the initials of the former owner were in the hat, he told the owner that he had "bumped off" a man and for the owner of the hat to "watch out." At the trial the defendant was positively identified by an eyewitness to the shooting as one of the persons who had participated in the attempted robbery, and his companion was identified as a workman in an electrical shop just across the alley from the trunk factory where the deceased was shot.

The defendant upon the trial of the case did not deny the killing, but interposed the defense of insanity. He relies for a reversal upon three grounds: (1) The alleged improper admission in evidence of certain letters claimed to have been written by the defendant; (2) the improper giving of a certain instruction to the jury by the trial court and the refusal of the trial court to give a certain instruction requested by the defendant; and (3) the insufficiency of the evidence to warrant a verdict of murder in the first degree carrying the death penalty.

[1] At the trial of the case certain letters, claimed by the prosecution to have been written to a fellow prisoner, Herbert Wilson, by the defendant after his arrest and during his incarceration in the county jail, were introduced in evidence. For the purpose of laying a foundation for the introduction in evidence of these letters, two undisputed exemplars of the handwriting of the defendant were introduced in evidence. A handwriting expert was then called to the stand, who testified that the letters sought to be introduced in evidence had been written by the same person who had written the exemplars. The jailer of the county jail where the defendant was incarcerated then testified that he had received the letters in question, from time to time, from one Herbert Wilson, a prisoner in the county jail. This witness testified that he had received the letters during the time the defendant Reid was incarcerated in the county jail and that he had received the last of these letters but a few days before the trial. The letters were introduced in evidence by the prosecution for the purpose of showing consciousness of guilt on the part of the defendant. In behalf of the defendant it is argued that the evidence adduced by the prosecution does not positively show that the letters were written while Reid was in jail upon the charge of murder and that the letters could be material only if they had been written after the commission of the murder. In this behalf it is contended that the letters themselves are not dated, and that inasmuch as the defendant had been convicted in October, 1922, of the crime of robbery, the letters may have been written during the period of time he was incarcerated for that offense. This argument is negatived by the context of the letters, which points with almost unerring certainty to the fact that they were written and delivered to Wilson after the homicide for which the defendant was being tried had been committed. Throughout the series of letters are to be found declarations of the defendant susceptible of no other reasonable construction than that they referred to the fact that the defendant was implicated in the killing of the deceased. Thus: (1) "Herb, I know I will hang if I go to trial, but I will not reach there if I got half a chance. * * * (2) "I might plead guilty if I get a guarantee of life." (3) "I am facing the rope now." And (4) "They have got seven eyewitnesses against me." In short, the letters speak for themselves.

[2] It was not necessarily incumbent upon the prosecution to call to the stand Herbert Wilson, the fellow prisoner of the defendant, and the person from whom the jailer had procured the letters, in order to more definitely fix the time of the writing of the letters. True, as is contended, the prosecution if it had called the prisoner Wilson might have been able to have fixed definitely the date of the writing and the receipt of the letters. But the fact that the prosecution did not see fit to do so did not thereby render the letters inadmissible in evidence. Whatever objection might have been made upon this score could only have gone to the weight of the evidence as to whether or not the defendant had in fact written the letters to Wilson after the commission of the homicide. The objection that more satisfactory evidence might have been offered through the medium of the testimony of Wilson as to the date of the letters goes only to the weight of the letters as evidence. Of course, the defense would have been entitled to an instruction to the jury, and doubtless one would have been given had it been requested, to the effect that in weighing this evidence the jury should be guided by the provisions of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that—

> "If weaker and less satisfactory evidence is offered, when it appears that stronger and more satisfactory was within the power of the party, the evidence offered should be viewed with distrust."

[3] The trial court did not err in refusing the requested instruction of the defendant dealing with the discretion of the jury in fixing the penalty of murder in the first degree, which was as follows:

> "In determining the question whether or not the defendant, Clarence Reid, shall suffer death or confinement in the state prison for life, you must exercise your own discretion, and with this power of discretion the court cannot interfere. You are left entirely free to act according to your own judgment."

The requested instruction, had it been given to the jury, would, in effect, have charged the jury that their discretion in determining the penalty to be imposed upon a verdict of murder in the first degree was an arbitrary discretion. That this is not the law in California is thoroughly settled by a number of decisions, including the recent decisions of People v. Wolfgang (Cal. Sup.) 221 Pac. 907, and People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 484, 126 Pac. 143.

[4] Neither did the trial court err in its instruction to the jury on the same subject. That instruction is as follows:

> "If the jury in this case should find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, and they also shall find the further fact that there is some extenuating fact or circumstance in the case, it is within their discretion to pronounce such a sentence as will relieve the defendant from the extreme penalty of the law. The jury in a criminal case for murder is vested with a discretion, but the discretion is not an arbitrary one, and is limited to determining which of two punishments shall be inflicted, and is to be employed only when the jury is satisfied that the lighter penalty should be imposed. If the evidence shows the defendant to be guilty of murder in the first degree but does not show some extenuating fact or circumstances, it is the duty of the jury to find a simple verdict of murder in the first degree, and leave with the law the responsibility of affixing the punishment."

In the case of People v. Wolfgang (Cal. Sup.) 221 Pac. 907, substantially the same instruction was given by the court and there held to be a correct exposition of the law.

[5-8] We have given careful consideration to the contention that the evidence is insufficient to warrant a verdict of murder in the first degree carrying the death penalty. A review of the evidence upon that phase of the case which appertains to the mental condition of the defendant satisfies us that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict rendered. The fact that the defendant was a morphine addict at the time of the killing is not conclusive evidence that he was at that time insane. Where the defense of insanity is interposed, the burden is upon the defendant to support that defense by showing that he was at the time of the commission of the crime so mentally deranged that he was not conscious of the wrongful nature of the act with which he was charged and did not know that it was criminal. People v. Bundy, 168 Cal. 777, 145 Pac. 537. Where the killing is done in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate certain felonies, including that of robbery, the act itself is prima facie evidence of premeditation, and the crime is made murder in the first decree regardless of whether or not the defendant had the intent in the first instance or at the time of the shooting to kill. Pen. Code, § 189; People v. Manriquez, 188 Cal. 602, 206 Pac. 63, 20 A. L. R. 1441; People v. Denman, 179 Cal. 497, 177 Pac. 461; People v. Hadley, 175 Cal. 118, 165 Pac. 442; People v. Witt, 170 Cal. 104, 148 Pac. 928; People v. Raber, 168 Cal. 316, 143 Pac. 317; People v. Bostic, 167 Cal. 754, 141 Pac. 380; People v. Milton, 145 Cal. 169, 78 Pac. 549. In short, whenever one in doing an act with the design of committing a felony takes the life of another, this is murder. The law in such a case superadds the intent to kill to the original intent to commit the felony. People v. Olsen, 80 Cal. 122, 22 Pac. 125; People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 85, 94. The question therefore before the jury, in view of the defense interposed, was whether or not the defendant at the time of the commission of the crime of robbery was so mentally deranged as not to know that the act of robbing the store was wrongful and criminal. The sum and substance of the testimony of Dr. Bowers and Dr. Parkin, medical experts introduced in behalf of the defendant, was that the defendant was mentally below par. The testimony of the doctors as to what would be the condition of a morphine addict who had run out of morphine and given himself a shot of three grains of cocaine is based solely upon the testimony of the defendant that this is what had occurred. The testimony of the defendant was impeached generally by proof of his former conviction of a felony, and it may well have been that the jury did not believe his testimony concerning his use of narcotics and their effect upon him on the day of the killing. It is also to be noted that when Dr. Parkin was asked a hypothetical question setting forth the facts of the robbery in detail and including the fact of the taking of the cocaine by the defendant as to whether or not, in his opinion, the defendant knew at the time of the robbery what he was doing, the doctor's answer was that he did know.

Opposed to the testimony in behalf of the defendant concerning the question of whether or not he was conscious of the nature of the act he was committing is the testimony of the eyewitnesses to the killing, who testified to the acts and conduct of the defendant at the time of the robbery. This testimony clearly shows that the defendant at that time had reasoning capacity and was aware of the nature of the act he was committing. In addition to all this there is the admitted flight of the defendant from the scene of the crime, coupled with the further fact that later in the evening when the defendant met the former owner of the hat which he, the defendant, had dropped in the store at the time of the robbery, he told the former owner of the hat to "watch out" as he, the defendant, had "bumped off" a man. The jury, with this evidence before it, doubtless came to the conclusion, and correctly, in our opinion, that the defendant at the time of the commission of the crime was not so mentally deranged as to come within the protection of the law upon the ground of insanity. Finally, it may be said, as is indicated by our discussion of the facts of the case, that upon the question as to the mental condition of the defendant at the time of the killing there was a substantial conflict in the evidence. The verdict will not be disturbed.

FELT v. WAUGHOP, City Clerk, et al. (S. F. 11133.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1924.)

1. Mandamus 🔑23(2)—Elector and taxpayer is person "beneficially interested" within statute as to list of candidates.

A petition for a writ of mandate to compel city clerk to certify a correct list of candidates for office of city attorney sufficiently shows that petitioner is "beneficially interested," within Code Civ. Proc. § 1086, where it alleges that petitioner is an elector and taxpayer.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Beneficially Interested.]

2. Municipal corporations 🔑138—City attorney required to be formally admitted to practice.

Long Beach Charter, art. 18, § 204, providing that candidates for city attorney must be qualified to practice in all state courts for at least five years before election, requires formal admission to practice by an order entered by a court possessing requisite jurisdiction, and applicant must have taken prescribed oath requisite to entitle him to practice law in state courts.

3. Mandamus 🔑74(3)—Will lie to compel city clerk to prepare ballots and list of candidates as governed by real facts.

While Long Beach Charter, § 75 et seq., confers no discretion on city clerk in preparing ballots and list of candidates other than to determine whether nominating papers have been signed and filed as prescribed in charter, or whether signers are qualified electors, and he has no duty to ascertain whether candidates so nominated are qualified to hold and exercise office, when real facts have been ascertained and determined by a competent tribunal, a writ of mandate will lie to compel city clerk to prepare ballots and list of candidates as governed by such facts, since jurisdiction under Const. art. 6, § 4, to issue writ of mandate carries with it authority to ascertain whether facts exist upon which its issuance is to be predicated.

4. Mandamus 🔑74(3)—Will lie to compel city clerk to omit candidate's name from ballot, where disqualified from holding office.

Where a candidate for office of city attorney was disqualified from holding such office by law, though time had passed within which city clerk might in compliance with charter deliver to city council a correct list of candidates, court might, under Const. art. 6, § 4, by writ of mandate, compel city clerk and council to omit candidate's name from ballots and from list of candidates to be published in proclamation of election.

In Bank.

Application by A. L. Felt for writ of mandate to Harry C. Waughop, City Clerk of Long Beach, and others. Writ granted.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, and J. J. Hays, of Long Beach, for petitioner.

Burr A. Brown, City Atty., of Long Beach, for respondent.

MYERS, C. J. Petitioner brings this proceeding as a resident, elector, and taxpayer of the city of Long Beach to procure a writ of mandate against the respondents respectively, city clerk and members of the city council of said city, to compel the city clerk to certify a new and correct list of candidates for the office of city attorney of said city to be voted for an election to be held therein on the 13th day of May, 1924, by including in said list the names of two candidates who have complied with all the requirements of the provisions of the city charter relating to the signing and filing of nomination papers and by omitting from said list the name of a third candidate, Burr A. Brown, who has likewise complied with all of said requirements. Petitioner prays that said writ of mandate also require the city clerk to cause to be correctly prepared, printed, and delivered to the election officers correct official ballots to be used in said election in voting for city attorney by including thereon the names of said two candidates and omitting therefrom the name of said third candidate; also commanding said city clerk to cause to be correctly printed and mailed to each qualified elector sample ballots made up in conformity therewith. Petitioner also prays that the writ of mandate command the city council of said city to cause to be published its election proclamation containing a correct list of candidates for city attorney as above indicated.

Section 69 of article 7 of the charter provides that within a specified time prior to the signing of the nominating petition of any candidate the candidate shall take an oath of affirmation therein prescribed, and the same shall remain as a matter of record in the office of the city clerk. Section 70 provides that the name of a candidate shall be printed upon the ballot when a declaration of candidacy has been filed by the candidate and a petition of nomination has been filed in his behalf "in the manner and form and under the conditions hereinafter set forth." Section 71 prescribes the form of the petition of nomination, and provides that it shall contain not less than 25 or more than 35 signatures of qualified electors. Section 73 prescribes the qualifications of such electors. Section 74 provides that every petition of nomination must be subscribed and sworn to at the office of the city clerk before him or one of his deputies. Section 75 provides that on the thirty-fifth day before the day of election the city clerk "shall ascertain whether the signers are duly qualified as hereinbefore provided"; and, if 25 or more signers are found qualified, then the city clerk shall so certify and shall file the petition. Then follow provisions respecting supplemental nominating petitions in the event the first be found to have been insufficiently signed. Section 78 provides for the certifying of the list of candidates to the city council by the city clerk and the publication of the list as so certified, by the city council, in the proclamation calling the election. Section 79 provides for the printing of ballots, and that "the ballots shall contain the list of names and respective offices as published in the proclamation aforementioned," and prescribes the form thereof. Section 80 provides that the city clerk shall print and mail sample ballots identical with the ballot to be used at the election, except as to quality and color of paper and numbering.

[1] The ground upon which petitioner seeks the removal of the name of the one candidate from the certified list of candidates and from the ballot is found in section 204 of article 18 of the charter, which provides that the city attorney "must be qualified to practice in all the courts of the state of California, and must have been so qualified for at least five years next preceding the day of his election." It is alleged in the petition herein that the two candidates above referred to are so qualified, and that the third is not; it being alleged that the third candidate was not admitted to practice in the courts of this state or in any way qualified to practice therein prior to April, 1921. Petitioner alleges that he has made demand upon the city clerk to certify to the city council a correct list of candidates for city attorney; that the clerk has refused to do so, and that, since the demand, the clerk has certified a list to the city council including the name of the third candidate who is claimed to be disqualified. Petitioner has also demanded that the city clerk cause to be printed and mailed to the voters sample ballots containing a correct list of candidates, and to be prepared, for the election, official ballots containing such correct list, and that the clerk refuses so to do, and threatens to cause said ballots to be printed containing the same of said disqualified candidate. Petitioner also alleges facts from which it is made to appear that a demand upon the city council under the circumstances alleged would be unavailing. In response to an order to show cause herein respondents have appeared and filed a demurrer and answer. The demurrer makes the point that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue, in that he is not a party beneficially interested as required by section 1086 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A similar question was considered and determined by the District Court of Appeal in the case of Conn v. City Council of the City of Richmond, 17 Cal. App. 705, 710, 121 Pac. 714, 719. We are satisfied with the conclusion there reached, and hold in accordance therewith that petitioner herein has such a beneficial interest in the outcome of this proceeding as to entitle him to maintain this action.

The other ground of demurrer is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and this will be considered in connection with the merits of the case. The answer filed tenders certain issues of fact, but, in so far as the determination of such issues would present an obstacle to the decision of this case upon its merits, they have been eliminated by stipulations entered into by the respective counsel at the hearing hereof.

[2] Respondents admit that Brown, the third candidate, was not in fact admitted or licensed to practice law in the courts of this state prior to April, 1921. It follows from this that he is not qualified under the terms of the charter to hold and exercise the office of city attorney of that city. By way of affirmative defense in their answer respondents allege that said Brown was duly admitted, qualified, and licensed to practice law in all courts of the state of Iowa in 1911, and that ever since said time he has possessed the necessary intellectual and moral qualifications to entitle him to be admitted to practice law in the courts of this state. We are satisfied that the requirement of the charter that "he must be qualified to practice in all courts of the state of California, and must have been so qualified for at least five years next preceding the day of his election" requires something in addition to the mere possession of the intellectual and moral qualifications above mentioned. It requires that in addition thereto he must have been actually and formally admitted to practice by an order entered by a court possessing the requisite jurisdiction, and must have taken the prescribed oath requisite to entitle him to practice law in the courts of this state. This conclusion finds some support in the case of State v. Marks, 30 La. Ann. 97, cited and quoted from in the recent case of People v. La Barre (Cal. Sup.) 224 Pac. 750. We thus have presented the case of a candidate for a municipal public office who has duly performed and complied with all of the requirements of the city charter requisite thereto, but who is in fact and in law disqualified from holding or exercising the office to which he is seeking to be elected.

[3, 4] It is apparent under the provisions of the charter that the city clerk is vested with no discretion other than to determine the question of fact as to whether or not the nominating papers have been signed and filed in the manner prescribed in the charter, and the further question of fact as to whether or not the signers of the nominating petitions are qualified electors. Those facts must be determined by him from an inspection and investigation of the nominating papers thus presented to him, in connection with the register of voters and other public records. He is not vested with the authority or burdened with the duty of ascertaining or determining, either as a matter of fact or as a matter of law, whether or not the candidates who thus offer themselves are qualified to hold and exercise the offices which they are respectively seeking. Counsel on both sides in effect so concede. It would seem, therefore, on the face of the record to be the plain duty of the city clerk to do those things which he has done and is proposing to do, and to refrain from doing those things which petitioner is here seeking to compel him to do. Upon the face of the record as presented to him there was nothing for the city clerk to do but that which he has done and that which he is proposing to do. But, when the real facts shall have been ascertained and determined by a competent tribunal, having jurisdiction so to do, to be different from the apparent facts as presented to the city clerk by his records, his duty in the premises will be governed by the real facts so ascertained and determined. In the case of Bordwell v. Williams, 173 Cal. 283, 159 Pac. 869, L. R. A. 1917A, 996, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 358, this court issued its writ of mandate to compel a county clerk to omit from the ballots to be prepared by him the name of a candidate who had complied with all of the requirements of the law necessary to place his name upon the ballot as such candidate, but who desired and had attempted to withdraw his candidacy for the nomination. In that case, as in this, it was the plain duty of the election officer, under all of the statutory provisions, to cause said name to be printed upon the ballots. It was argued there, as here, that the duty was mandatory upon the clerk to print the names of candidates appearing upon the certified list transmitted to him by the secretary of state, and upon that point this court said:

> "Undoubtedly the county clerk acts ministerially, and the information upon which he so acts is that received by him from the secretary of state. But it does not follow that the certificate of the secretary of state must finally conclude everyone with respect to the form and contents of the ballot."

This court there referred to section 27 of the Primary Election Law (St. 1913, p. 1408) as authority for its action therein. We do not find in the Long Beach charter any similar or equivalent provision, but so far as we are advised it has not been held by any court that the presence of such an express statutory provision or its equivalent is essential to the jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction to issue a writ of mandate in such a case as this. The contrary was expressly held by the Supreme Court of Nebraska in Gorder v. Connor, 56 Neb. 781, 77 N. W. 383, 385. The jurisdiction of this court to issue the writ is conferred upon it by the Constitution. Article 6, § 4. The jurisdiction to issue the writ carries with it the authority to ascertain and determine whether or not the facts exist upon which its issuance is to be predicated. Conceding, without deciding, that the mode and manner of exercising this jurisdiction is subject to regulation by the Legislature, it follows that the writ will issue herein only "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office. * * *" The fact is admitted herein that the candidate, Brown, has not been licensed or admitted to practice in the courts of this state for a period of five years next preceding the date of the election. We conclude therefrom that he is disqualified to hold and exercise the office of city attorney, and is therefore not qualified to be a candidate for that office. These facts thus determined render it the duty of the respondents herein, specially enjoined by law, to omit his name from the ballots and from the list of candidates to be published in the proclamation of election. The time has passed within which the city clerk may, in compliance with the charter provisions, make and deliver to the city council a correct list of candidates. The necessity of omitting this certificate, however, presents no greater obstacle to the issuance of the writ than did the fact that the sample ballots containing Mr. Bordwell's name had already been printed and circulated at the time of the issuance of the writ in the Bordwell Case. Some of the reasons why the writ should issue in a situation such as this are suggested in the following language from the opinion in the Bordwell Case:

> "This interpretation of the statute is in accord with the fundamental purpose of all election laws, i. e., to enable the voters to exercise a free, orderly, and intelligent choice. We can conceive of no good reason why a ballot should contain the name of a person who is not in fact a candidate for nomination, even though he may once have taken the steps which entitle him to become such candidate. The presence of his name (like that of a candidate who has died) could operate only to deprive uninformed electors of their votes, to the injury of one or more of the actual candidates, and to the possible perversion of the true popular will. We are not prepared to hold that the law requires this result. To give to the certificate of the secretary of state the conclusive effect contended for by the respondent would be to elevate form above substance. We believe, on the contrary, that the statute contemplates a submission to the electors of a choice between persons who are candidates in fact, and that where, from any cause, the ballots do not present that choice, the courts are authorized, under section 27 of the act, to direct the officials having control of the preparation of the ballots to prepare them in proper form."

The demurrer is overruled and it is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed for herein, omitting therefrom the provision requiring the city clerk to certify a new and correct list of candidates to the city council.

Ex parte TAYLOR. (Cr. 1090.)

Habeas corpus 🔑85(1)—Evidence held not to show that stolen watch was received with guilty knowledge.

On application for writ of habeas corpus by petitioner detained for receiving stolen goods, under Pen. Code, § 496, evidence before committing magistrate held not to show that a stolen watch received by petitioner was taken with guilty knowledge.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by Dagmar E. Taylor, directed to the sheriff of Los Angeles county, to secure release of petitioner upon charge of receiving stolen goods. Petitioner discharged.

S. S. Hahn, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.
C. W. Ostrom, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Petitioner is detained by the sheriff of Los Angeles county under commitment made pursuant to an order binding her to answer to a charge of receiving stolen goods. Petitioner contends that she is imprisoned without probable cause. Section 496 of the Penal Code fastens the crime of receiving stolen goods upon "every person who for his own gain, or to prevent the owner from again possessing his property, buys or receives any personal property, knowing the same to have been stolen." The point made by petitioner is that she was committed without evidence showing that an article received by her, a certain watch, was taken with guilty knowledge.

The evidence before the committing magistrate showed that the watch in question, along with a considerable number of other articles of jewelry, was taken by robbers from a manager of a "loan association." Upon an occasion after the robbery three peace officers, Cahill, Peoples, and Sweesey, called upon petitioner at the apartment which was her place of residence. The testimony of these men, given in the order in which their names are set forth above, contains the only evidence bearing upon the point presented by petitioner. Cahill was asked who conducted the conversation with petitioner which ensued upon their call at her apartment. He answered:

> "I was the one that done the first questioning."

He then proceeded:

> "Deputy Sheriff Peoples was immediately present. I dare say Mr. Sweesey was in the other room at the time. * * * I asked the defendant if she had any jewelry that had been left her by Jimmie Blanton, and she said, 'What is it all about? Tell me something.' And I said, 'Well, you are evidently very conversant with what we are trying to get you to help us in.' I said, 'We are looking for the jewelry that you have in your possession,' and I said, 'The easier way is the better way, and we would solicit at this time your co-operation and expedite matters, if the jewelry is here, and save us the trouble of going about and searching for it.' I said, 'We know, or feel that we know, where Jimmie is.' I said, 'Did you have a telegram from San Francisco with regard to his coming to-day?' 'Well,' she said, 'I know they are out of the city and due today.' I said, 'Then, what became of the jewelry that Jimmie gave you?' She said, 'It is not here.' Then I said, 'Now, I am going to appeal to you again to lend us your co-operation.' I said, 'We are certainly working diligently on this case, and we want to expedite matters, and if you have the jewelry hidden in this house, kindly turn it over and cause us less trouble in searching.' She said, 'No; it is not here.' Then I said, 'Will you take us to where it is? Is it in a safety deposit box?' 'Well,' she said, 'I am not saying.' I said, 'Then what is Jimmie to you?' She said, 'He is my husband.' And I said, 'Then do you expect him today?' And she said, 'Well, I am expecting him.' * * * Peoples was present during that conversation. Then we started to look through the dresser drawers. I said, 'If you don't go about and do this,' I said, 'we will go ahead and look for the jewelry in the drawers, that meeting with your approval.' And she said, 'Go ahead.' * * * Q. Now, was Officer Sweesey present when you asked permission to search the house? A. Yes; he had come in at that time."

The officers then proceeded with a search, and Cahill found a small bar pin which, it is to be observed, was not one of the articles of jewelry taken by the thieves from the manager of the loan association. Cahill further testified:

> "Mr. Sweesey at this time was looking through the left and upper drawer of the same dresser, and I turned to the defendant and asked her if that little bar pin was hers. She said, 'Yes; that is mine.' I said, 'Where did you get it?' She said, 'From a friend.' Then I was attracted by Mr. Sweesey asking a question. He had raised a little watch out of the drawer and asked the defendant if that was her watch. * * * and she stated, 'Yes.' Now, that was all the jewelry that we were able to find."

Peoples testified that he talked with petitioner after Cahill's conversation with her. After some questions about other matters, Peoples further said:

> "Mr. Sweesey was present at one conversation, rather through the latter part of it. I was talking with her before, and I said, 'Won't you please tell me where those diamonds are?' I said, 'I know you have got some rings and diamonds, and I would like to get them.' She said, 'I don't know anything about them.' I said, 'Don't you think it would be better if you tell us and clear this matter up and save us a lot of trouble?' She said, 'I am not telling nothing.' Just then Mr. Sweesey came up, and he started talking about the watch, so she said, 'In just a few moments, Mr. Peoples, I would have told them.'"

Sweesey testified very briefly. He said upon the subject of present interest:

> "The only conversation I had I picked up the watch and asked who that belonged to, and I do not remember the answer. * * * I addressed it to the defendant, but I do not remember the answer."

Respondent contends that it may be inferred, with reason, from certain answers and remarks which petitioner made in response to the inquiries of the officers, that she received the watch with knowledge of the fact that it had been stolen. The utterances of petitioner to which this effect is ascribed are these:

> "What is it all about? Tell me something;" "It is not here;" "No, it is not here;" "Well, I am not saying;" "I don't know anything about them;" and "I am not telling nothing."

It is asserted that, as the watch was in fact part of the stolen jewelry, petitioner's answers, being evasive and calculated to deceive, as it is claimed, were such as to justify an inference of guilty knowledge on her part as to that particular article. We think that such an inference cannot properly be drawn from her statements. Cahill, who first talked with her, spoke only of jewelry in general. Peoples, the next inquisitor, was more specific and referred to diamonds and rings. The conversation about the watch came later. If the officers had found in petitioner's possession diamonds and rings which were a part of the missing loot, then some tangible question would be presented as to whether petitioner's utterances were so evasive and so calculated to deceive as to justify the inference that her possession of them was coupled with a guilty knowledge. This is not so as to the watch. There was nothing in the remarks and inquiries of the officers which can render her responses applicable to that piece of jewelry, granting that they were evasive and deceitful as to jewelry consisting of diamonds and rings. In addition to all that we have said it is also to be observed that the officers failed to make petitioner acquainted with the fact that they were seeking stolen goods, except in so far as she might have inferred the fact from their conduct. Further, they never told her that there had been a theft, either by Jimmie Blanton or by any other persons. Further still, although the record before us shows that the manager of the loan association was robbed by several men, there is nothing in the evidence to indicate that Blanton was among the lawbreakers or that he had any connection with their criminal act.

Petitioner is discharged.

KUHN et al. v. DICKEY. (Civ. 4614.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 18, 1924. Rehearing Denied April 15, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 15, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷194(2)—Objection for first time on appeal that answer did not deny all allegations of complaint held too late.

Point that many allegations of complaint were not denied in answer, never addressed to the trial court—defendant's counsel at opening of trial stating, without objection, that answer denied each and every allegation of complaint, and trial being on that theory—is too late.

2. Fraud ⚷58(2) — Finding against party charging false representations sustained.

Finding, in action for false representations in sale of restaurant, that defendant did not falsely represent certain things, held sustained by his evidence as to what representations he did make, and of the truthfulness thereof, and what representations he did not make.

3. Fraud ⚷45—Evidence of buyer's experience held not pertinent to issue of seller's false representations.

To the issue whether defendant, in sale of restaurant, falsely represented that during the regular sessions of school the business was so great that customers waited outside, testimony that there was no such occurrence while plaintiffs were in possession is not pertinent.

4. Fraud ⚷13(1) — Defendant's representations being true, immaterial whether plaintiffs relied thereon.

The court having found, as authorized by evidence, that the representations made by defendant in the sale of a restaurant were not false, it is immaterial whether plaintiffs in buying relied on the representations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by A. Kuhn and another against John Dickey. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

John C. Scott, of Oakland, for appellants.

Ramsey Probasco, of Oakland, and Clarence De Lancey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendant to recover a judgment for damages alleged to have occurred by reason of false representations alleged to have been made by the defendant in the sale of a restaurant. The defendant interposed an answer and cross-complaint and asked a judgment for the balance due on two promissory notes evidencing the unpaid balance on the purchase. The trial court awarded the cross-complainant a judgment as prayed for, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

[1] The first point made by the appellants is a contention to the effect that many of the allegations contained in the plaintiffs' complaint were not denied in the answer of the defendant. The contention is advanced at a date that is far too late. When the defendant's answer was interposed, no objection of any kind or nature was made to its form. When the case was called for trial, the attorney for the plaintiffs commenced the trial of the case by reading to the trial court the plaintiffs' complaint. Thereupon the attorney for the defendant stated to the trial court, "We have set up an answer denying each and every allegation of the complaint. * * *" To that statement no objection was made. Immediately thereafter the attorney for the plaintiffs proceeded to call witnesses and propounded questions to those witnesses showing that he was attempting to prove every allegation contained in the complaint. Neither during the presentation of the case for the plaintiffs, nor the presentation of the case for the defendant, do we find a single objection to the effect that any certain issue was not made by the pleadings. In short, between the two covers of the transcript we find no place where such a point was addressed to the trial court.

[2] The second point made by the appellants consists of attacks by them called first proposition, second proposition, third proposition, and fourth proposition, and all of which are attacks on the findings. The trial court found:

> "That it is not true that at said time the defendant with the intent to deceive, cheat or defraud these plaintiffs did falsely represent to them that the business was a good paying business, or that he falsely represented that he had thereat daily sales of from $130 to $180 during all of the time of the regular sessions of the University of California. * * *"

The finding is abundantly sustained by evidence introduced by the defendant. That evidence was to the effect that the defendant represented to the plaintiffs that at times during the regular sessions the receipts were from $130 to $180. The defendant followed that testimony by introducing his books to prove the truth of the representation. He testified that he had not represented that such were his daily receipts during all of the regular sessions.

[3] The trial court found that the defendant did not falsely represent "that during the regular sessions or terms of said University of California the business at said restaurant was so great that the customers thereat so filled the place as to necessitate their standing in line on the outside waiting to be served. * * *" As to whether or no such an incident ever occurred while the defendant was managing the business the plaintiffs tendered no testimony whatever. The testimony tendered by the plaintiffs was to the effect that such an incident did not occur during the time that they were in possession. Such testimony was not pertinent to the issue on trial.

The third proposition assumes that the trial court found that the defendant represented "that it was a good paying business," "that during the regular sessions of the University the daily receipts from the business were from $130 to $180," and "that during the summer sessions the daily receipts were from $80 to $100"; whereas, the finding of the trial court was that such representations were not false, and, as stated above, the defendant introduced an abundance of evidence to the effect that the representations made by the defendant were not false. The fourth proposition is that the trial court found "that it is not true that plaintiffs did rely upon any representations made by the defendant or that plaintiffs believed that such representations were true."

[4] That finding is also attacked. The defendant introduced evidence to the effect that the plaintiffs, before purchasing, at meal times attended at the restaurant on several different days and on some days twice a day, and remained at the restaurant for considerable periods of time on each occasion; that on two occasions they went through the restaurant making a minute examination of the equipment; and that for some days prior to the purchase they were in the immediate neighborhood making inquiries about and investigating that particular property and similar properties. Moreover, when we consider that the trial court found that the representations made by the defendant were not false, then we must assume that the representations were true, and it becomes immaterial, therefore, whether the plaintiffs acted upon the truthful representations made by the vendor or otherwise.

We find no error in the record.

JARRETT v. NORTON et al. (Civ. 3920.)

Contracts ⚷41—Evidence held to show written agreement between parties became operative without fulfillment of conditions precedent.

Though written contract between parties, which authorized defendant to sell the personal property of plaintiff on a rancho, leased to defendant, for the joint benefit of both, was not delivered, and it was orally agreed to deliver it to defendant on payment by him to plaintiff of a certain sum, plaintiff by her conduct in permitting defendant to take notorious possession of the rancho held to have executed the contract; she having waived payment from defendant as a condition precedent to delivery of instrument.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Pearle H. Jarrett against Willard A. Norton and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James McLachlan, of Los Angeles, and Frank H. Snyder, of Glendale, for appellant.

Ernest E. Nichols, of Los Angeles, for respondent Norton.

D. H. Laubersheimer, of Los Angeles, for respondent Kirk.

WORKS, J. After certain preliminary negotiations, plaintiff and defendant Norton signed an agreement by the terms of which plaintiff leased to Norton a rancho owned by her and upon which she had been residing. The agreement also established a relationship between plaintiff and Norton concerning the live stock and crops then upon and thereafter to be produced upon the property which, if it did not constitute a partnership, authorized Norton to sell and deal in the personal property mentioned for the joint benefit of the two. Although the agreement between the parties was signed, no manual delivery of it was made, and there was a collateral oral understanding that no delivery was to occur until Norton should pay to plaintiff a certain sum of money which by the terms of the written agreement he bound himself to pay upon the "execution and delivery" of the paper. Despite this oral understanding, however, and without the payment of the sum mentioned, plaintiff vacated the rancho immediately after the signing of the written agreement, took up her residence an eighth of a mile distant from it, and permitted Norton to enter into possession of her real property and into the active management of it, as well as into the possession, control, and management of the personal property upon it. Plaintiff's conduct in this regard was influenced by statements which Norton made to her to the effect that he would soon make the payment which was to have consummated the agreement. This he said he would do out of moneys to come from the estate of his mother, who had then recently died in the East. Norton's entry on the ranch was apparently near June 1 of a certain year, the record not being exactly clear on the subject, and he remained there until December of the same year, under repeated promises that he would make the overdue payment as soon as his mother's estate was settled. Plaintiff occupied her new residence the greater part of the summer and was cognizant of what took place on the rancho. Norton's possession was maintained by two men whom he put in charge of the property, and he was frequently on it himself. Through these men, and by his own presence, Norton openly and notoriously conducted the rancho during the period of his possession, and plaintiff had nothing whatever to do with its management. Norton, among other things, cut, every three or four weeks, alfalfa which was growing on the property at the time of his entry and sold it and collected the proceeds. Toward the latter part of the year he sold to defendant Kirk certain cattle, hogs, and turkeys which were on the rancho at the time he took possession.

This action was commenced to recover from both defendants as upon a conversion of the personal property sold by Norton to Kirk. Judgment went for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

It is contended by appellant that certain of the findings of the trial court are not supported by the evidence, but the disposition of all question as to these findings depends upon the settlement of but one point: Did the written agreement between plaintiff and respondent Norton become operative? If it did, the latter had an undoubted right to make the sale to Kirk. We fail to see why the agreement did not become operative. Appellant demeaned herself toward Norton and toward his rights under the contract exactly as she would have demeaned herself if the payment which was due from him had been made. Norton could have acquired no greater rights under the contract by making the payment than he was allowed by appellant to exercise without making it. We cannot but conclude that the agreement was executed by the acts of appellant. Undoubtedly, she could have agreed expressly to waive the payment due from Norton as a condition precedent to delivery of the instrument. This being so, we are satisfied that the trial court was justified in finding from the evidence that her acts and conduct were the equivalent, under the law, of such an express agreement.

> "Whenever it appears that the contract or arrangement between the parties has been so far executed or completed that they must have understood that the grantor had divested himself of title, and that the grantee was invested with it, delivery will be considered complete, though the instrument itself still remains in the hands of the grantor." Moore v. Trott, 162 Cal. 268, 275, 122 Pac. 462, quoting from Ruckman v. Ruckman, 32 N. J. Eq. 259.

One or two questions are presented by respondent Kirk as pertaining to his case as a separate defendant, but a treatment of them is not necessary after the conclusion which we have reached upon the question above discussed.

Judgment affirmed.

COMER v. LOS ANGELES RY. CORPORATION. (Civ. 4201.)

1. Trial 🔑191(8)—Instruction held erroneous as assuming acts negligent.

Instruction that, if street car conductor made plaintiff automobilist change out of his safe course into broken electric wire, then he should recover, held erroneous as virtually assuming any conduct of conductor causing plaintiff to change course would be conclusive proof of negligence.

2. Electricity 🔑19(12)—Contributory negligence of automobile driver injured by electric wire held for jury.

In action for personal injuries and damage to automobile by running into broken trolley wire carrying dangerous current, held, that question of contributory negligence was properly submitted to jury.

3. Trial 🔑194(17)—On issue of master's liability to third person, instruction as to effect of notice to servant held error.

Where trolley wire broke and plaintiff ran his automobile into it, an instruction that it was defendant street car company's duty through its agents in charge to notify persons rightfully using street, of such broken wire, and that knowledge of motorman and conductor was knowledge of corporation, was erroneous, since matter of notice was question of fact, rather than of law.

4. Trial 🔑253(4)—Instructions held not to eliminate question of contributory negligence of automobilist.

Instructions held not objectionable as virtually eliminating question as to whether or not plaintiff should have known of broken trolley wire in time to have avoided colliding with it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. L. Fleming, Judge pro tem.

Action by C. E. Comer against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Respondent suffered personal injuries and damage to his automobile by running into a broken trolley wire of appellant while driving in a southerly direction on Vermont avenue, in the city of Los Angeles. Defendant appeals from the judgment against it, and in doing so relies principally upon alleged error of the trial court in the giving of certain instructions and refusing others asked. It is also claimed that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict.

It appears that as a street car had passed under it the trolley wire above the southbound track became severed at a point some distance south of the intersection of Vermont avenue with Tenth street, and that a considerable portion of the wire lay between the tracks. The car stopped, and while the motorman was adjusting his trolley and sweeping the wire over against one of the rails the conductor attempted to warn the drivers of approaching vehicles. There was much travel upon the street, and although several people were signaled the respondent did not see the conductor until almost upon him, when respondent suddenly swerved to the left to avoid striking him, and hit the wire. It was after dark, and respondent's headlights were burning. He saw the car, but from the fact that it was not at a crossing he paid little attention to it, intending to drive down past it on the right-hand side. He testified that he saw a person dart out before him, as from the gutter, and that he thought some one was hailing him for a ride; that he had money with him, and was in a hurry, and that he would not have taken on a passenger, but that he immediately jumped on his brake and clutch with both feet; that there was at once a flash, and a mass of flame and sparks about him, whereupon it seemed as though he were dealt a blow on the back of the neck, and he next found himself in the street, and saw his automobile moving away with the wire hanging across it.

After the wire fell it sputtered and squirmed around, subsequently becoming welded to a rail of the track, and there was testimony that it got very hot, first turning red, then white. The conductor testified that it was five or six minutes from the time his car first went dark and he discovered the broken wire until respondent's accident; that until the accident happened he had not looked up at the wire, but that there was a reflection on the pavement, and he was conscious of a glow. Other witnesses testified to having seen light from the wire before the collision, while still others said that it did not extend far along the wire, and that there was not much light given off. Respondent stated positively that it did not give off any light and that he did not know the wire was down until he struck it with his machine, when "everything lit up."

At appellant's request the jury were instructed that there was no duty imposed upon defendant's employés to give any warning of the presence or position of the broken wire after it had become sufficiently illuminated so that any person traveling on the street could have seen it by the exercise of ordinary care, and that, if they believed that the wire at the time of the accident was sufficiently bright or glowing that the plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen and known of its presence and position in time to have avoided the collision, they must return a verdict for the defendant.

From a careful reading of the record before us, and summarizing the many exhaustive instructions given on behalf of appellant, it may fairly be concluded that in rendering a verdict for respondent the jury must have concluded that a preponderance of the evidence showed that after the wire broke defendant's motorman and conductor had a reasonable opportunity to cause the plaintiff to avoid the accident, but did not do so; that the wire was not of sufficient brightness so that the plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen it and known of its presence or position; that the conductor did not use the care and caution that an ordinarily prudent person in his position would have exercised; that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and that because of the foregoing facts the conduct of the conductor made plaintiff change out of his safe course into and against defendant's electric wire, and that therefore, the company was liable. Conceding that these findings of fact were supported by the evidence, instruction No. XIX directed this conclusion if the jury should so find, and is not in accord with our view of the law.

[1] The jury were therein charged that:

> "If you find that as a matter of fact plaintiff was driving his automobile southerly on the west side of the west car track in an ordinarily cautious and prudent manner, and that his route therein was, so far as the down trolley wire was concerned, safe and unobstructed for him to travel straight ahead, then I charge you that if you further find that the conduct of the conductor was such that it made plaintiff, without fault on his part, change out of his safe course into and against defendant's electric wire, then the plaintiff should recover against the defendant in this case, and you should find damages in his favor as defined in these instructions, unless you further find that the plaintiff could, by the use of ordinary care, have avoided the said wire."

This instruction we think was erroneous in that it virtually assumed that any conduct on the part of the conductor which caused plaintiff to change his course and run into the wire would be conclusive proof of negligence. The defendant was not an insurer and was not liable unless there was negligence; and the question whether there was or was not negligence was an ultimate fact which should have been left for the determination of the jury from a consideration of all the probative facts in evidence. Merely causing plaintiff to change his course and run into the wire was not conclusive proof of the ultimate fact of negligence, because it was not necessarily inconsistent with the exercise of due care by the conductor. It was a probative fact merely tending to show negligence, and which was not within the province of the trial court to decide. McKeon v. Lissner (Cal. Sup.) 223 Pac. 965.

[2] We do not agree with appellant's contention that the court erred in refusing to grant its motion for nonsuit, or to give the peremptory instruction directing a verdict for defendant. In Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Company, 189 Cal. 335, 208 Pac. 125, it was held that—

> "Contributory negligence is a question of law only when the court is impelled to say that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his injury."

In view of the contradictory testimony above outlined, we are not at liberty to say that the evidence of contributory negligence was "conclusive," since there was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff was not negligent. Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, 191 Pac. 913; Lanning v. Talmage (Cal. App.) 225 Pac. 25.

[3] Appellant also attacks an instruction wherein the jury were charged that, as soon as the defendant, through its motorman and conductor, knew that its trolley wire had broken and fallen into the street, thereby rendering travelers liable to injury, it was defendant's duty through its agents in charge thereof to notify persons rightfully using the street, and that failure to do so would constitute negligence, in that the knowledge of the motorman and conductor was knowledge of the corporation. It was testified upon the trial that appellant's car system was under the management of different departments, each separate and distinct from the other; that the wires were under control of the line department, while the motorman and conductor were members of the operating department, and that there was some evidence from which it is argued that these departments were so independent of each other that the line department might not be apprised of difficulties encountered by operatives until notified by the superior to whom it was the duty of the conductor to report. Appellant's amended answer alleged that "at the time of the breaking of the wire a passing southbound street car stopped, and the conductor in charge thereof went to the north to warn approaching traffic from the north of the breaking of said wire, and the said conductor gave due warning and notice to the said plaintiff of the broken wire," and, "that as soon as the wire was broken the defendant, through its servants and agents, undertook to and did give the plaintiff ample notice and warning"; and "defendant denies that it had time or opportunity to give any other or further or different notice than it did give to the said plaintiff, but alleges that if the said notice to him was not sufficient it was because defendant had no opportunity to give a further or different notice." The conductor testified that he assumed it was incumbent upon him to give alarm, and that he felt that it was his duty to prevent people from being injured, although he had no specific instructions to do so. Appellant cites Read v. City and Suburban Ry. Co., 115 Ga. 366, 41 S. E. 629, which holds that notice to the servant of a corporation with respect to a matter over which he has no authority and as to which he has no duty to perform is not notice to the corporation. It was there held that under the circumstances shown by the evidence the motorman and conductor acted of their own accord in guarding the crossing. If that opinion be construed to have universal application to street car companies, it is the only holding of its kind that has come to our attention, and seems to be contrary to the general trend of authorities. In Canton Cotton Warehouse Co. v. Pool, 78 Miss. 147, 28 South. 823, 84 Am. St. Rep. 620, it was held that the inquiry as to the liability of the master or principal is whether, from the nature of the act itself, as actually done, it is an act done in the master's business or one wholly disconnected therefrom by the servant, not as a servant, but as an individual on his own account. As was said in McDonald v. Randall, 139 Cal. 246, 250, 72 Pac. 997, 998:

> "That a corporation is not chargeable with the knowledge of one of its officers or agents who is acting on his own behalf, and not for the corporation, is beyond question the law."

And in Brimberry v. Duffield Lumber Co., 183 Cal. 454, 191 Pac. 894, it was said that the company must be held responsible unless it clearly appears that the servant could not have been, directly or indirectly, serving it in an act the negligent performance of which caused injury. Section 2332 of the Civil Code provides:

> "As against a principal, both principal and agent are deemed to have notice of whatever either has notice of, and ought, in good faith and the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, to communicate to the other."

It might well be that a person on the street, under no legal duty to the street car company or to the public, would under the circumstances have felt that it was his duty to prevent people from being injured, yet we do not feel convinced, considering the fact that much evidence upon the subject was offered to the jury, that the trial court was justified in charging them as a matter of law upon the question of knowledge. The relationship of employés to their principal may be so varied by the hiring, the rules and regulations of the company, and working conditions, that it cannot be said that from every state of facts it is their duty in good faith and the exercise of ordinary care and diligence to communicate to the proper department all knowledge of any situation which may threaten injury or prove to be dangerous. Such a conclusion results from facts and circumstances which of necessity differ, and it is therefore more a question of fact than of law.

Appellant asserts that the trial court committed error in giving plaintiff's instruction numbered 6, as follows:

> "You are instructed that the plaintiff, as he drove along South Vermont avenue at and about the place of accident, had a right, in law, to assume that the street was in a reasonably safe condition for his travel, and further had a right to assume that no trolley wire of defendant, or any other obstruction, was down in or upon the street that would interfere with his reasonably safe travel, and he had a right, in law, to indulge this assumption until he had actual knowledge that the wire was down, or had such notice that an ordinarily prudent person would have known that the wire was down and that there was danger therefrom, and, unless you find by a preponderance of the evidence of the whole case that plaintiff had this knowledge or notice, then he was not guilty of contributory negligence in not knowing that the wire was down."

And also No. 8, which reads:

> "Although you may believe that the conductor of the defendant attempted to give the plaintiff notice that there was danger if he proceeded in the route he was going, yet if you further find that the conduct, whatever it was, of the conductor was such that an ordinarily prudent person would not have known he meant the wire was down, or that there was danger in the plaintiff traveling there, then you will find that the plaintiff had no notice, so far as the acts of the conductor were concerned, as to there being any danger in traveling along the street at the time and place of accident, except the danger of striking the conductor pursuing the course he was then traveling."

[4] It is claimed that by these two instructions the court virtually eliminated from the consideration of the jury the question as to whether or not the plaintiff should have known of the broken wire in time to have avoided colliding with it. We do not think this criticism is well founded. A fair construction of these instructions would make it clear that the plaintiff would be held guilty of contributory negligence if he had actual knowledge of the danger or such knowledge as would constitute notice to an ordinarily prudent person that the wire was down, and this we conceive to be the correct statement of the law.

It is also contended that the trial court should not have instructed the jury that there was no evidence proving or tending to prove that the motorman in any sense attempted to warn the plaintiff or any persons that the wire was down. It is conceded that there was no evidence to that effect, but it is argued that the instruction was erroneous nevertheless, because the jury might have drawn the inference from it that a duty devolved upon the motorman to give warning to the public that the wire was down. We do not think that from the context of the instructions as a whole such statement can be said to have been used for any purpose other than to limit the evidence to acts of the conductor, but, since the case must be reversed for the reasons herein stated, the trial court may so frame its instructions upon another trial as to eliminate doubt in this respect.

GORDON v. GREEN. (Civ. 4184.)

1. Appeal and error ⚿1097(1)—Application of "law of the case" stated.

Where the pleadings were the same and findings of fact not materially different from those on a former trial, the evidence may be assumed to be the same, and the former decision on such findings is the "law of the case."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Law of the Case.]

2. Appeal and error ⚿1099(4)—Findings held to differ in no material respect from those on former trial.

Findings held not materially different from those found insufficient on the first appeal, to show any consideration for modification of a lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Y. Gordon against R. A. Green. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

MYERS, C. J., and SEAWELL, J., dissent from the order denying a hearing.

Waldo M. York and H. Parker Wood, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. S. Tappaan and Stewart & Stewart, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This action was brought to recover certain rents alleged to be due and unpaid under the terms of a written lease. The present appeal relates only to the judgment in favor of the defendant on the first cause of action set out in the complaint. The defense of the defendant was that there had been a change in the written contract of lease by an oral executed agreement, whereby the claimed rent was paid.

A former appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant in this action was decided by the Court of Appeal for the First District in Division 1 thereof. 51 Cal. App. 765, 197 Pac. 955. That appeal was taken upon the judgment roll alone. The principal facts constituting the cause of action are set forth in the decision cited. In its findings at the first trial the court found that defendant had entered into possession of the premises described in the lease set forth in the first cause of action, but further found that such terms were subsequently changed by an oral agreement between the parties and that such agreement was carried out by the lessee and accepted by the lessor. This change in the lease as found by the trial court consisted in an agreement which in substance provided that, pending the hard times and general depression of the hotel, apartment house, and rooming house business in the city of Los Angeles, the lessor agreed to accept in lieu of the amounts specified in the lease all of the income derived from the premises over and above the expenses of the business and a moderate allowance for the support of the defendant and his wife for managing said business. It further found that this condition had improved after the 8th day of September, 1919, since which time defendant had promptly paid to plaintiff monthly the rent according to the terms of the lease. On the former appeal it was decided that the carrying out of the oral agreement by defendant did not validate the contract, for the reason that it was simply the performance of the very act which defendant was legally obligated by his written contract to do, and that defendant therefore suffered no prejudice by the performance of the alleged modification; that the modified agreement as found by the court to have been made between the parties was a mere nudum pactum, which did not relieve the defendant from the obligations under his lease.

[1] Appellant contends that the decision on the former appeal establishes the law of the case, and that under the law as thus declared the present judgment must be reversed, because there is no material difference between the issues and the facts found at the former trial and those shown in the record of the present trial. There was no change in the pleadings. There is a bill of exceptions in which is set out the evidence received by the court at the second trial. It is not necessary that we examine that evidence, unless there is some material difference between the present findings of fact and the findings of fact which were before the court on the former appeal. Comparing the findings of fact as made at the second trial with the statement of the substance of the findings made at the former trial, stated in the decision on the former appeal, we find no substantial or material difference between them. This being so, it may fairly be assumed that there is no difference between the evidence received at the first trial and that received at the second trial which would prevent the application to this appeal of the doctrine that the law of the case as established on the first appeal controls the decision of the second appeal. This rule or doctrine has been thoroughly re-examined and expounded by the Supreme Court in the recent case of the Estate of Baird (Cal. Sup.) 223 Pac. 974. It is there declared that, where the Supreme Court upon one appeal has declared that all the evidence adduced at the trial was insufficient as a matter of law to establish a certain conclusion (in that case the legal adoption of a child), and the evidence received at a later trial is substantially the same in all vital particulars as the evidence received at the former trial, it of necessity follows that the doctrine of "law of the case" applies.

[2] In support of his contention that notwithstanding the former decision the court may now properly re-examine the question as to whether there was or was not a sufficient consideration for the agreement of the parties modifying the lease, respondent insists that, because the previous appeal was on the judgment roll alone without the evidence, it does not appear that there was any decision that would necessarily be applicable to the facts presented on this appeal. It may be conceded that, if the findings which are the basis of the present judgment were in any material respect different from the former findings of fact, it would now be appropriate to consider such new or different findings and the evidence relating thereto, and to determine whether such different or additional findings are sufficient to sustain the present judgment, notwithstanding the decision on the former appeal. Respondent seems to find that difference in the fact shown in the present findings, and (we will assume for the purposes of the argument) supported by the evidence, that it was a part of the oral agreement that defendant would operate and keep open the hotel business on said leased premises, and would keep strict account of the income and expenses and render monthly statements and pay over to plaintiff the net income derived therefrom, less "a moderate sum" for the support of defendant R. A. Green and his wife, and in the further fact that under the lease itself there was no obligation on the part of the defendant or his wife to personally manage the hotel business; that this new obligation assumed by both the defendant and his wife constituted a consideration which, when executed, would be sufficient to support the defense under said oral agreement. We observe first that, while the findings of fact now before the court do say that in the oral agreement it was provided that defendant R. A. Green would operate and keep open said hotel business, etc., they do not say that said agreement included any obligation or promise that defendant's wife would manage or have anything to do with the management of said hotel. Turning to the statement of the substance of the findings made at the first trial as set forth in the former decision on appeal, we see that the court in its former findings determined that the alleged modification of the lease contained an agreement which included an acceptance by the lessor, in lieu of the amount specified in the lease, of the income derived from the premises "over and above the expenses of the business," and a moderate allowance for the support of the defendant and his wife for managing said business. It thus appears that it was in the former findings and not in the present findings that the fact was established that the defendant's wife was to render services in the management of the business. So far as that point is concerned, if it is at all material, this would make a stronger case for the defendant than the case presented under the present findings. Nevertheless, the court on that appeal determined that such oral agreement was without consideration sufficient to support the same, and that it did not constitute a defense to the plaintiff's action. That decision having become final, it is binding now, even if it were to be conceded that on the former appeal the court should have reached a different conclusion.

ANGLO AMERICAN LAND CO. v. SUNDBERG et al. (Civ. 4871.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1040(4)—Sustaining demurrer to second count of complaint held harmless error.

Plaintiff was not deprived of any substantial rights by sustaining of a demurrer to second count of his complaint, where second count was but a duplication of the first, with some surplusage which might have been stricken under Code Civ. Proc. § 463, and there was still left of his pleading everything which plaintiff was entitled to have remaining therein.

2. Pleading 🔑192(5), 362(3)—Immaterial matter in complaint should be attacked by motion to strike.

To get rid of immaterial matter in a complaint, attack should be made by motion to strike instead of a demurrer, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 430, 453.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by the Anglo American Land Company, a corporation, against E. H. Sundberg and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Russell P. Tyler and Thomas Lloyd Lennon, both of San Francisco, and J. J. Trabucco, of Mariposa, for appellant.

Jones & Dall, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action to quiet title to two parcels of land located at Larkspur, Marin county, Cal. It framed its complaint in two counts. The defendants interposed a demurrer as to each count. The trial court overruled the demurrer to the first count, and sustained the demurrer to the second count without leave to amend. Later a judgment was entered up dismissing the cause of action pleaded in the second count. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed. Under the facts presented in the record we think that the judgment must be affirmed, whether it was erroneous or otherwise, because, after an examination of the entire record, the court is clearly of the opinion that the ruling of the trial court, if it be conceded to be error, has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, and in short has not deprived the plaintiff of any substantial right.

[1, 2] The first cause of action pleaded in the amended complaint is a full and complete statement of an ordinary count to quiet title. By overruling the demurrer to that cause of action, the trial court properly preserved to the plaintiff all of the rights to which the plaintiff was entitled. In the second count the plaintiff repeated word for word every allegation contained in the first count, and, having done so, it thereupon proceeded to specify what the plaintiff conceived to be the specific claim or claims of the defendants. In doing so the plaintiff inserted nearly 40 folios of alleged defects in the purported proceedings theretofore had by the town of Larkspur in an attempt to install certain improvements under the "Improvement Act of 1911." St. 1911, p. 730. Under the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state no duty rested upon the plaintiff to insert such allegations in its complaint, the allegations were not necessary to the sufficiency of its pleadings, and all of said allegations were in the nature of anticipating a defense, and were immaterial matter, and, being immaterial, all of said matters could have been stricken from the pleading if a proper motion in that behalf had been made. Code Civ. Proc. § 463; Crook v. Forsyth, 30 Cal. 662; People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551, 562, 563, 5 Pac. 263, 6 Pac. 481; Hyde v. Redding, 74 Cal. 493, 498, 16 Pac. 380; Stratton v. California Land, etc., Co., 86 Cal. 353, 361, 24 Pac. 1065; McNeil v. Morgan, 157 Cal. 373, 376, 108 Pac. 69; 32 Cyc. 1354. From the transcript it appears that the defendants interposed a motion to strike out, but the motion was not set forth in the transcript, nor does the transcript show what order the trial court made thereon. The demurrer interposed to the second count contained 15 folios of assignments, each and all of which are addressed to the immaterial allegations above referred to. The initial paragraphs of the count stated a cause of action, and the cause of action was not annihilated by adding the immaterial matter. To get rid of the immaterial matter, the attack should have been by a motion to strike instead of a demurrer. Cf. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 430, 453. When the demurrer to the second count had been sustained, there was still left of the pleading everything which of right the plaintiff was entitled to have remaining in the pleading. In other words, the plaintiff had inserted in its amended complaint the first count, which was perfectly good. It had also inserted a second count, which was but a duplication of the first count with some surplusage added thereto. Conceding, without deciding, that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the second count, the plaintiff was entitled to proceed on the first count and introduce every bit of evidence which it could have introduced on the second count. When the defendants shall have answered the first count and shall have set forth all of their claims, the burden will rest on the defendants to sustain their claims by proving the same at the date of trial. It is therefore clear, as we stated above, that the appellant has not been deprived of any substantial rights by the ruling complained of.

ADAMSON v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 4732.)

1. Street railroads 🔑99(1)—Driving of automobile close to street car tracks held not contributory negligence.

That one driving a taxi colliding with a street car which was being backed without a warning or lookout was driving closer to street car tracks than required under traffic conditions did not constitute contributory negligence.

2. Street railroads 🔑90(3)—Backing of street car without warning or lookout held negligent.

That a street car was operated backward without any audible warning or without notice by flagging or otherwise, thereby colliding with plaintiff's automobile, held negligence as a matter of law.

3. Negligence 🔑136(14)—Where one of parties departs from usual custom to injury of another questions of negligence are for jury.

Where a usual custom has obtained, and one of parties has to discomfiture of other without notice departed from such custom, question of negligence of defendant and contributory negligence of plaintiff are for jury to determine in light of all facts, including alleged custom and deviation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by William F. Adamson against the City and County of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George Lull, City Atty., and Charles S. Peery, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellant.

William A. Kelly and Harold C. Faulkner, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. In this case the defendant city appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The judgment was for damages rendered in a personal injury case. In his complaint the plaintiff charged that the injuries were caused by the negligent operation of one of the street cars owned by the defendant. In its answer the defendant denied all allegations of negligence which were pleaded in the complaint and affirmatively pleaded the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. Both parties introduced evidence in support of their respective allegations, and the trial court gave instructions to the jury on all of the issues made by the pleadings. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

[1] At this time the appellant makes one point, and that point is to the effect that the evidence did not show that the defendant was guilty of negligence, but it did show that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence.

Geary street runs east and west, and there is located in the street a double set of tracks; the northerly track is used for cars traveling in a westerly direction and the southerly track is used for cars traveling in an easterly direction. Between the cross streets, Presidio avenue and Masonic avenue, the defendant maintains a car barn. From the northerly track there are switches on which a car can be drawn from that track into the car barn. On the morning of November 18, 1918, the plaintiff was driving a taxicab containing some passengers. He had picked up his passengers on upper Market street, and was on the way to his point of destination, which was a house out near the beach toward the westerly end of Geary street. He drove out Geary street. As he did so one of the street cars of the defendant was being switched back from Masonic avenue easterly along the northerly or out-bound track on Geary street toward the car barn, where it was to be turned in for the night. It was standing, or almost imperceptibly moving, when the respondent drove his taxicab westerly along Geary street. There was no other traffic at that hour of the night. The parties make no issue to the effect that the car did not have a right to be in the place where it was, but the fact is conceded by both parties. As the plaintiff drove westerly the street car was ahead of him on the northerly track. It had no headlight on the eastern end. It had lights inside which shone out through the glass windows. At the point where the car was located the street is broad, and there is an abundance of traveling space on each side of the tracks. As the plaintiff proceeded on his way he could see the street car ahead on the northerly track, but there is no evidence that during that time the car made any motion indicating that it was not outward bound. The plaintiff drove past the municipal car barn toward the ocean. While he was so driving he proceeded to pass the car in question on the right-hand side thereof. He assumed that the car was going in the same direction that he was going, whereas, although the car was on the track used by cars going in a westerly direction, the operator of the car was in the act of moving it in an easterly direction. But the testimony is all one way to the effect that the plaintiff did not know that fact, nor was there anything to call such fact to his attention. There was no headlight on the easterly end of the car; there was no person on the easterly end of the car; no gong was sounded and no warning of any kind was given indicating the direction the car was moving. The operator in charge of the car stood on the west platform driving the car in an easterly direction. In other words, the street car, without a headlight, without sounding a gong or bell, and without giving any other kind of a signal, was being backed in an easterly direction along a street car track customarily used by westerly bound cars, and at that time the car had no person in the position of a lookout in the direction in which the car was traveling. When the plaintiff had reached a position on the right-hand side of the street car, the car slowly moved eastward, and, at the same time taking the curve, the overhang of the end of the car was projected outward from the general line of the street car track in such a manner and to such an extent that the corner of the car ran into and collided with the plaintiff sitting at the wheel of his taxicab. Immediately before the impact the automobile was running parallel with the tracks and five or six feet north.

We shall address ourselves first to the claim that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The claim of the defendant on this subject is that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in driving so close to the defendant's car when he was not compelled under the circumstances to do so. In the case of O'Connor v. United Railroads, 168 Cal. 43, 48, 141 Pac. 809, 811, the court was considering the same claim regarding a plaintiff who was driving 14 or 16 inches from the defendant's tracks. The court said:

> "It is undoubtedly true that plaintiff was required to exercise reasonable care in driving along the public street in the vicinity of the track of the defendant; such care and diligence as a reasonably prudent man would have exercised under the circumstances. As a general rule, whether a person has exercised ordinary care or not is to be left to the jury to be determined by them from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time. But it was not negligence per se for the plaintiff to drive along the street as he did in proximity to the track of the defendant. This of itself did not constitute negligence at all. The streets of a municipality are for the use of the traveling public and the right of a street car company is only to use it in common with the public. The fact that the company has been granted a right to lay tracks and operate cars along the streets gives it no exclusive right to travel even over that portion of a street covered by its tracks. Other vehicles have a right to travel over the entire street, including the space between the tracks. Nor is this right restricted to the times when other portions of the street may be crowded or in bad condition. Nor is a traveler in doing so in any sense of the term a trespasser." (Italics ours.)

[2] Turning to the issue of negligence on the part of the defendant, it will be noted that at the time of the accident the defendant's car was being operated backward without any audible warning, and without notice by flagging or otherwise; nevertheless the defendant claims that such facts show no negligence as a matter of law. In this contention we think that the appellant is in error. In the case of Swain v. Fourteenth St. R. R. Co., 93 Cal. 179, 184, 28 Pac. 829, 830, the court was considering the act of the operator of a car who was at his post but was looking behind the car instead of ahead of it. The court said:

> "This evidence was also sufficient to show that the driver of the car was negligent in omitting, without any apparent excuse, to look ahead and observe whether the track was clear. It is the duty of such a driver, equally with the driver of any other vehicle, to observe what is in the road before him, so as to avoid inflicting injury upon others, if practicable."

[3] When, as in the instant case, the street car is not being operated in the ordinary and usual direction, but is being backed, the necessity for the application of the same rule is not less, but is greater. Where, as here, a usual practice or custom has obtained, and where, as here, the claim is made that one of the parties has, to the discomfiture of the other, without notice, departed from the usual custom, or practice, the courts have by an unbroken line of decisions held that the question of negligence on the part of the defendant, and the question of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, are both questions for the jury to determine in the light of all of the facts, including the evidence tending to establish the alleged custom or practice and the alleged deviation therefrom. Lawyer v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 161 Cal. 53, 58, 118 Pac. 237; Carter v. Sioux City Service Co., 160 Iowa, 78, 89, 141 N. W. 26, where, at page 30, the Supreme Court of Iowa says:

> "In the case before us it was incumbent upon the jury to say whether one or both of these parties was responsible by his negligence for the collision. The jury could not say whether either one of these parties was negligent without having some conception of what under all the circumstances he ought to have done. What was the usual method (or usual methods if more than one) of piloting the street car across these tracks was to our minds an appropriate circumstance for the consideration of the jury. Not that any particular method was binding as a matter of law upon either party, but that the jury was entitled to all the circumstances. If there was or was not a departure from the usual method, such was proper evidence for whatever light it might bring. * * * Its admissibility for this purpose is considerably emphasized. There was a collision at an intersection where both parties had a right to pass. The safe passage of each depended upon their co-operation and mutual understanding. If there were usual methods practiced which were mutually understood by both parties, then a departure from such methods by one tended naturally to the discomfiture of the other."

In Lawyer v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., supra, Mr. Justice Melvin cites with approval North Chicago St. R. Co. v. Irwin, 202 Ill. 345, 66 N. E. 1077. In that case (202 Ill. 347, 66 N. E. on page 1078) the Supreme Court of Illinois said:

> "The existence of this custom entered into the consideration of the question whether the motorman was in the exercise of ordinary care in propelling the car northwards on the west track at such a rate of speed as 12 or 15 miles per hour, and also bore upon the question of the carefulness or negligence of the deceased in leaving the space between the tracks and going upon the west track in order to be out of danger from a car moving northward. * * * But whether he had the right to rely solely upon his knowledge of the custom and to omit other precautions and yet be deemed in the exercise of ordinary care, was a question of fact to be determined by the jury upon consideration of all the testimony bearing upon the point."

In each of the last three cases which we have cited, the injured party was approached from and hit in the back. That fact does not makes those cases inapplicable to this case.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

MT. SHASTA POWER CORPORATION v. DENNIS et al. (Civ. 2751.)

1. Eminent domain 🔑254—Right of appeal by condemnor held waived by payment of judgment.

Right of appeal by appropriator held waived by payment of judgment and taking possession in eminent domain proceedings, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1251, 1252, 1254, 1255a, 1257, and Const. art. 1, § 14.

2. Eminent domain 🔑258—Appeal within 30 days stays issuance of execution or assessment of damages.

An appeal by plaintiff in eminent domain proceeding within 30 days after entry of judgment will operate to say issuance of execution, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1252, or assessment of damages, under section 1255a.

3. Appeal and error 🔑157—Profitableness of compliance with judgment held not to prevent compliance from waiving right of appeal.

That parties may find it more profitable to comply with judgment and accept fruits thereof than to suffer losses incident to an appeal cannot be said to render compliance with judgment compulsory as affecting waiver of right to appeal.

4. Eminent domain 🔑254—That judgment was paid "without prejudice to" right to appeal, did not prevent waiver of right.

That money was deposited to pay judgment in eminent domain proceedings "without prejudice to" plaintiff's right of appeal was immaterial as affecting waiver of right to appeal.

5. Eminent domain 🔑165—No right given condemnor to recover back part of compensation paid into court for landowner.

There is no provision, constitutional or statutory, giving plaintiff in eminent domain proceedings right to recover any part of compensation paid into court for defendant, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1251, in event of judgment for smaller sum upon second trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by the Mt. Shasta Power Corporation against Malcolm Dennis and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

W. B. Bosley and T. J. Straub, both of San Francisco, and Chenoweth & Leininger, of Redding, for appellant.

Carter & Smith, of Redding, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is a motion to dismiss plaintiff's appeal from that part of the judgment herein which fixes defendants' damages for the taking of their property for a public use.

The defendants are the owners of certain lands riparian to Pitt river. Fall river empties into Pitt river above these lands. Having determined to divert all of the water naturally flowing in Fall river to its hydroelectric power plant, and thence convey the water to Pitt river at a point below defendants' lands, this proceeding was commenced for the purpose of condemning defendants' riparian rights in so far as the waters to be diverted from Fall river are material thereto. September 15, 1922, the jury returned a verdict fixing the amount of defendants' damages on account of the proposed taking. September 22, 1922, judgment was entered on the verdict. On the same day the plaintiff served and filed its notice of intention to move for a new trial. September 29, 1922, the plaintiff paid into court for the defendants the amount of the judgment and costs, and, in connection therewith, filed a written statement as follows:

> "To the Above-Entitled Court and to Mr. S. W. Witherow, Clerk Thereof:
> "Mt. Shasta Power Corporation, plaintiff in the above-entitled action, in compliance with, and for the purpose of preserving, its rights under the final judgment of condemnation entered in the above-entitled cause * * * and title 7, pt. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure of California, herewith deposits in the above-entitled court, for the defendants above named, * * * the compensation awarded by said judgment to said defendants. * * * The said plaintiff, however, by depositing the aforesaid sums of money in said court for said defendants, as aforesaid, does so without prejudice to, and without any intention on its part to waive its right to prosecute its pending motion for a new trial in the above-entitled proceeding, or its right to appeal from said judgment."

From affidavits introduced by defendants in opposition to plaintiff's motion for a new trial, it appears that on the 1st and 2d days of October, 1922, the plaintiff "diverted substantially all of the waters of Fall river" to its power plant, "without the consent or acquiescence of any of said defendants." Plaintiff introduced an affidavit to the effect that on the 30th day of September and on the 1st, 2d, and 22d days of October it "temporarily diverted some of the waters of Fall river" for the purpose of "testing out and adjusting the machinery in said power house," and other stated purposes, "with the consent and acquiescence of said defendants." October 9, 1922, the money deposited by plaintiff was, on the order of the court, paid to defendants. October 20, 1922, defendants filed a satisfaction of the judgment. October 23, 1922, plaintiff filed notice of motion for an order authorizing plaintiff to take possession of and use the property condemned, during the pendency of the action, and offer "to pay into court such further sum as may reasonably be required by the court as a fund to pay any further damages and costs that may be recovered in this proceeding, as well as all damages that may be sustained by the defendants, if, for any cause, the property shall not be finally taken for public use—all in accordance with the provisions of section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This motion will be made without prejudice to plaintiff's right to further prosecute its motion for a new trial now pending in the above-entitled court and cause, and also without prejudice to its right to take and prosecute an appeal from the judgment heretofore entered in said court and cause." On the same day the court made an order reciting that plaintiff had paid into court an additional sum of $3,000 as required by the court and authorizing plaintiff "to take possession of and use the property described in said judgment for the purposes stated in said complaint, during the pendency, and until the final conclusion of said action." No claim is made that the plaintiff has not been in possession of the property condemned since the making of the foregoing order. December 18, 1922, plaintiff's motion for a new trial was denied and on January 6, 1923, it served its notice of appeal. Defendants' motion to dismiss the appeal is made upon the ground that "plaintiff has waived its right to appeal from said judgment by the voluntary payment of the amount of said judgment, and by taking possession of and using and appropriating the property condemned in said action and for which the amount of said judgment was paid as just compensation." The following sections of the Code of Civil Procedure are applicable to the questions here raised:

> 1251. "The plaintiff, must, within thirty days after final judgment, pay the sum of money assessed."
> 1252. "Payments may be made to the defendants entitled thereto, or the money may be deposited in court for the defendants, and be distributed to those entitled thereto. If the money be not so paid or deposited, the defendants may have execution as in civil cases."
> 1254. "At any time after trial and judgment entered or pending an appeal from the judgment, * * * whenever the plaintiff shall have paid into court, for the defendant, the full amount of the judgment, and such further sum as may be required by the court as a fund to pay any further damages and costs that may be recovered in said proceeding, as well as all damages that may be sustained by the defendant, if for any cause, the property shall not be finally taken for public use, the superior court in which the proceeding was tried may * * * authorize the plaintiff * * * to take possession of and use the property during the pendency of and until the final conclusion of the litigation. * * * The defendant, who is entitled to the money paid into court for him upon any judgment, shall be entitled to demand and receive the same at any time thereafter upon obtaining an order therefor from the court. It shall be the duty of the court, or a judge thereof, upon application being made by such defendant, to order and direct that the money so paid into court for him be delivered to him upon his filing a satisfaction of the judgment, or upon his filing a receipt therefor, and an abandonment of all defenses to the action or proceeding, except as to the amount of damages that he may be entitled to in the event that a new trial shall be granted. A payment to a defendant, as aforesaid, shall be held to be an abandonment by such defendant of all defenses interposed by him, excepting his claim for greater compensation."

1257. "The provisions of part two of this Code, relative to new trials and appeals, except in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this title, apply to the proceedings mentioned in this title; provided, that upon the payment of the sum of money assessed, * * * the plaintiff shall be entitled to enter into, improve, and hold possession of the property sought to be condemned * * * as provided in section twelve hundred and fifty-four, and devote the same to the public use in question; and no motion, for new trial or appeal shall, after such payment, * * * in any manner retard the contemplated improvement."

[1-5] Appellant contends that its payment of the damages awarded the defendants was not voluntary, but that, under the provision of section 1251, herein quoted, it was compelled to make such payment within 30 days after final judgment, "as failure to comply with this provision would have subjected appellant to liability to execution, or to extra damages upon abandonment," as provided by sections 1252 and 1255a. An appeal by plaintiff, however, within 30 days after entry of the judgment would have operated to stay the issuance of execution under the provisions of the one section or the assessment of damages under the other. Colusa, etc., R. R. Co. v. Superior Court, 31 Cal. App. 746, 761, 161 Pac. 1011. Plaintiff had the option of paying the damages awarded and taking possession or appealing from the judgment and remaining out of possession until the final determination of the compensation to be paid. Appellant further urges that it had theretofore acquired the rights of substantially all persons other than defendants in the water to be diverted, that it could not operate its power plant without such water, that its loss from failure to operate its plant would have greatly exceeded the amount of the judgment, and that therefore the payment of the compensation awarded and the entry into possession were not voluntary but compulsory and did not constitute a waiver of appeal.

The fact that a party may find it more profitable to comply with a judgment and accept the fruits thereof than to suffer the losses incident to an appeal cannot be said to render such compliance compulsory. The necessities of the plaintiff and its intention in making payment and taking possession, however, are not decisive of the case. In taking possession, the plaintiff was exercising a statutory right, and the effect of its acts must be measured by the provisions of the statute. In taking the fruits of the judgment under the authority of the statute, the plaintiff could not impose conditions upon defendants' acceptance of the money paid which are not provided by the statute. It is not perceived that the plaintiff's attempt to limit the effect of its payment and entry is material. Its statement, in connection with the payment of the money into court, that the same was deposited "without prejudice to * * * its right to appeal from said judgment" is of no value in determining the question of its right to appeal, a right which is wholly dependent upon the statute. Ordinarily the voluntary compliance with a judgment and the acceptance of the fruits thereof by a party are inconsistent with a right of appeal by such party. By accepting the money paid into court in a proceeding in eminent domain a defendant thereby abandons "all defenses interposed by him," excepting the one saved to him by the statute, "his claim for greater compensation." But for this saving clause the acceptance of payment by a defendant of the amount awarded him as damages would be an abandonment of all defenses. The Constitution (article 1, § 14) provides:

> "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made to, or paid into court for the owner."

Such compensation "is not paid into court for him until he can take it." Steinhart v. Superior Court, 137 Cal. 575, 579, 70 Pac. 629, 59 L. R. A. 404, 92 Am. St. Rep. 183. There is no provision, constitutional or statutory, giving a plaintiff the right to recover any part of the compensation so paid in the event of a judgment for a smaller sum upon a second trial. The facts involved in the case of Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co. v. Rumpp, 104 Cal. 20, 37 Pac. 859, differ from those in this, in that the defendant there appealed, after accepting the compensation paid into court by the plaintiff, and that—

> "The payment of the money into court by the plaintiff was not accompanied by a motion for a new trial or notice of appeal, or other objection to the amount found by the jury."

The grounds, however, upon which the decision is based, are independent of such failure to appeal or object. Commencing on page 25, it is said:

"It paid its money and took possession of the land condemned. * * * Upon payment of the money plaintiff acquired a vested right in the property, and the defendant a vested right in the compensation. * * * The abandonment by the defendant of all defenses except her claim for greater compensation confirmed plaintiff's right to the property, and estopped her from denying that right, and the plaintiff, we think, is equally estopped to say that the money received by the defendant is not hers. It is urged, however, that the appeal from the first judgment vacated it, and with it the finding of the compensation awarded to the defendant. But if that were true the plaintiff's right to the possession was swept away with the defendant's right to the compensation. Plaintiff's right to possession, depending, as it does under the Constitution, upon compensation first made, cannot exist without it. It is therefore clear that the appeal of defendant, accompanied by her abandonment of other defenses, did not, as in ordinary cases, vacate the judgment. Nothing that was in issue upon the first trial was in issue upon the second. The sole questions were whether the defendant was entitled to 'greater compensation,' and, if so, how much additional compensation was she entitled to. The statute requires the court to pay to the defendant the damages awarded by the jury so deposited by the plaintiff, but makes no provision or requirement that any part of it under any circumstances shall be repaid. Under a statute of the state of New York containing a similar provision for the payment or deposit of the compensation for the land, etc., an appeal is provided for, and on such appeal a new appraisal may be ordered. * * * The statute then provides: 'If the amount of the compensation to be paid by the company is increased by the second report the difference shall be a lien on the land appraised, and shall be paid by the company to the parties entitled to the same, or deposited in the bank, as the court shall direct; and if the amount is diminished the difference shall be refunded to the company by the party to whom the same may have been paid.' * * * Under the above statute not only is the whole question of compensation set at large by the order for a new appraisement, but if the amount is reduced there is an express requirement that it shall be repaid, * * * whilst under our statute we find no requirement that anything shall be refunded."

In support of appellant's contention that payment of the damages awarded and entry into possession did not constitute a waiver of an appeal, Lewis on Eminent Domain (3d Ed.) § 808, is cited. It is there said:

"If the petitioner pays the damages awarded, this will, in the absence of any statute, waive an appeal, but the deposit of damages for the purpose of obtaining possession will not deprive the petitioner of the right of appeal."

In support of the latter part of the statement the author cites cases from Indiana, Louisiana, Michigan, and Missouri. The statutes considered in those decisions were essentially different from those of this state. The Indiana statute authorized the plaintiff to take possession upon payment of the amount of the award and provided:

"The award of said arbitrators may be reviewed by the circuit court * * * and the subsequent proceedings on the appeal shall only affect the amount of compensation to be allowed." Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Nowlin, 163 Ind. 497, 72 N. E. 257.

The Louisiana statute provided:

"In the event of any change being made by the final decree in the decision of the cause, the corporation shall be bound to pay the additional sum assessed, or be entitled to recover back the surplus paid, as the case may be." New Orleans Terminal Co. v. Fireman's Charitable Ass'n, 115 La. 442, 39 South. 437.

The Michigan statute provided that if the compensation—

"is increased by the second report, the difference is to be a lien on the land appraised, and be paid by the company. If the amount is diminished, the difference shall be refunded to the company." Fort St. Union Depot Co. v. Peninsular Stove Co., 103 Mich. 637, 61 N. W. 1007.

The Missouri statute was similar to that of Indiana. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. v. Clark, 119 Mo. 357, 24 S. W. 157; St. Louis, etc., R. R. Co. v. Aubuchon, 199 Mo. 352, 97 S. W. 867, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 426, 116 Am. St. Rep. 499, 8 Ann. Cas. 822. The statute construed in Madisonville, H. & E. R. R. Co. v. Ross, 126 Ky. 138, 103 S. W. 330, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 420, cited by appellant, provided:

"When an appeal shall be taken * * * by the company, it shall not be entitled to take possession of the land or material condemned until it shall have paid into court the damages assessed and all costs."

Here it clearly appears that the statute contemplated a right of appeal, notwithstanding the payment. In Chicago, S. F. & C. Ry. Co. v. Phelps, 125 Ill. 482, 17 N. E. 769, the owner had expressly agreed to refund the money paid as compensation in the event of a reversal of the judgment. In Kansas City Southern Ry. Co. v. Boles, 88 Ark. 533, 115 S. W. 375, the plaintiff had paid into court the compensation awarded under a mistake as to its rights, and it was held that, under such circumstances, plaintiff's right of appeal was not waived. In City of Rosebud v. Vitek (Tex. Civ. App.) 210 S. W. 728, the statute (article 6530, Rev. Stats.) construed provided:

"Where the award paid the defendant or appropriated by him exceeds the value of the property as determined by the final judgment, the court shall adjudge the excess to be returned to the plaintiff."

No case has been cited or discovered which holds that the condemning party can recover any part of the compensation paid to the owner, in the absence of a statute expressly or by necessary implication authorizing such recovery.

In Pyle v. Woods, 18 Idaho, 674, 111 Pac. 746, the statute under consideration gave both parties the right to have the question of compensation determined by a jury, with the proviso that the condemning party might apply for the appointment of commissioners to assess such compensation, and that after the making of such assessment the plaintiff might have possession upon payment of the sum so assessed. The plaintiff caused the assessment to be made, paid the amount thereof into court, took possession of the property, and then sought to have defendant's damages fixed by a jury. In granting a writ prohibiting the court from proceeding with the trial the Supreme Court said:

> "After the assessment of damages by the commissioners the company was not obliged to pay the award if it was dissatisfied with the amount assessed but might have gone before the court and a jury and had the damages assessed in the usual way. The payment of the award made by the commissioners was wholly voluntary on the part of the plaintiff. * * * It would be trifling with justice and the rights of property owners to allow a company, endowed with the powers of eminent domain, to come into court, procure the appointment of commissioners, pay the award made into the court, take possession of the defendant's property, and thereafter put the defendant to the annoyance and expense of a trial before the court and jury when the defendant is already willing to accept the award which has been made and upon which plaintiff has taken possession of his property."

In Helm & N. W. R. Co. v. Turner, 89 Miss. 334, 42 South. 377, it was held that the plaintiff waived its right of appeal by payment of the award and entry into possession under a statute which provided:

> "Upon the return of the verdict and entry of the judgment, if the applicant pay the defendant whose compensation is fixed by it, or tender to him the amount so found and pay the costs, he or it shall have the right to enter in and upon the land of such defendant so condemned, and to appropriate the same to the public use defined in the application."

Under statutes of other states authorizing a condemning party to take possession upon payment of the award and providing that the plaintiff shall be required to pay any additional sum awarded the defendant upon a second hearing, but making no provision for a recovery by the plaintiff in the event of a diminished second award, it has been held that by payment and entry into possession the plaintiff waives the right of appeal. Mayor, etc., of Jersey City v. Hamilton, 70 N. J. Law, 48, 56 Atl. 670; Oregon Electric Ry. Co. v. Terwilliger, 51 Or. 107, 93 Pac. 334, 930; City of Portland v. Schmid, 82 Or. 465, 161 Pac. 560; City of Spokane v. Cowles, 67 Wash. 539, 121 Pac. 463. The foregoing decisions are all in harmony with what is said in Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co. v. Rumpp, supra, and that case must be held to be controlling here.

The appeal is dismissed.

WILLSON v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY, et al. (Civ. 4624.)

1. Witnesses 🔑184(1)—Generally no absolute privilege to decline to reveal trade secrets.

Generally, while there is no absolute privilege to decline to reveal a so-called trade secret, yet, unless rights of innocent persons are dependent on their disclosure, property right of possessor should be protected.

2. Explosives 🔑8—Complaint held to authorize evidence of composition of flare.

In action for injuries from explosion of flare, manufactured by defendant, allegation of complaint that it was highly and dangerously explosive made determination of its explosiveness a material element, and evidence of its composition was relevant.

3. Witnesses 🔑21—Refusal to disclose composition of flare causing injury held contempt.

As chemical composition of flare was material to right of action of person injured from explosion thereof, right of manufacturer to protection of his trade secret yields to superior right of plaintiff, and refusal of defendant, called as plaintiff's witness, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, to disclose composition, was contempt.

Writ of review by W. H. Willson against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, and another. Writ discharged.

Dudley Robinson, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Arthur Wright, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Certiorari. The purpose of the proceeding before this court is to determine the legality of a judgment of contempt and an order of commitment, arising out of the refusal of the person adjudged guilty of the contempt to answer certain questions propounded to him as a witness.

The witness was the defendant in the action. He was the proprietor of a business engaged in the manufacture and sale of fireworks. As a part of such enterprise he prepared and sold an article known as an "actinic flare," which was particularly useful in taking photographs in the moving picture business, and which, because of its efficiency and its comparative cheapness, was in great demand, and from the sale and manufacture of which the defendant derived a very considerable profit. The process of its manufacture was a secret known only to the defendant. The article was made in the form of a tube, at one end of which was a wooden handle, suitable either for holding in one's hand or for attaching by means of a nail to a wooden post or pole or other object. In the other end of the tube was a fuse to be used for lighting the flare. Upon the flare was a printed statement in the following words:

> "Two Minutes Actinic Flares. Should always be burned horizontally and held at arm's length. They start with a slow flame, but soon burst into a fierce flare. If it is desired to burn them from a post or elevation, drive a ten-penny nail into post; the nail head will pass into the hole in handle. Handle carefully; don't hammer or drive nails in them. If damaged they will not burn steadily."

It appears that the defendant sold several flares to a moving picture concern, and that one of its employees was injured by reason of the fact that one of the flares exploded in the hand of the employee after the flare had been ignited in the ordinary and customary manner of its use. The employee brought an action against defendant for damages, and among the allegations of the complaint, either as originally filed, or as amended on the trial, are charges to the effect that the flare was of a "dangerous and explosive character"; that the flare "contained chemicals which were or might easily become explosive"; that the plaintiff was not familiar with the constituency or proportions which constituted the burning substance of said flare, "but alleges the same was well known to defendant, and that they are highly explosive"; also that when the chemical substance of the flare becomes powdered or loose the flare "becomes highly and dangerously explosive."

By far the greater part of the foregoing allegations were contained in the amendment to the complaint which was filed after practically all the evidence in behalf of plaintiff had been introduced on the trial; and, although the record does not disclose that any answer was interposed thereto, the parties and the court thereafter, when the question was asked to which objection was made and which question and answer are hereinafter set out, treated the matter as though an answer had been filed by defendant denying each of such allegations. Counsel for defendant offered to stipulate that under certain circumstances, such as if in the manufacture of the flare the formula were departed from, or if the flare were cracked or bruised or "beaten about the head," the flare might explode; but refused to stipulate to the chemical constituents of the flare, or what were the respective proportions of its several parts or substances, or that the flare was inherently dangerous.

On the trial, under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the defendant was called as a witness, not for himself, but on behalf of the plaintiff, and was thus being "examined by the adverse party as if under cross-examination." He was asked the following question:

> "By Mr. Wright: Q. Mr. Willson, what are the chemical constituents of that flare? And by that I mean what is the flare made up of? What are the chemicals or substances or drugs of which it is made, and what are their respective proportions?"

Defendant's counsel interposed an objection to the question that it was—

> "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and calling for a privileged matter, a secret process or trade secret; and, further, upon the ground that the disclosure of the trade secret is not necessary to the decision of this case, or in the interests of justice."

On advice of counsel, defendant declined and refused to answer the question which had been propounded to him. The court adjudged him guilty of contempt of court for such refusal, and the defendant was thereupon committed to the county jail of Los Angeles county until he should answer the said question.

The question of the jurisdiction of the trial court to so adjudge defendant guilty of a contempt of the court and to order him committed by reason thereof is the only matter suggested for determination herein.

[1] The general trend of authority, as recognized by text-writers and by courts alike, is to the effect that, while there is no absolute privilege (such as may be present where certain confidential relationships exist) to decline to reveal a so-called trade secret, yet, unless the rights of innocent persons are dependent upon their disclosure, the property right of the possessor of such trade secret should be protected. Mr. Wigmore, in his work on Evidence, vol. 4, § 2212, lays down the principle that ordinarily there ought to be a recognition by the courts of such a privilege. His conclusions, so far as affects the facts of this case, are contained within his statement that—

> "No privilege of secrecy should be recognized if the rights of possibly innocent persons depend essentially or chiefly for their ascertainment upon the disclosure in question."

The policy of the law is unquestionably that of fostering and protecting trade secrets, as is shown by the laws affecting their registration, and, unless the interests of justice imperatively demand their disclosure, a disregard of valuable property rights arising from enforced disclosure, whether by means of contempt proceedings or otherwise, approaches at least the confiscation of private property. 40 Cyc. 2532; Jones on Evidence, vol. 5, § 892; Cyclopedia of Evidence, vol. 14, p. 663.

[2] It is important to determine, first, whether the allegations of the complaint were sufficient to authorize the reception of such evidence. Reverting to those allegations, it will be noticed that there are many expressions to the effect that the chemical constituency of the flare was "highly and dangerously explosive." The meaning of such language is apparent. There can be no misunderstanding that the thought thereby sought to be conveyed is that the substance of which the flare is composed is explosive in the same sense that gunpowder or dynamite is explosive. In plain and forceful language the defendant is placed on notice of just what plaintiff claims is one of the properties of the substance which defendant sold for plaintiff's use, without any alleged adequate warning as to its dangerous qualities. Should the ingredients of the flare, taken either separately or in any combination of its various parts, however prepared or however treated, be shown to be entirely harmless from an explosive standpoint, the case of the employee would present an entirely different aspect than though the formula for the manufacture of the flare were to present a chemical condition which, under circumstances as portrayed by the evidence, would certainly result in an explosion of very great force. The position of the injured employee with reference to the chemical composition of the flare is not one either of idle curiosity, or yet one of an interest from the standpoint of a business competitor or a rival. The case of the injured employee may of necessity require the showing which he has attempted to make. The result of the trial may depend absolutely upon the ability of the plaintiff to demonstrate the inherently dangerous qualities of the substance of which the flare is composed. His interest in knowing the chemical composition of the flare may be vital to his case, in that, in order to sustain his cause, he may be obliged to convince the trial court that the substance of the flare, at least in the condition it was at the time it was used, whether arising from rough physical usage, resulting in the tube and its contents being cracked or powdered, or from some other cause, was "highly and dangerously explosive." It would, therefore, become not merely incidental to plaintiff's cause of action, but would be the very crux of the matter. Far from being collateral, it would then present the paramount issue of the case. To say the least, the determination of the explosiveness of the flare is a material element of the action, and the offered evidence is unquestionably relevant thereto.

[3] While it may be of great pecuniary importance to the owner of a trade secret, because of the revenue or profit derived by him from the manufacture and the sale of the product dependent thereon, that the formula for its production remain undisclosed, it may also well be of greater comparative consequence to one injured by or through its use that the secret be divulged in order that the rights of the injured person may be adequately protected. The right of the manufacturer to the protection of his trade secret ought to yield to the superior right of an innocent person who has suffered injury through no fault of his own, but assumedly through the negligence of the manufacturer. It would, indeed, be a dangerous principle, and one inimical to the standards of justice, to hold that the right of an injured innocent person to redress should be withheld solely because the person causing the injury and responsible therefor was in possession of certain facts, however consequential to his private interests, without the disclosure of which such right could not be determined or enforced, and thus, in effect, uphold the wrongdoer in his wrongdoing. No man is entitled to be protected in his proper right to a trade secret where, by the exercise of such right, he has wrought an injury to another and the disclosure of such secret is indispensable to the ascertainment of the truth and the ultimate determination of the civil rights of the parties.

If it be assumed that the article called an "actinic flare," instead of being composed of the various substances making up its composition, actually was composed of a substance known to the general public as gunpowder, and that the injured employee had no notice of its dangerous qualities other than such notice as was here given, it could not be doubted that the injured employee would be entitled to prove that the actinic flare was of a "dangerous and explosive character"; or that when its chemical substance was powdered or loose the flare thereupon became "highly and dangerously explosive." Such being the case, there being evidence that an explosion occurred through which the employee received an injury, his right to show, if he can, the inherently dangerous qualities of the substance causing the explosion and the pertinency of such evidence is apparent.

It follows that the writ should be discharged. It is so ordered.

HUNT v. SUTTER-BUTTE CANAL CO.
(Civ. 2709.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 27, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1033(9)—Defendant held without complaint as to verdict not excessive, in less amount than prayed for.

In action for damages from overflow waters from defendant's canal, where evidence showed that loss exceeded damages awarded, defendant cannot complain that award was less than claimed.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑263—Finding of negligent obstruction of irrigation canal sustained.

Evidence held to justify jury's conclusion that obstruction in irrigation canal was negligently left therein, causing water to rise, back up, and break over sides, and inundate and foul plaintiff's land during cropping year.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1052(8)—Evidence showing proper construction of canal, in action for negligent obstruction, not reviewed.

Where evidence justified verdict that negligent obstruction of canal caused water to rise and overflow plaintiff's land, evidence showing proper construction of canal was immaterial and will not be reviewed.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑262—Care required in construction and operation of irrigation system.

Where right of way for canal is granted, defendant is held to usual and ordinary manner of construction of its irrigation system and is not insurer nor liable for breaks in system from unprecedented floods, but is liable for negligent operation.

5. Appeal and error 🔑882(12)—Legal effect and language of requested instructions being practically identical, neither party can complain thereof.

Where legal effect and language of instruction given at plaintiff's request was almost identical with instruction given at defendant's request, neither party can complain thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by A. P. Hunt against the Sutter-Butte Canal Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Ingram, of Gridley, and W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant.

James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, and G. F. Jones, of Oroville, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. By this action the plaintiff sought judgment against the defendant in the sum of $14,250 on account of damages alleged to have been suffered by him to certain crops growing and being in the county of Butte in the year 1920, and the fouling of the lands then and there leased by him so as to materially diminish their productivity during the year 1921. The action was tried before a jury. Plaintiff had judgment in the sum of $1,900, and the defendant appeals.

The facts set forth in the pleadings and the transcript show that the plaintiff held, under a lease, certain lands situated in the county of Butte, upon 130 acres of which he was growing and cultivating rice; that during the year 1920 he had produced thereon a crop of considerable value; that this crop was partly harvested and standing upon the leased premises in the month of November of that year; that during said month the lands on which said crop of rice was then and there being were inundated by water escaping from a canal belonging to the defendant and appellant in this action. The allegations in the complaint material to be considered in this action are found in paragraph 6 thereof and in subdivision e of paragraph 7. Those allegations are as follows:

> "That the said defendant negligently and carelessly maintained and operated said canal and weirs and the waters therein by boards being left in a weir, near where the Biggs road crosses the canal, thereby causing the waters to rise and back up and break out and overflow and seep through, and as herein set forth, and that because of such negligent and careless maintaining and operating of said canal and weirs and the waters therein, by defendant, water escaped from said canal and seeped through and over and ran through the side of the canal during the latter part of the cropping season of 1920, and continued to do so for some time thereafter, and said defendant negligently and carelessly allowed said water to flow to and upon the said lands of plaintiff herein."
> "That by reason of the overflow and seepage of said water from said canal, as hereinbefore alleged and set forth, plaintiff was compelled to perform extra services and incur extra expense in cleaning and clearing up the land so overflowed, and refilling holes cut by the water, and was thereby further damaged in the sum of $650."

Other allegations appear in the complaint setting forth in the aggregate the amount of damages alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff for and on account of the waters escaping from the canal belonging to the defendant. The lands held under lease by the plaintiff belonged to Mrs. Mattie A. Looney, who, prior to the execution of the lease to the plaintiff of the lands inundated, had executed to the defendant a deed for a right of way 60 feet in width running through said leased lands for the purpose of constructing and operating an irrigating ditch or canal. This ditch or canal had been constructed by the defendant and was under its control and was being operated by it at the time of the injury complained of. The principal ground urged by the appellant herein for reversal is that the verdict of the jury is not sustained by the evidence; a minor objection is made as to certain instructions given by the court to the jury. In behalf of the appellant's contention that the verdict of the jury is not sustained by the evidence, the appellant sets forth in detail the testimony of a number of witnesses familiar with the building of canals and irrigating ditches all going to the effect that the canal or irrigating ditch in question was properly constructed, that it was built in the usual manner of ditches in that section of the country, and that precautions usually taken in building such ditches for purposes of irrigation had been taken in this instance. We do not find anything in the transcript or in the reply made by respondent which seriously questions any of the foregoing propositions relating to the construction of the ditch further than the testimony of one witness that the rainfall which occurred during the period in controversy was not other than that which might be anticipated as likely to occur every few years in that locality.

[1] The plaintiff calls our attention to the fact that the jury awarded damages in the sum of only $1,900, whereas the plaintiff in his complaint had sought to recover the sum of $14,250, and argues from this that there is nothing in the case upon which the jury could have predicated such a judgment. In this particular, however, none of the testimony is called to our attention, but we have examined the transcript and find that some 130 acres of rice were inundated by the waters referred to; that the loss was considerably in excess of the amount of damages awarded by the jury; and, also, that the testimony covered such questions as the profitable market value of the crop, the cost of harvesting and the various items of expenditure attendant thereupon, the question of the lessened yield for the one year involved, the extra cost of preparing the land for cultivation and various items necessitating considerable calculation on the part of the jury to arrive at an accurate estimate of the total loss suffered by the plaintiff, and, as the damages awarded are not complained of as being excessive, we do not very well see how the defendant can complain of a verdict simply because it is less in amount than the sum claimed by the plaintiff. So long as the damages awarded are not excessive, the smaller the amount awarded, the less cause the losing party has to complain.

[2] The gravamen of the complaint of plaintiff is found in paragraph 6, which we have heretofore quoted. It is in the allegation of leaving boards in a certain weir in the canal in question thereby causing the waters to rise, back up, break out, and overflow the leased lands held and operated by the plaintiff to the destruction of his crops; the digging out of holes therein and fouling the land so as to make it more difficult for future use. The testimony of the witnesses Scott, Bernard, and Coffey shows that the waters flooding the lands leased and held by the plaintiff came from a break in the canal above the weir thus referred to. The witness Scott testified that he was on the ranch occupied and farmed by the plaintiff in the month of November, 1920, about the 15th of November, or as nearly as he can recall; that at that time he found the canal broken and water running in the fields; that he visited the weir referred to in the complaint, and he found a man taking boards out of the weir. The witness Coffey fixes the date of the break as the 16th or 17th of November, 1920. The difference in the fixing of the dates of these witnesses is called to our attention, but it is the instance itself and not the date that usually fixes itself in the memory of the witness, and consequently but little importance could be attached to this difference in the time. The witness Scott says the 15th of November as nearly as he can recall, but his testimony shows that the water was backed up and that it was running over the bank of the canal at the place fixed as the break by the other witnesses. All three of the witnesses referred to furnish sufficient testimony to justify the jury in coming to the conclusion that the crops belonging to the plaintiff were flooded by the waters going through the break above the weir mentioned in plaintiff's complaint. The canal appears, as stated by respondent, to have been "built for a number of miles across fairly level farming land," and, consequently, any obstruction therein would cause the waters flowing in the canal to back up for a considerable distance.

[3] The witness Scott states that he was there at the time the boards were being removed from the weir which obstructed the flow of the water in the canal, and that by reason of the boards left in the same the waters therein had been backed up to such an extent that it was overflowing its banks. The jury had a right to believe this testimony and had a right to act thereon and to conclude that the obstruction in the canal had been negligently left therein. Under such circumstances, the fact that the canal was constructed in the most approved manner would become wholly immaterial. If it is in the negligent operation of the canal that injury ensues, the manner in which it was built or constructed by the defendant would not relieve it from liability. This being true, we do not see the necessity for reviewing either the testimony introduced for the purpose of establishing the proper construction of the canal or the argument of the appellant based thereon, because we would not be justified in disturbing the verdict of the jury based upon testimony tending to show its negligent operation.

[4] The law applicable to this case is also so well settled that we need only to state its principles. The right of way having been granted, the defendant is held only to the usual and ordinary course and manner of construction of its irrigating systems and is not an insurer; that a canal company is not liable for breaks occurring in its system occasioned by unprecedented and extraordinary floods which in the usual and ordinary course of events are not to be anticipated, but that its legal obligations are to anticipate such heavy rainfalls as are usual or do frequently occur in the vicinity or section of the state where its canal system is located; that a canal company is liable for all damages occasioned by the negligent operation of its irrigating system irrespective of whether a right of way has or has not been granted for the construction of its canals or irrigating ditches through the premises involved. In other words, the granting of a right of way releases the defendant from such damages as are usually and ordinarily attendant upon the building and operation of canals and irrigating ditches. Sternes v. Sutter-Butte Canal Co. (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 66.

Upon the method of ascertaining damages the court instructed the jury according to the rule laid down in Teller v. Bay & River Dredging Co., 151 Cal. 209, 90 Pac. 942, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267, 12 Ann. Cas. 779.

[5] Objection is made by appellant to instruction No. 12, given at the request of the plaintiff, in that it does not direct the jury to find from a preponderance of the evidence, and also that the reference to the damages done the leased land is erroneous as it might possibly refer to the ownership of the land. The instruction is as follows:

> "You are instructed that if you find the defendant, Sutter-Butte Canal Company, negligently and carelessly maintained and operated its canal and weirs and the water flowing in said canal in such a manner as to damage plaintiff's rice crop, or the land leased by him, he is entitled to recover such damage, and the amount thereof is to be determined by you from the instructions on the measure of damages, which I have heretofore read to you."

Instruction No. 13, asked for by the plaintiff and given by the court, refers to the same subject, and includes the word "preponderance," omitted in instruction No. 12 above set forth. It also refers to the land and elaborates upon the damages which may be considered, to wit, the fouling of the land, causing it to be overgrown with wild grass and tules by reason of the flowing, etc., and the extra expense of cleaning and clearing the land and refilling the holes made therein by the flood waters.

Instruction No. 10, given by the court at the request of defendant, eliminates the question of error, if any, committed by the court in giving plaintiff's instruction No. 12, so far as it relates to the land. The instruction, given at the request of the defendant, reads:

> "I further instruct you that if you should find from the evidence that plaintiff had suffered damage from the flooding of his land and crops in the years 1920," etc.

It thus appears that the defendant asked the court to give an instruction in almost the identical language of which it now complains. The court also, at the request of defendant, instructed the jury as follows:

> "I instruct you that the burden rests upon the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence every material allegation necessary to establish his case, and, if he fails so to do, your verdict must be in favor of the defendant."

Instruction No. 8, given by the court at the request of the defendant, also refers to the crops and land in the same manner as does the instruction No. 12 given by the court at the request of the plaintiff. The legal effect being the same and the language almost identical in the instruction given at the request of the plaintiff and the instructions given at the request of the defendant, we do not very well see how any cause of complaint arises in favor of either party.

We find no further question calling for consideration upon this appeal.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

DINSMORE et al. v. RENFROE et al.
(Civ. 4730.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹933(2)—Notice of entry of judgment presumed as of a date to support subsequent proceedings.

Notice of entry of judgment is presumed as of a date which will support subsequent proceedings and orders of trial court, in absence of a showing to contrary.

2. New trial ⟹138—Time for serving motion for new trial depends on service of notice of entry of judgment.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, time for serving notice of motion for new trial is dependent upon service of notice of judgment entry.

3. Appeal and error ⟹345(1)—Notice of appeal held filed in sufficient time.

Where notice of intention to move for a new trial was filed on Nov. 17, 1922, and presumably within 10 days after notice of entry of judgment, and motion for new trial was overruled on Feb. 9, 1923, and time for filing appeal was extended 30 days from that date, notice of appeal filed on March 2, 1923, was not too late.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1071(1)—Conflict between jury's finding in equity and court's finding held not prejudicial.

That in equity, special findings of jury as adopted by court include implied findings which are at variance with express findings of court is not cause for reversal where, upon adopted findings of jury alone, which are ones most favorable to appellant, judgment is proper.

5. Trial 🔑398—Adoption by court of special findings of jury does not necessarily include implied findings.

Where court, though not bound to do so, adopts findings of jury in answer to special interrogatories, it must not be considered as having adopted any possible implied findings at variance with its own express findings.

6. Tenancy in common 🔑50—License by one cotenant held defense to action by other tenants for trespass.

Where defendants constructed a road on property under a license granted them by one of cotenant owners, they were not answerable as trespassers to other cotenants.

7. Trial 🔑398—Court's findings held not inconsistent with jury's implied findings.

Trial court's additional findings that two cotenant owners should have made inquiry as to road construction on their land by defendants under license by another cotenant were not inconsistent with jury's implied findings that such co-owners had no actual knowledge of construction.

8. Tenancy in common 🔑50—License by cotenant to build road held irrevocable by defendants' expenditure.

License to defendants to build road, granted by one of co-owners, became irrevocable by defendants' expenditure of hundreds of dollars in reliance thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by John S. Dinsmore and others against Arthur Renfroe and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Puter & Quinn, of Eureka, for appellants.
Pierce H. Ryan, of Eureka, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment against them in an action in which they sought an injunction against the defendants to prevent them from passing over a road which said defendants had constructed at their own cost and expense over the land of plaintiffs. Plaintiffs also asked for $200, alleging damages for trespass upon the land of plaintiffs in the building of said road.

[1-3] At the outset it is necessary to consider, briefly, respondents' contention that the appeal was filed too late and should be dismissed. The record discloses that a jury answered several special interrogatories at the request of the court, but did not render a verdict. The court then made its findings and judgment, which judgment, in favor of the defendants, was entered on October 31, 1922. There is nothing to indicate when the notice of entry of judgment was served upon the plaintiffs, and in the absence of such a showing the presumption is of a date which will support the subsequent proceedings and orders of the trial court. The time for serving notice of motion for a new trial is made dependent upon the service of notice of the entry of judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 659; Bates v. Ransome Crummey Co., 42 Cal. App. 702, 184 Pac. 39. The notice of intention to move for a new trial was filed on November 17, 1922, and it will be presumed that this was within ten days after notice of entry of judgment. The motion for a new trial was determined adversely to plaintiffs on February 9, 1923. At that time, prior to August, 1923, the trial court had three months within which to determine this motion, so its order was made in good time. The time for the filing of the appeal was extended 30 days after the date of the order upon the motion for a new trial. The notice of appeal was filed on March 2, 1923, which was within that time. We think, therefore, that there is no merit in the position that the appeal should be dismissed.

The appeal comes to us upon the judgment roll alone. Special interrogatories were submitted by the court to the jury, in answer to which the jury found that the plaintiff William (W. J. C.) Dinsmore had granted to defendants permission to build the road in controversy; that the plaintiff William Dinsmore had knowledge of the construction of the road as it was being built, and that plaintiffs' property had not been damaged by the construction of the road. The court made the further findings that on March 10, 1921, plaintiffs were the owners of the land described in the complaint, and that on said date defendants had a certain easement in said lands, to wit, a right of way over, along, and across a certain road or trail extending in a general northerly and southerly direction across said land, and that plaintiffs' ownership was subject to defendants' said easement; that on said date and prior thereto plaintiffs were in possession of said lands, but their possession was subject to said easements. It was also found that in the spring or summer of 1921 the defendants entered upon the land of plaintiffs and constructed a road running north and south, terminating at the county road on the south of said land, but that said entry was not without the consent or permission of plaintiffs nor against their will in violation of any request that they keep off of said land, as alleged in the complaint, but, on the contrary, that said entry and the construction of said road by defendants was pursuant to the express authority, permission, and license so to do granted to defendants by plaintiffs; that before the commencement of the construction of said road said plaintiffs W. J. C. Dinsmore and John S. Dinsmore expressly gave and granted to defendants authority and permission to construct and use said road, and told defendants to build such road at such place as they (the said defendants) desired, which permission and authority have never been revoked; that pursuant to said authority and permission defendants did construct and build said road; that the construction thereof cost defendants many hundreds of dollars in material and labor, and that the construction thereof was with the actual knowledge of plaintiffs W. J. C. Dinsmore, John S. Dinsmore, and Trustum R. Dinsmore, and that plaintiffs W. J. C. Dinsmore and John S. Dinsmore passed over said road while it was being constructed, and saw defendants working thereon, and that plaintiffs W. J. C. Dinsmore, John S. Dinsmore, and Trustum R. Dinsmore heard defendants blasting at said construction work, and that said plaintiff W. J. C. Dinsmore offered to loan to defendants a scraper to be used in said construction work, and that a portion of said road does pass, and while construction work was in progress did pass, within sight of plaintiffs' residence, and that ever since its completion it has been used with the knowledge of all of plaintiffs, by defendants and by the general public, and that none of the plaintiffs ever protested or objected to its construction or its use by the defendants or by the public until the commencement of this action.

The trial court concluded from these findings that the defendants had been granted a license to build said road and to pass over the same, and that such license had become irrevocable by reason of the expenditure of considerable money by the defendants in reliance thereon; that plaintiffs had not been damaged by the construction of said road, and were not entitled to recover a money judgment, nor to be awarded an injunction against the defendants.

Appellants complain that the findings are inconsistent in that the jury found that William (W. J. C.) Dinsmore had granted permission to the defendants to build the road and had actual knowledge of its construction, while the court found that not only William Dinsmore but also John S. Dinsmore granted permission to build the road, and that these two plaintiffs, as well as Trustum R. Dinsmore, had actual knowledge of the construction of the road.

[4, 5] Respondents reply by pointing out that the entire case was not submitted to the jury, but merely special interrogatories; that the court adopted the jury's answers to these interrogatories, in so far as they went, and then added court findings; that the court was not bound to accept the special findings of the jury, and in doing so must not be considered as having adopted any possible implied findings of the jury at variance with express findings of the court. If this view, which we think is a proper one, be adopted, we have a situation where the court adopted a finding that one of the plaintiffs, William Dinsmore, gave defendants permission to construct the road and had actual knowledge of its construction, and added other and further findings not in conflict therewith, and to the effect that another plaintiff also granted this permission, and that two plaintiffs other than William Dinsmore had actual knowledge of the construction of the road by defendants. However, if we should construe the adopted findings of the jury as appellants insist we should do, as including implied findings that all plaintiffs except William Dinsmore did not grant permission to build the road and did not have actual knowledge of its construction, we think the judgment should not be reversed because of the conflict between these implied findings and the further findings added by the court. Under this view of the matter, the findings of the court go further than those of the jury, but upon the adopted findings of the jury alone, which are the ones most favorable to the appellants, we think the judgment was proper.

[6] The action was one to enjoin a trespass and recover damages therefor, and the question presented is whether one entering upon the common lands of a cotenancy with the permission of one of the cotenants is a trespasser.

The authorities cited by appellants holding that one cotenant cannot grant an easement that will be binding upon the interests of his co-owners have no bearing in this case, for the reason that the defendants do not claim an easement, but merely a license, which has now become irrevocable, as shall be discussed hereinafter. There is a clear distinction between the two. Pinheiro v. Bettencourt, 17 Cal. App. 111, 119, 118 Pac. 941; 17 R. C. L. § 80, p. 566 et seq. As to the power of one cotenant to grant a license which will absolve the licensee, in the exercise thereof, of the charge of trespass made by the other cotenants, it was said in the case of Ord v. Chester, 18 Cal. 77, 80:

> "Those findings present the simple question whether a party put in possession or allowed to occupy a portion of premises by one tenant in common can be sued as a trespasser by another tenant in common, without notice to quit or [some] other act showing a termination of this license or tenancy. We have no doubt that one tenant in common may occupy the common premises, and as little that he may permit another person to occupy a part of them; and it is impossible for us to see how that tenant in common could sue such person, so lawfully entering or occupying, as a trespasser, or how his cotenant could maintain such suit. Having entered, or being in possession by lawful right, he cannot, so long as his relation to the owners is unchanged, be turned into a trespasser, and held liable in costs and damages for doing what he was lawfully authorized by those owners or one of them to do."

In the case of Lee Chuck v. Quan Wo Chong & Co., 91 Cal. 593, 28 Pac. 45, it was said:

> "The uncontradicted evidence shows that the defendant was in possession of the property with the consent of said Chay Yune [one of the co-owners]. All that the plaintiff was entitled to, therefore, was to be let into possession with the defendant—to enjoy his moiety. Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, §§ 180, 220; Pickard v. Perley, 45 N. H. 191, 76 Am. Dec. 153; Ord v. Chester, 18 Cal. 80.
> "One tenant in common may, 'by either lease or license, * * * confer upon another person the right to occupy and use the property of the cotenancy as fully as such lessor or licensor himself might have used or occupied it if such lease or license had not been granted. If either cotenant expel such licensee or lessee, he is guilty of a trespass. If the lessee has the exclusive possession of the premises, he is not liable to any one but his lessor for the rent, unless the other cotenants attempt to enter and he resists or forbids their entry, or unless, being in possession with them, he ousts or excludes some or all of them.' Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 253. There is no evidence tending to show that the defendant ever refused to allow the plaintiff to enjoy the use of the premises with him."

The foregoing decisions are in harmony with those of other states. In the case of Buchanan v. Jencks, 38 R. I. 443, 96 Atl. 307, 2 A. L. R. 987, the plaintiffs were co-owners with one Thayer in a parcel of land. Thayer sold the standing timber and wood upon said land to one Aldrich, and authorized him to cut and remove the same. Aldrich conveyed his rights to the defendant Jencks, who proceeded to cut the timber and remove the same, which resulted in an action for damages by the owners of the land, other than Thayer. The court said:

> "It seems to us desirable to determine, in the first instance, whether or not Barton W. Jencks, through the several transfers before mentioned, acquired a right to enter upon this lot and cut wood and timber. It will not be disputed that one cotenant by an entry upon the common property does not ipso facto become a trespasser. He may become a trespasser, as some of the authorities hold, if his entry is accompanied by acts which amount to an ouster of his cotenants or is followed by destruction of the common property. Enoch Thayer, as a tenant in common of this wood lot, had the right to enter upon the same without becoming a trespasser and he had the right to cut timber and wood there, provided his entry did not amount as before suggested to an ouster of his cotenants or involve the destruction of common property. * * * We see no reason why a cotenant in the enjoyment of his rights as such cannot authorize another to do whatever he might lawfully do himself. A contrary view, if followed to its logical conclusion, would restrict a cotenant's enjoyment of the common property to the sphere of his own personal activities and would deprive him of the aid of others whom he might desire or need to employ. A cotenant has the right to divest himself of his entire interest in the common estate and thus bring into association with his former cotenants one who had theretofore been a stranger to the title, and this he can do independently and without the consent of the other interests. This being so, it would seem unreasonable to say that a cotenant could not authorize another to go upon the common land and do anything that he might do himself. We think therefore that in this case we must apply the same principles to the consideration of the acts of the defendant, Jencks, which we might have applied to Thayer, the cotenant, had he, in person, committed the acts of which the plaintiffs now complain."

In the last-cited case the court says further:

> "We do not find anything in the evidence showing an ouster of the plaintiffs. So far as appears they were in no way prevented by the defendant or by Thayer from entering upon the premises and cutting and removing timber and wood had they seen fit to do so, and we do not think that the sale, cutting, and removal of matured timber and wood amounts to a destruction of the property which the law contemplates. * * *
> "The gist of the count is that the defendant broke and entered the close of the plaintiffs. But a cotenant cannot be said to be guilty of a trespass quare clausum fregit for the reason that he has, in common with his cotenants, a right to enter upon the premises, and such entry does not constitute a trespass. Neither could the defendant be guilty of trespass in entering the close because he entered upon the authority of Thayer, who was a cotenant with the plaintiffs."

[7] We think it is beyond dispute from the foregoing authorities that the defendants are not answerable as trespassers to the cotenants of William Dinsmore, because of their acts under the license granted them by said William Dinsmore.

Upon the question of the revocability of the license, it is to be recalled that the trial court found that the construction of the road in controversy cost the defendants many hundreds of dollars in material and labor, and that plaintiffs W. J. C. Dinsmore and John S. Dinsmore passed over said road while it was being constructed, and saw defendants working thereon, and that plaintiffs W. J. C. Dinsmore, John S. Dinsmore, and Trustum R. Dinsmore heard defendants blasting at said construction work, and that said plaintiff W. J. C. Dinsmore offered to loan to defendants a scraper to be used in said construction work, and that a portion of said road passes within sight of the plaintiffs' residence. These latter findings are to be reconciled, if possible, with the implied finding of the jury that John S. and Trustrum R. Dinsmore did not have actual knowledge of the construction of the road. They may be construed so as to be harmonious, for the court found facts from which it is fair to say that John S. and Trustum R. Dinsmore should have made inquiry as to the construction of the road by defendants, which is not inconsistent with the implied finding of the jury that these plaintiffs had no actual knowledge of such construction. However, the question of whether or not all the plaintiffs had actual or only constructive knowledge of the building of the road becomes immaterial, as the judgment need not be based upon the doctrine of estoppel.

[8] The defendants built the road under a license from William Dinsmore, one of the co-owners of the land, which license had never been revoked until defendants had spent hundreds of dollars in reliance thereon. It has now become irrevocable because of this expenditure by the defendants. 17 R. C. L. § 90, p. 578 et seq.; Flickinger v. Shaw, 87 Cal. 126, 25 Pac. 268, 11 L. R. A. 134, 22 Am. JACKSON v. OTIS et al. (Civ. 4736.)

Municipal corporations 🔑187—Retired policeman not prohibited from drawing pension because elected constable.

A retired policeman of city of Alameda is entitled to draw his pension, notwithstanding election to and occupation of office of constable, under Ordinance No. 97, § 7, though he was subject to be called upon by pension board to perform duties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Charles L. Jackson against Frank Otis and others, as and comprising the Board of Police Pension Fund Commissioners of the City of Alameda, and others. Judgment for defendants, and the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Clarence De Lancey, for appellant.

L. R. Weinmann and Wm. J. Locke, City Atty., both of Alameda, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him following his failure to amend his complaint after a demurrer to the same had been sustained by the court. The plaintiff sues as a resident and taxpayer of Alameda county to restrain the payment of a police pension to defendant Charles E. Keyes. The individual members of the board of police pension fund commissioners of the city of Alameda and the city treasurer are joined as defendants.

Briefly stated, the demurrer raised the following question of law: Is defendant Keyes, after having been retired from the Alameda police department and placed on the pension list, prohibited from drawing his pension because of his election to and occupation of the office of constable, and is the said board prohibited from paying this pension which it desires to pay? The appellant states the question, in essence, as being whether or not the two offices, i. e., retired member of the police force upon pension and constable are incompatible within the decisions interpreting the common law, admitting that if the two are not incompatible, as that term is used in said decisions, the demurrer was properly sustained.

A copy of Ordinance No. 97 (new series) of the city of Alameda was annexed to the complaint. It is by virtue of the provisions of this ordinance that the defendant Keyes has been receiving his pension. It provides, among other things:

> "Section 7. Any person retired for disability under this ordinance may be summoned before the board herein provided for at any time hereafter, and shall submit himself thereto for examination as to his fitness for duty, and shall abide the decision of such board with reference thereto, and all the members of the police force who may be retired under the provisions of this ordinance shall report to the chief of police on the first Mondays of April, July, October and January, of each year; and in cases of emergency may be assigned to and shall perform such duty as said chief of police may direct and such person shall have no claim against the city for payment for such duty so performed."

The appellant cites authorities from other jurisdictions. None of them present the precise legal situation with which we are dealing here, and although they might be somewhat helpful if we were without authority in this state upon the question, our appellate court has heretofore considered a situation very closely analogous to that presented in the instant case and our Supreme Court has approved the decision by denying a petition for a hearing of the case. Reed v. Schon, 2 Cal. App. 55, 83 Pac. 77. In said case the defendant was an officer in the United States army and was retired with the rank of captain. As such retired officer he was subject to be assigned to duty at the Soldiers' Home, if necessary, and he was also subject to be detailed for service with the militia of the several states or in time of war to be employed in active duty other than the command of troops. He was elected mayor of San Diego, and plaintiff brought an action to have him declared ineligible on the same general grounds involved in the instant case. Upon appeal, it was said:

> "It also seems clear to us that, under the provisions of the statute cited, the position of the defendant is a mere sinecure, without any duties attached to it; and hence that it cannot properly be called an office. It is true that a retired officer may be detailed to perform the duties of the several offices or employments specified in the statutory provisions that have been cited, such as an officer at a soldiers' home, or as a professor, or in connection with the militia of the state, or in the military service in time of war; but these are mere offices or employments to which he may be appointed; and until this happens no service can be required of him. Nor can the mere fact that he is subject to the remote contingency of being thus employed be regarded as such a duty as is contemplated in the definition."

In the instant case, by the terms of the ordinance attached to the amended complaint, defendant Keyes was "retired from further service from such police department, and from the date of such order the service of such person in such police department shall cease." It is true, likewise, that under the terms of said ordinance Keyes might some time in the future be called upon for certain duties, but there is no allegation that he has ever been called for such duties, and it also appears from the ordinance in question that even after call for duty the board has the power to excuse Keyes from the performance of the same.

Our conclusion is in harmony with the general principle set forth in the case of Pratt v. Rosenthal, 181 Cal. 158, 183 Pac. 542, that—

> "Courts should let administrative boards and officers work out their problems with as little judicial interference as possible."

It is also in accord with the equities of the situation, for, as has been said in the case of O'Dea v. Cook, 176 Cal. 659, 169 Pac. 366:

> "A pension such as this law contemplates is not a gratuity or a gift. If it were, all of the provisions pertaining to it would be void under the Constitution of the state. (Article IV, § 31; Taylor v. Mott, 123 Cal. 497 [56 Pac. 256].) A pension is a gratuity only where it is granted for services previously rendered which at the time they were rendered gave rise to no legal obligation. (United States v. Teller, 107 U. S. 64, 27 L. Ed. 352, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39; Mahon v. Board of Education, 171 N. Y. 263, 89 Am. St. Rep. 810, 63 N. E. 1107; State v. Love, 89 Neb. 149, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 542, 34 L. R. A. [N. S.] 607, 131 N. W. 196.) But where, as here, services are rendered under such a pension statute, the pension provisions become a part of the contemplated compensation for those services and so in a sense a part of the contract of employment itself. (Hammitt v. Gaynor, 144 N. Y. Supp. 123; State v. Love, supra; People v. Abbott, 274 Ill. 380, 113 N. E. 696.) * * *
> "It is a firmly established principle of judicial construction that pension statutes serving a beneficial purpose are to be liberally construed. (Walton v. Cotton, 60 U. S. 355, 15 L. Ed. 658; Hanscom v. Malden, etc., Gas Light Co., 220 Mass. 1, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 145, 107 N. E. 426.)"

The judgment is affirmed.

GREEN v. SHULMAN. (Civ. 3926.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑78(2)—Complaint held not to state cause of action for failure to deliver lease to assignee to whom assignment was delivered.

A complaint, alleging a sale by defendant to plaintiff of a stock of goods, and an assignment of a lease of a storeroom, and seeking damages for failure to deliver lease, held not to state cause of action; the assignment being executed when delivered, and plaintiff's rights the same as if lease had been delivered.

2. Pleading 🔑52(1)—Separate causes of action held improperly joined in single statement.

A cause of action for failure to deliver a lease after its assignment and for rent the assignee was deceived into paying to assignor after assignment, if capable of being joined in the same action, held improperly joined in a single statement.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑79(2)—Cause of action for lessee's refusal to deliver lease to assignee because of lack of lessor's consent held not to state cause of action.

An alleged cause of action for rent paid by the assignee of a lease to the assignor and lessee, based on the assignor's failure to deliver the lease because of the lessor's refusal to consent to the transfer thereof, held insufficient, because of its failure to allege necessity of lessor's consent to transfer.

4. Trial 🔑396(1)—Finding in action against lessee for failure to deliver lease to assignee held not to meet issues.

In action for damages for lessee's failure to deliver lease to assignee, thus preventing sale of same by assignee, finding that plaintiff was inconvenienced and prevented from making any negotiations, because of failure to deliver and annoyed by demands of defendant and landlord for rent, held not to meet issue that defendant prevented sale or that his acts caused plaintiff to lose a sale.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by Max Green against Max Shulman. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Harry G. Sadicoff, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. W. Satterwhite, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. It is alleged in the complaint in this action that plaintiff and defendant entered into a certain agreement, evidenced by a written bill of sale, by which defendant sold to plaintiff a certain stock of goods and store fixtures, and assigned to him a lease of the storeroom in which the articles were contained; that defendant failed and refused, without reason to deliver the lease to plaintiff, "thereby preventing plaintiff from making a sale and transfer of said property and lease, and did cause plaintiff on or about February 1, 1921, to lose a sale to a purchaser of said property and lease, thereby causing plaintiff damage to and in the sum of $1,000"; that on a day named defendant fraudulently made to plaintiff the false and untrue statement that he, the defendant, "could not deliver the said original lease because his landlord would not consent to a transfer thereof"; that plaintiff relied upon the untrue statement "and he was deceived thereby into paying to defendant the sum of $35 rent for the premises * * * for the month of February, 1921"; that defendant was not entitled to the rent, nor was it due him, "and his collection thereof from plaintiff was fraudulent, to plaintiff's further damage in the sum of $35"; and that plaintiff was thereafter compelled "to again pay said rent for said month of February to the landlord and owner of said building, under threat of losing the possession thereof and forfeiting said lease." The prayer was for judgment for damages for $1,035. The answer consists wholly of denials. Plaintiff had judgment for $250 and defendant appeals.

[1] The complaint fails to state a cause of action. Each item of damages is claimed upon the theory that appellant was bound to make delivery of the lease. Such was not his contract. The assignment made transfer to respondent of the entire title of appellant under the lease, and the assignment became executed the moment it was delivered. 3 Cal. Jur. tit. Assignments, § 21. Therefore, not only did appellant not agree to make physical transfer of the lease, but respondent's rights under the assignment were as complete without the possession of the instrument assigned as they would have been with it.

[2] The complaint was demurred to on the ground that it attempts to allege two causes of action without separate statement. This point is good. We do not decide that the joinder would have been proper even if the two causes had been separately stated.

[3] The second alleged cause of action, the one for damages for $35, is insufficient, for the reason that it fails to allege that the lessor's consent was necessary to an assignment of the lease. This point is not made by appellant, but we do not hesitate to mention it, as the points which are presented by him necessitate a reversal of the judgment.

[4] The trial court failed to find upon the issue tendered by the complaint as a basis for the claim for damages in the sum of $1,000. As to that item of damages the court found only "that by reason of the failure of defendant to deliver said lease to plaintiff, he, the said plaintiff, was greatly inconvenienced and prevented from making or entering into any negotiations for the sale of said store and said lease thereon mentioned in the contract aforesaid, and from properly conducting said store, and was annoyed and harassed by both the demands of said defendant and the landlord for the payment of the rent on said premises for the same month under said lease, and plaintiff was compelled to sell out sooner than he otherwise would have, had be been given said lease by said defendant, and the same had not been withheld from him by said defendant." This finding did not meet the issue, as it is not a finding that respondent was "prevented" by the acts of appellant from making a sale, or that those acts caused respondent to "lose a sale" to a particular person.

Judgment reversed.

MADRUGA v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN LUIS OBISPO COUNTY et al.

(S. F. 11127.)

Executors and administrators ⚷226—Notice to creditors held insufficient in specification of place where claims to be made.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1490, requiring notice to creditors to file claims against decedent in office of clerk of court or exhibit them to the executor or administrator at place of residence or business specified in notice, "provided, said residence or place of business shall be in the county," a notice to creditors specifying a place of business not located in the county in which the proceedings were pending held insufficient.

In Bank.

Petition by Balvina G. Madruga, as executrix, etc., for a writ of mandate to the Superior Court of San Luis Obispo County, Honorable T. A. Norton, Judge thereof. Writ denied.

Shaeffer & Airola, of Santa Maria, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent superior court to make and enter a finding and decree of due publication of notice to creditors in a probate proceeding pending before it. Section 1490 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for the publication of a notice to creditors "requiring all persons having claims against said decedent to file them, with the necessary vouchers, in the office of the clerk of the court from which the letters were issued, or to exhibit them, with the necessary vouchers, to the executor or administrator, at the place of his residence or business to be specified in the notice; provided, said residence or place of business shall be in the county in which said proceeding is had." Petitioner published for the specified length of time a notice to creditors which required all persons having claims against the decedent to file them, with the necessary vouchers, in the office of the clerk of the court from which the letters were issued, or to exhibit them, with the necessary vouchers, to the executrix at a place of business specified in the notice which was not in the county in which the proceeding was pending. Upon this showing the respondent court refused to enter a decree of due publication, and we are of the opinion that such refusal was proper.

Petitioner insists that the designation in her notice of place of business at which claims might be presented outside of the county should be disregarded as surplusage, and that the legal effect of her notice should be deemed to be such as to require all creditors of that estate to present their claims at the office of the county clerk. We are not prepared to agree that a disregard of the plain language of the statute in such a material particular may be thus disregarded or ignored. Suppose that a creditor should bring suit upon a claim which had been presented only at the place so designated outside of the county and which had been disallowed by the executrix, would he be entitled to recover thereon, supposing it to be an otherwise valid claim? It may well be that under such circumstances the executrix would be estopped to set up the defense that the claim had not been presented in the manner required by law, but we are not prepared at this time to say that the heirs and legatees would be so estopped. Petitioner contends that the purpose and effect of the Code section is to give to the executor or administrator a right of election to choose either of the two places specified therein and thus to compel all creditors to present their claims at the place so designated, to the exclusion of any other place, and in support of this contention she argues that if the section be construed as giving the right of election to the creditors to present their claims at either of the two places specified in the Code it would be impossible for an executor who had no residence or place of business within the county to comply with its terms. In Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 7, 21 Pac. 375, it was held that an administrator in his notice to creditors may designate the office of his attorney as his place of business for the presentation of claims, although he does not reside there and although he transacts his own ordinary business at a different place within the same county. It would seem to follow from this that an executor or administrator who had no residence or place of business within the county could fully comply with the requirements of the Code section by selecting some appropriate office or other place of business within the county and designate the same in his notice to creditors as his place of business for the presentation of claims. However, we are not required to determine this question for the purposes of this case. We are not called upon to assume that the executrix, petitioner herein, has no residence or place of business within the county in which this proceeding is pending. She has not so alleged in her petition, and we are entitled to assume that she has stated the case in support of her petition as strongly as the facts will justify. So assuming, we must conclude that she has in fact a residence or place of business or both within the county in which this proceeding is pending. This is, in truth, the situation, as was conceded by her counsel at the hearing hereof. This being the situation, we are convinced that the respondent court was justified in refusing to enter a decree of due publication of notice to creditors herein.

The petition is denied, and the order to show cause discharged.

SEGARINI v. BARGAGLIOTTI.
(S. F. 11118.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑479(2)—Supersedeas not granted as matter of right.

Appellant is not entitled to supersedeas as a matter of right, but the Supreme Court may in exercise of sound discretion grant writ on such terms as will be just and adequately protect respondent's rights.

2. Appeal and error 🔑479(1)—Facts held to justify writ.

Where respondent excepted to sufficiency of appellant's sureties and appellant served notice they would justify on date specified but sureties failed to appear because of serious illness in family of one of them, supersedeas should be granted to preserve status quo until final determination of action.

In Bank.

Action by Giovanni Segarini against Francisca Bargagliotti. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals and petitions for writ of supersedeas. Writ granted.

Wm. F. Herron, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Wm. R. Lowery, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of supersedeas. The appellant within due time perfected his appeal and filed an undertaking upon appeal with two sureties in the amount fixed by the court, $2,500. Thereafter, the respondent having excepted to the sufficiency of the sureties, appellant served notice that they would justify before the court on a date therein specified. The sureties failed to appear and justify on that date because of a serious illness in the family of one of them, whereupon appellant applied to this court for a writ of supersedeas.

[1, 2] Under the rule stated in Nonpareil Manufacturing Co. v. McCartney, 143 Cal. 1, 76 Pac. 653, the appellant is not entitled to this writ as a matter of right, but we may properly, in the exercise of a sound discretion, grant him the writ upon such terms as will be just and will adequately protect the rights of the respondent. We conclude that, under the circumstances, the writ should be so granted in order to preserve the status quo until the final determination of the action.

It is ordered that upon the filing by the petitioner with the clerk of this court, within 20 days, of a good and sufficient undertaking upon appeal in the sum of $2,500, conditioned as required by law, and which shall have been first approved by a judge of the superior court, in and for the county of San Francisco, at a hearing upon 10 days' notice to the respondent, a writ shall issue as prayed for herein.

It is further ordered that in the meantime, during said period of 20 days, the execution of that portion of the judgment referred to in the petition herein be stayed.

SWIM v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 11016.)

1. Mandamus 🔑168(2)—Allegations of affidavit in opposition to motion to dismiss appeal taken as true in mandamus to compel dismissal.

In reviewing by mandamus superior court's action in refusing to dismiss, under Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, as added by St. 1923, p. 755, an appeal from the justice's court because not brought to trial within year after filing, allegations of affidavit by appellant in opposition to motion must be taken as true.

2. Justices of the peace 🔑166(2)—Oral stipulation insufficient under statute to prevent dismissal of appeal.

Verbal stipulation extending time for bringing to trial in superior court appeal from justice's court is insufficient to defeat motion to dismiss, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, as added by St. 1923, p. 755, if appeal not brought to trial within year or written stipulation for longer time filed.

3. Justices of the peace 🔑166(2)—Appellant held not entitled to assert estoppel of appellee to insist on dismissal of appeal.

Assuming that an appellee in the superior court on appeal from the justice's court might be estopped to insist on dismissal of appeal for failure to bring to trial within year, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, as added by St. 1923, p. 755, where promise inducing invalid oral agreement for longer time within which to bring case to trial was insufficient consideration for appellee's promise of extension, held appellant was not in position to assert such promise of extension as basis of estoppel.

4. Mandamus 🔑172—Writ of mandate to lower court held warranted, though petition was in effect for writ of review.

Where the prayer of a petition for a writ of mandate was in effect for a writ of review, but where the court had the complete record of the case below before it, held, that the relief warranted by the record should be given and the writ of mandate allowed.

In Bank.

Petition by Meurice Swim for a writ of mandate, to be directed to the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco and Thomas F. Graham, one of the Judges thereof. Writ granted.

J. E. Manning, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

S. L. Mash, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MYERS, C. J. The petition herein is entitled "Petition for a Writ of Mandate," but the prayer thereof is, in substance, for a writ of review. The writ which was issued by us at petitioner's request was in effect a writ of review, though entitled writ of mandate, and in response to it the record of the lower court has been certified to us. The facts are as follows: The petitioner herein recovered a judgment in the justices' court of the city and county of San Francisco, January 16, 1922, against one S. L. Mash, defendant, amounting to $92.93. The defendant perfected an appeal to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco which was filed therein February 15, 1922. On January 25, 1924, nearly two years thereafter, after due notice given, the petitioner moved the latter court to dismiss said appeal on the ground that the appellant had failed to bring such appeal to trial within one year of the date of filing thereof in the superior court. This motion was based upon section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure, a new section added thereto in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 755), which provides as follows:

> "No action heretofore or hereafter appealed from the justice court to the superior court, shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all such actions heretofore, or hereafter appealed must be dismissed by the court to which the same shall have been appealed, on its own motion, or on the motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, where the appealing party fails to bring such appeal to trial within one year from the date of filing such appeal in said superior court, unless such time be otherwise extended by a written stipulation by the parties to the action filed with the clerk of the superior court to which the appeal is taken; provided, however, that in any appeal pending when this section takes effect, a judgment or dismissal shall not be entered under the direction hereof sooner than January first, 1924; and provided, further, that any superior court may, by existing rule or by rule hereafter to be enacted, provide for dismissal of such appeal within a time less than one year."

The motion was suported by the affidavit of the plaintiff to the effect that he had not entered into any written or other stipulation extending the time for bringing such appeal on for trial, and that no such stipulation had been filed with the clerk of said superior court. Thereupon the defendant, appellant herein, served and filed a counter motion to set said case for trial, supporting the same by an affidavit, the material portions of which are as follows:

> "That on or about the 15th day of April, 1922, made an agreement with the plaintiff, Meurice Swim, attorney in propria persona, wherein it was agreed that no further legal proceedings be taken on the part of the plaintiff Meurice Swim, and the defendant S. L. Mash, herein, and that the defendant S. L. Mash, endeavor to see the defendant Ralph Phillips who had contracted the debt, and for whom the services so rendered and performed for the indebtedness claimed by the plaintiff, and for whose use and benefit said services had been performed. He, the said Ralph Phillips, having before confessed judgment for the same, and thereby agreeing to pay the same if given an opportunity to do so.
> "In line with the above mentioned and described agreement the said defendant S. L. Mash saw the said defendant Ralph Phillips, and he agreed to pay off the said bill at the rate of $2.50 per week, and the said defendant so informed the said plaintiff and attorney propria persona herein and the said plaintiff informed the said defendant S. L. Mash that the said terms of the agreement so made by the said Ralph Phillips was satisfactory, and that he, the said plaintiff, would take up the matter with the said Ralph Phillips one of the defendants herein.
> "There on, this defendant S. L. Mash was led to believe that the said account and debt had been paid by the said defendant Ralph Phillips, and in line with above agreement by the defendant S. L. Mash with the plaintiff Meurice Swim, the above cause of action was not set for trial by the defendant S. L. Mash."

[1, 2] Petitioner's motion to dismiss said appeal came on regularly for hearing in said superior court, and was by said court denied. Thereupon petitioner filed in this court the petition herein. The facts alleged in defendant's affidavit above quoted amount to nothing more than an assertion that a verbal stipulation was entered into by and between the parties to the effect that further proceedings in the action should be indefinitely postponed. All of these alleged facts were contradicted in a counter affidavit filed by the plaintiff in said action, but for the purposes hereof the allegations of defendant's affidavit must be taken as true. In the face of the plain and unambiguous language used in the code section above quoted, clearly evidencing the legislative intent to require a written stipulation filed with the clerk of the superior court for the purpose of extending the time for bringing the case to trial, we cannot say that a verbal stipulation should be permitted to answer the same purpose.

[3, 4] The situation thus presented is substantially analogous to that which was before this court in the recent cases reported under the title of Miller & Lux v. Superior Court, 219 Pac. 1006. We are of the opinion that under the rule and reasoning of that case it was the duty of the respondent court to grant petitioner's motion for a dismissal of the appeal. Evidently that case was not called to the attention of the respondent judge, as it has not been cited in either of the briefs herein. Assuming, without deciding, that the appellant might be permitted to invoke the doctrine of estoppel as against the plain language of the code section as the basis for a contention that the respondent had waived his right to insist upon a dismissal pursuant thereto, we are satisfied that said defense is not available to him herein. He must be assumed to have entered into the agreement with the plaintiff with the knowledge of the statutory provision which required nothing less than a written stipulation to protect him from the liability to a dismissal. He is chargeable also with knowledge of the fact that the promise of the said Phillips was not a legally sufficient consideration to support the agreement of the plaintiff to take no further proceedings, for the reason that Phillips promised nothing more than that which he was then legally obligated to do. Civ. Code, § 1605. Moreover, if the said promise on the part of Phillips had been performed, the judgment would have been fully satisfied thereby within a period of 27 weeks; thus leaving to the appellant, in the event of the nonperformance thereof, an ample margin of time thereafter within which to protect his own rights by bringing his appeal to trial. Notwithstanding this, appellant sat idly by for nearly 100 weeks thereafter without making any effort to ascertain whether or not the judgment had in fact been paid. As was noted above, the prayer of the petition herein is, in effect, for what amounts to a writ of review. But we now have before us the petition, the answer, and the complete record in the case below in so far as relates to the point involved herein. Under these circumstances there is no reason why we should not give such relief as the record so presented will warrant. Traffic Sales Co. v. Justices' Court (Cal. Sup.) 220 Pac. 306; Van Hoosear v. Railroad Comm., 189 Cal. 228, 236, 207 Pac. 903.

We are of the opinion that the order made by the respondent court denying petitioner's motion to dismiss the appeal should be annulled, and that a writ of mandate should issue requiring the respondent court to make and enter an order in said action dismissing said appeal. It is so ordered.

We concur: LENNON, J.; LAWLOR, J.; WASTE, J.; SEAWELL, J.; SHENK, J.; RICHARDS, J.

1. Appeal and error 🔑151(2)—Petitioners held entitled to appeal from judgment against them, though it required nothing of them.

Where judgment was entered against several codefendants in action to recover trust fund, petitioners, as two of such codefendants, were interested in judgment and aggrieved thereby and were entitled to appeal from it, notwithstanding judgment required nothing of them.

2. Appeal and error 🔑485(2)—Appeal by some defendants held not to stay execution of portion of judgment directed against nonappealing defendant.

Perfection of appeal by petitioners from judgment entered against them and a trust company as codefendants held not to stay execution of that portion of judgment directed against trust company which did not appeal.

3. Appeal and error 🔑479(1)—Writ of supersedeas to stay execution against nonappealing defendant denied where denial worked no prejudice.

Petitioners as sole appellants from judgment directed against them and others held not entitled to writ of supersedeas to stay execution of that portion of judgment directed against others, where rights involved in petitioners' appeal were not in danger of being lost or prejudiced if execution was not stayed.

Action by E. Cullinan and others against the Mercantile Trust Company of California and others. Judgment against all defendants, and defendant Adelaide McColgan, as administratrix, etc., and another, as sole appellants, petition for writ of supersedeas. Writ denied.

Alfred J. Harwood and Geo. B. Keane, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of supersedeas. Plaintiffs herein brought an action in the court below against the defendant trust company as the holder of certain funds under an express trust, the terms of which are defined in a judgment which has become final, and joined therein as codefendants certain individuals who were beneficiaries under said trust. Plaintiffs had judgment against the defendants in the court below which provided for the payment to the plaintiffs by the trust company of the sum of $5,724.89 payable only out of the funds in its hands or which should come into its hands under said trust. The trust company did not appeal from said judgment, but petitioners herein, who are two of the individual defendants named therein as beneficiaries under the trust, have perfected an appeal to this court.

[1, 2] The judgment as rendered required nothing of these petitioners, but they are, nevertheless, parties interested therein and aggrieved thereby and are entitled to appeal therefrom. They contend herein that the perfection of their appeal operates as a statutory supersedeas against the entire judgment, including the portion thereof requiring the payment of the fund by the trust company to the plaintiff. In this they are mistaken. Their appeal does not stay the execution of that portion of the judgment which is directed at the trust company, which has not appealed. Pennie v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. 31, 26 Pac. 617; Halsted v. First Savings Bank, 173 Cal. 605, 608, 160 Pac. 1075.

[3] This point having been ruled against them, petitioners then asked for the writ as a matter of grace in the exercise of the discretion vested in this court. There is no doubt that the power to grant this relief is vested in this court where the circumstances are such as to invoke its exercise. Halsted v. First Savings Bank, supra; Southern Pacific Co. v. Superior Court, 167 Cal. 250, 139 Pac. 69; Nonpareil Mfg. Co. v. McCartney, 143 Cal. 1, 76 Pac. 653.

We are of the opinion that the circumstances of the instant case are not such as to call for the granting of the relief prayed for herein. Petitioners are the beneficiaries of but a fraction of the fund involved in the judgment. It is conceded that both the plaintiff and the trust company are solvent and financially responsible. No facts are suggested from which it would appear that any of the rights involved in this appeal are in danger of being lost or prejudiced if the execution is not stayed.

The application is denied, and the order to show cause discharged.

PEOPLE v. WILSON. (Cr. 2641.)

1. Criminal law 🔑195(1)—Plea of jeopardy not available, unless second prosecution is for same offense in law and in fact.

A plea of once in jeopardy is not available to a defendant, unless second prosecution is for same offense in law and in fact as that for which first prosecution was instituted.

2. Criminal law 🔑200(1) — Manslaughter charge not defeated by plea of once in jeopardy for trial of misdemeanor resulting in victim's death.

A charge of manslaughter could not be defeated by plea of once in jeopardy, based on trial of a misdemeanor charge, for a violation of Motor Vehicle Act, § 20, which offense had later resulted in injured victim's death.

3. Homicide 🔑34, 62—When killing by striking with automobile is punishable as manslaughter stated.

In a prosecution for manslaughter, under Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2, for striking decedent with an automobile, defendant might have been convicted of "involuntary manslaughter arising out of the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony," if decedent's death was due to defendant's violation of Motor Vehicle Act, §§ 20, 22, or, irrespective of such statute, might have been convicted of manslaughter, if defendant was driving without due caution and circumspection and decedent's death was produced thereby.

4. Homicide 🔑34—When want of due caution and circumspection amounts to criminal negligence stated.

When a person is doing anything dangerous in itself, or has charge of anything dangerous in its use, and acts with reference thereto without taking those proper precautions which one of ordinary prudence would use under such circumstances, and death of another results, his act or neglect is criminal act against person so killed, even though his negligence did not amount to reckless disregard of human life.

5. Homicide 🔑250—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for manslaughter in striking decedent with an automobile.

6. Criminal law 🔑829(12)—Instruction on degree of proof in prosecution for manslaughter held not reversible error.

Error could not be predicated of an instruction on a degree of proof in prosecution for manslaughter which was obviously erroneous, where the inaccuracy seemingly occurred in transcription rather than as actually given to the jury, and other correct instructions on degree of proof were given.

7. Homicide 🔑340(2)—Giving of instruction on murder in manslaughter prosecution held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for manslaughter for striking decedent with an automobile, an instruction on murder was not prejudicial, where it was limited merely to pointing out distinction between manslaughter and murder.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Herman Wilson was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Carl Westerfeld and Robert D. Duke, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of conviction of the defendant upon a charge of manslaughter, which consisted in the killing of one Agnes Johnson on Van Ness avenue, near its intersection with Sutter street, in the city and county of San Francisco, shortly after midnight on the morning of October 21, 1922, through the striking of the deceased by the defendant's automobile while it was being driven by him along said avenue. Upon his trial for the alleged crime the defendant, in addition to his plea of not guilty, pleaded that he had been once in jeopardy, and in support of said plea offered in evidence a misdemeanor complaint charging a violation of section 20 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 406, as amended by St. 1917, p. 400), filed on the morning of October 21, 1922, shortly after the collision, and while the victim thereof was still alive. He also offered evidence showing that he was brought to trial upon said charge, that witnesses in support thereof were sworn and testified, and that the cause was continued until January 26, 1923, for the taking of further testimony. In the meantime the said Agnes Johnson died, whereupon the defendant was charged with the crime of manslaughter and held to answer upon said charge, and the misdemeanor charge was, on February 13, 1923, dismissed. The defendant's offered evidence of the aforesaid proceedings upon the misdemeanor charge in support of his plea of once in jeopardy was, upon motion of the district attorney, stricken out, and the trial court advised the jury that it should, upon the defendant's plea of "once in jeopardy," return a verdict for the people. The jury obeyed this instruction, and in addition thereto returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty of manslaughter.

[1, 2] His first contention upon this appeal is that the trial court was in error in striking out his offered evidence in support of his plea of "once in jeopardy," and in its direction to the jury to return a verdict against him upon his said plea. There is no merit in this contention. In order that a plea of once in jeopardy may be available to a defendant, the second prosecution must be for the same offense, both in law and fact, as that for which the first prosecution was instituted. 7 Cal. Jur. 955, and cases cited. The law upon this subject is well settled in its application to cases where the defendant has committed an act of violence which in its immediate result amounts to a misdemeanor, but which in its after consequences upon the victim of the violent act becomes, through the death of that victim, murder or manslaughter. In such an event the second prosecution is not for the same offense as the first, and the reason for this is, as is well stated in Wharton on Criminal Pleading and Practice (9th Ed.) § 476:

> "That as at the time of conviction of assault there could have been no conviction of the homicide the prosecution of the homicide is not barred by the conviction of the assault."

See, also, 1 Bishop, New Criminal Law, § 1059, and cases cited.

In the case of People v. Defoor, 100 Cal. 150, 34 Pac. 642, this court, while upholding the plea of once in jeopardy under the facts of that case, which did not involve the death of the injured person, nevertheless recognized the foregoing rule as applicable to cases of homicide, notwithstanding a previous trial and conviction of the defendant for the assault which subsequently resulted in the death of the injured person. In none of the cases cited by the appellant in support of his contention as to his plea of "once in jeopardy" does the element of death, which is the essential basis of the charge of manslaughter, appear to be present; nor upon principle do we think a case can be conceived wherein a charge of murder or manslaughter could be defeated by a plea of once in jeopardy, based upon a mere misdemeanor charge, trial, or conviction of the assault or offense which had later resulted in the death of the injured victim. It was therefore not error in the trial court to strike out the defendant's offered evidence in that regard, or to direct the jury to find against the defendant upon his aforesaid plea.

[3] The next contention of the defendant is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the conviction of the defendant upon the charge of manslaughter. The particular portion of section 192 of the Penal Code upon which this prosecution is predicated is that embraced in subdivision 2 of said section, in which involuntary manslaughter is defined as the unlawful killing of a human being without malice "in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony, or in the commission of a lawful act which might produce death, in an unlawful manner, or without due caution or circumspection." It is an admitted fact in this case that the death of the decedent, Agnes Johnson, was caused by the fact that she was struck by the defendant's automobile while it was being driven by himself along one of the much-traveled public streets of San Francisco, upon which the decedent was rightfully standing or walking at the time of the collision, which resulted in her death. Under the general charge of manslaughter embraced in the information, the defendant was subject to conviction under either of the two clauses contained in the foregoing definition of the crime of involuntary manslaughter; that is to say, he might have been convicted of the offense of involuntary manslaughter arising out of the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony; as, for example, through the violation of the provisions of section 22 of the Motor Vehicle Act, which reads, in part, as follows:

> "Any person operating or driving a motor or other vehicle on the public highways shall operate or drive the same in a careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, and no person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle or other vehicle on a public highway at such rate of speed as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property."

Under section 20 of said Motor Vehicle Act any person violating its provisions is guilty of a misdemeanor. If, therefore, upon the evidence in this case the jury would have been justified in finding that immediately prior to and at the time of the collision which proximately caused the injury to and subsequent death of the decedent, the defendant herein was not operating or driving his motor vehicle upon and along said Van Ness avenue in a careful and prudent manner, or that he was operating or driving his said automobile thereon at a rate of speed greater than was reasonable and proper, having regard for the traffic and use of that particular highway, and so as to endanger the life or limb of any person, and if the jury would have been further justified by the evidence in finding that the injury to the decedent with her consequent death was proximately due to the defendant's violation of the Motor Vehicle Act in any of the foregoing regards, they could properly have found the defendant guilty of involuntary manslaughter arising out of the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony; or, on the other hand, if the jury, regardless of any alleged or proven violation on the part of the defendant of the foregoing provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, had been justified by the evidence in finding that the defendant in the operation and driving of his motor vehicle at said time and place was not violating any provision of the Motor Vehicle Act, or committing any other unlawful act not amounting to a felony, but that in the operation and driving of his motor vehicle at said time and place lawfully he was acting without due caution and circumspection, and that the injury to and death of the decedent was produced thereby, they might still find the defendant guilty of manslaughter under the concluding clause of subdivision 2 of said section 192 of the Penal Code.

The question as to what want of due caution and circumspection amounts to criminal negligence has been variously decided by the courts of this as well as other jurisdictions. In the case of People v. Seiler the District Court of Appeal for the First District, Second Division, said:

> "If one performs an act in a manner not forbidden by statute, but in a wanton, reckless, or culpable manner, and thereby kills another, he may be convicted under the definition of manslaughter as secondly defined."

And in a further effort to define criminal negligence that court, in the same case, said that:

> "Criminal negligence consists in the commission of a lawful act, but in a culpable, reckless manner." People v. Seiler, 57 Cal. App. 195, 207 Pac. 396.

In denying the petition for rehearing in said cause this court undertook to limit the scope of the definition of criminal negligence as above given and in so doing said:

> "The statute (Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2) defines involuntary manslaughter of this specific character as the unlawful killing of a human being, involuntarily, but 'in the commission of a lawful act which might produce death * * * without due caution and circumspection.' In order to constitute this kind of manslaughter the act may be lawful, but it must be one which might produce death, and which does produce death, and it must be committed without due caution and circumspection. The lack of due caution and circumspection need not go to the extent of being wanton or reckless, although it might possibly be such as would be defined as culpable. But the word 'culpable' is not an apt description of the idea intended to be conveyed by the words 'due caution and circumspection.' On this subject see note II to the case of Johnson v. State (1902) 61 L. R. A. 277."

[4] The proper rule deducible from the cases cited in the note above referred to would seem to be this: That when a person is doing anything dangerous in itself, or has charge of anything dangerous in its use, and acts with reference thereto without taking those proper precautions which a person of ordinary prudence would have used under the circumstances and the death of another results therefrom his act or neglect is a criminal act against the person so killed even though his negligence does not amount to a wanton or reckless disregard of human safety or life. Johnson v. State, supra, and notes; Reg. v. Doherty, 16 Cox's Crim. Law Cases, 306; Morris v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 313, 33 S. W. 539.

[5] It is the contention of the appellant that the evidence in this case is insufficient to bring the defendant within the rule above stated. This contention requires a brief review of the evidence in the case. The defendant was by occupation a mariner, a deck officer on steamer and ocean ships. When ashore he lived with Capt. Christensen and his family at 1477 Jackson street in the city of San Francisco. He was the owner of an automobile which he had been driving for about three months and prior to that time had owned or driven another machine for about six months. On the evening of October 20, 1922, several relatives of Capt. Christensen had a social gathering at his home, which the defendant with the others attended. When the party broke up near midnight the defendant proceeded to take a young lady, a niece of Mrs. Christensen, to her home in his automobile, and they proceeded to drive down Jackson street to Van Ness avenue and thence southerly toward Market street. The accident in question occurred at a point on the westerly side of Van Ness avenue, about 40 feet northerly from its intersection with the northerly line of Sutter street. A double track municipal street car line occupies the center of Van Ness avenue and cars pass and repass frequently thereon, those going southerly stopping to take on or discharge passengers just before reaching the intersection at Sutter street and at such distance therefrom that the rear end of the south-bound car would be at about the point on the avenue where the accident in question occurred. There is no designated safety station at this point, but persons about to take such cars are accustomed to stand in the open street near said track and at or near said point of stoppage. There is also a double track line of cars on Sutter street upon which cars ran frequently up to and for some time after midnight.

There were a number of persons standing or walking at or near the intersection of these two streets just before and at the time the accident occurred, and who observed it and testified as to the defendant's approach to the scene. It must be conceded that the larger number of these witnesses testified that the defendant as he approached the point of the accident was traveling along the westerly side of Van Ness avenue at a speed variously estimated at from 15 to 25 miles an hour. There was one witness, however, who testified that the speed with which the defendant's car approached the point of the accident was about 35 miles an hour, and that as he came within the witness' vision he veered his machine toward the car tracks and drove close to the west track up to the point of impact. This witness testified to certain other matters as to which there is a very radical difference between his testimony, and that of most or all of the other witnesses and which casts a degree of doubt or incredibility upon his entire testimony, but in certain quite material respects he is supported by other witnesses in the case, and even by the testimony of the defendant himself; as, for example, several witnesses testified that the defendant was driving his car quite close to the westerly car track as he approached the scene and at such a distance therefrom as to be likely to strike a person standing in the street awaiting the approaching street car. The defendant himself admitted that at other intersections of cross streets with the avenue on which street cars ran he had turned his machine onto the car tracks to avoid the bumps in crossing. There is no evidence showing that the defendant veered his car away from the tracks or slackened his speed as he approached this particular intersection or that he took any other precautions, either to give warning of his approach or to avoid the possibility of impact with persons who might be standing at the accustomed place on the street awaiting the opportunity to board the approaching street car. That such street car was approaching that intersection, coming southerly on the avenue, and but a short distance behind the defendant's machine at the moment of his impact with the decedent, is testified to by several witnesses, including the conductor upon said street car; while the defendant, who was a witness in his own behalf, nowhere denied knowledge of the proximity of such approaching street car.

The evidence discloses without material conflict that the lights of the defendant's car were lit, and while it is in evidence that the night was dark, the fact, as testified to by the defendant, that he did not see the deceased woman until the instant before the impact, may well have been taken by the jury as some evidence at least of a want of circumspection on the defendant's part in approaching a spot where persons were wont to be, and were entitled to be, and might reasonably be expected to be, when a street car was making its approach. The defendant, in offering an explanation of the accident, testified that the woman suddenly stepped in front of his car, too late for him to avoid striking her; but as to this he is not very strongly supported by the other witnesses, and the jury may well have declined to accept this explanation, particularly in view of the fact that the stricken woman, in her dying declaration, stated that she was standing beside the car tracks and as close to the track as she could, so as to give automobiles as much chance to pass as possible, and that she had observed the lights of the approaching machine while it was some distance away, and that it came right at her, and that she would not have been struck if it had turned to the right. We think the foregoing evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict of the jury finding the defendant guilty of manslaughter.

[6] The appellant also complains of certain instructions which are claimed to be erroneous. One of these was the defendant's own proposed instruction, which, as proposed, read:

> "The court instructs you that it is not sufficient that the facts coincide with, account for, and therefore render probable the hypothesis of guilt asserted by the prosecution. But they must exclude to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, every other hypothesis but the single one of guilt, or the jury must find the defendant not guilty."

The court gave this instruction in the identical form in which it was requested, except that, as appears from the clerk's transcript, the word "not," just before the final word "guilty," was omitted. The appellant rightly states that the instruction as it thus appears to have been given is "obviously erroneous," but is so obviously erroneous, considering the whole context of the instruction, that it seems almost inconceivable, either that it should have been given in the form in which it appears, or that it should have been taken by the jury in the introverted sense which the omission of the word "not" gives to it. It would seem to have been a patent inaccuracy, more probable to have occurred in transcription than in the instruction as actually and orally given to the jury. Besides, there were other correct instructions touching the matter of the degree to which the jury must be satisfied as to the defendant's guilt before they could find him guilty; and, this being so, we cannot conceive that the jury was misled by the patent inaccuracy in this instruction.

[7] The defendant also insists that the instruction upon the subject of murder should not have been given and cites some cases upon the error of giving inapplicable instructions. In the instant case, however, the trial court, in quoting the provisions of the Penal Code treating of the subject of homicide, expressly stated to the jury that:

> "The giving of the instruction on murder is for no other purpose than that you may understand hereafter the instructions that will be given upon manslaughter and that you may see the distinctive features between the two offenses."

Under such a limitation as to the purpose of the instructions on murder, we cannot conclude that the rights of the defendant were in any wise prejudiced thereby.

No other errors being urged, the judgment is affirmed.

GRAFTON et ux. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4693.)

1. Justices of the peace ⚷140—Statute providing for dismissal of appeals inapplicable to appeal set for trial when statute enacted.

Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, as added by St. 1923, p. 755, providing for dismissal of appeals from justice courts, where appellant fails to bring appeal to trial within one year from filing thereof, or before specified date in case of pending appeal, is inapplicable to an appeal from a justice court which had been set for trial when statute was enacted, in view of section 1049.

2. Justices of the peace ⚷140—Statute held retroactive, as requiring appeals already taken to be brought to trial within one year.

Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, as added by St. 1923, p. 755, providing for dismissal of appeals from justice courts, where appellant fails to bring appeal to trial within one year after filing, is retroactive, in that it requires appeals, taken before enactment of statute, to be brought to trial within one year from filing.

Application for writ of mandamus by Alfred K. Grafton and wife against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and others. Writ granted.

Weber & Crawford, of Santa Monica, for petitioners.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. One Lizzie A. James having recovered judgment against the petitioners herein in the justice's court of Venice township, they perfected an appeal to the superior court of Los Angeles county on October 28, 1922, and on April 17, 1923, the case was on motion of the plaintiffs set for trial in the superior court on January 31, 1924. After the date when the cause was set for trial, and on June 14, 1923, the following section was added to the Code of Civil Procedure as No. 981a (Stats. 1923, p. 755):

> "No action heretofore or hereafter appealed from the justice court to the superior court, shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all such actions heretofore, or hereafter appealed must be dismissed by the court to which the same shall have been appealed, on its own motion, or on the motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, where the appealing party fails to bring such appeal to trial within one year from the date of filing such appeal in said superior court, unless such time be otherwise extended by a written stipulation by the parties to the action filed with the clerk of the superior court to which the appeal is taken: Provided, however, that in any appeal pending when this section takes effect, a judgment or dismissal shall not be entered under the direction hereof sooner than January first, 1924; and provided, further, that any superior court may, by existing rule or by rule hereafter to be enacted, provide for dismissal of such appeal within a time less than one year."

On January 8, 1924, petitioner was served by opposing counsel with notice of motion to dismiss said appeal, upon the ground that the same had not been set for trial within one year from the date of its filing in the superior court, and on January 18, 1924, this motion was granted. Petitioner thereafter sought, in this court, an alternative writ of mandate, which was issued, and it is here contended that the superior court, without authority, applied retroactively the provisions of the section last quoted in dismissing the appeal, and in refusing to hear the same on the date set for trial thereof; that petitioner is advised upon a full and fair statement of the case to his counsel that he has a good and meritorious defense, and that the court below would by such dismissal deprive him of a vested right.

[1] It could not successfully be contended that the Legislature could by enactment, or by appeal, legally wipe out a pending cause of action or deny to a plaintiff the right to have tried and determined a case which had been set for trial, if the complaint therein stated a cause of action under laws existing at the time it was filed. It has repeatedly been held that under such circumstances the plaintiff would have a vested right which could not be destroyed by legislation taking effect during the pendency of his suit. Section 1049 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "An action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied."

It is insisted that petitioner upon filing his appeal did nothing more, from October 28th until April 17th; but, as was said in Kraker v. Superior Court, 15 Cal. App. 651, 115 Pac. 663, when the defendant appeals a justice court case on questions both of law and fact, the plaintiff is the actor in the superior court, as he was in the justice's court, and it is his duty to bring the case on for trial, no duty in that respect devolving upon the defendant, though he is the appealing party. It may be that under the provisions of the new statute under which this dismissal was ordered, the rule just stated has been altered; but that is a matter which we are not required to determine upon this occasion, since the trial date had been fixed prior to the taking effect of the statute.

In Lewis v. Penn. R. R. Co., 220 Pa. 317, 69 Atl. 821, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 279, 13 Ann. Cas. 1142, it was said:

> "If the law of the case at the time when it became complete is such an inherent element in it that a plaintiff may claim it as a vested right, on what possible ground can it be held that a defendant has no vested right with respect to an exemption or defense? The authorities make no such distinction. * * * 'There is a vested right in an accrued cause of action, in a defense to a cause of action, even in the statute of limitations when the bar has attached, by which an action for a debt is barred.' Sutherland on Stat. Const. § 480."

Such is the only logical conclusion that can in justice be recognized, and it is the foundation for the rule announced in Caulfield v. Doe, 45 Cal. 221, 223, that "when, in pending actions, proceedings have been taken prior to the taking effect of the Code of Civil Procedure, the sufficiency of such proceedings must be determined by the law in force at the time, and by no other rule," and in Vanderbilt v. All Persons, etc., 163 Cal. 507, 513, 126 Pac. 158, 161, that "retroaction is never allowed to a statute unless required by express legislative mandate or unavoidable implication." See, also, State Commission in Lunacy v. Welch, 20 Cal. App. 624, 129 Pac. 974.

[2] In so far as it requires that appeals taken before the enactment of the statute must be brought to trial within one year from the date of the filing of the appeal, the statute under consideration by its express terms must be held to be retroactive; but to give it effect in this regard, the language of the statute does not require that its retroactive application be extended to include cases which had not merely been appealed but had progressed to the point of having been set for trial when the statute took effect. This law declares itself to be retroactive only as governing cases appealed; it does not go beyond that and take in those set for trial, and we are not disposed to adopt a construction unnecessarily extending the scope of the statute retroactively, since such an interpretation would work an apparent injustice and at the same time violate well-established principles of statutory construction.

Petitioner and respondent base their arguments upon questions as to the constitutionality of a statute which might effect the dismissal of an action upon facts as here presented, and the effect of several months' delay in having the instant case set for trial. But, aside from these considerations, we think that since the case at bar was definitely set down upon the calendar to take its course among cases ready and awaiting their turn before the court before the statute became effective, it does not come within the purview of the statute.

The writ of mandate will therefore be issued accordingly.

Joseph Barcroft and David P. Barcroft, both of Madera, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff instituted this action for the recovery of damages on account of personal injuries and loss of time suffered by reason of having been run into by an automobile driven by an employé of the defendants. The defendants had judgment and the plaintiff appeals.

It appears from the pleadings and transcript in this case that on or about 6:30 a. m. on the 10th day of January, 1922, while the plaintiff was walking along a certain street in the city of Madera known as Yosemite avenue in the direction of Pine street on the way to his employment, he was run into by an auto truck belonging to the defendants, then being driven by an employé named Adams; that this truck was traveling in the same direction with the plaintiff and ran into him from the rear; that no horn or bell was sounded to indicate the approach of the auto truck, but that the truck was loaded with some eight or ten empty milk cans; that the morning was more or less foggy and consequently more or less dark; that the plaintiff was walking a little to the right of the center line of said street; that there was no sidewalk along either side of said street; but that on the left-hand side there was a footpath, on the right-hand side a strip of grass some 10 feet in width; that between the place where the plaintiff was walking and the left-hand side of the street there was a distance of some 25 or 30 feet of open and unobstructed way; that it further appears that the plaintiff was wearing an overcoat and had the collar turned up. The plaintiff was quite seriously injured, but the extent thereof is not found by the court. It also appears from the transcript that Adams, the employé of the defendants, who appears to have been out of the state at the time of the trial and whose testimony was not taken, did not see the plaintiff until he had run into him. This appears from the testimony of one of the defendants brought out by the examination of the defendants' counsel.

Upon this state of the facts the court made, among others, the following findings:

"(4) That it is not true that plaintiff was not warned of the approach of said truck in any manner, but it is true that said Adams did not prior to said collision sound horn or bell; but in this connection the court finds that said truck was filled with large empty milk cans and that the noise made by said truck and cans was audible to persons of ordinary hearing for a distance of several blocks, and plaintiff could easily have heard said truck had his hearing not been cut off and interfered with by his said overcoat which covered his ears.

"(7) That upon the morning of said collision and at the time and place of the occurrence thereof there was a fog which rendered it impossible for a person in charge of a motor vehicle to see a great distance ahead; that there was a footpath paralleling the road at the time and place where said collision occurred for the use, convenience and safety of pedestrians; that on the other side of said road was an open space where a pedestrian might travel in safety, all of which facts were well known to plaintiff. The court finds that the plaintiff, had he exercised ordinary care and precaution, would have walked on said footpath on said morning, and the court further finds that in the exercise of reasonable care and precaution plaintiff would not have covered his ears with his overcoat in such fashion as to cut off, impair, and interfere with his hearing."

Founded upon these findings, the court drew the following conclusion:

> "(1) That said defendant and neither of them, neither through themselves or through their agents, have not been guilty of any recklessness, carelessness, or negligence in this cause, but plaintiff by reason of the facts found as aforesaid was reckless, careless and negligent, and the collision complained of in plaintiff's complaint was due to the recklessness, carelessness and negligence of said plaintiff, and not otherwise."

It will be observed that the court bases its decision upon this fact that the plaintiff was walking on the traveled portion of the highway instead of on the footpath paralleling the road; that in the exercise of ordinary care and precaution he would have walked on the footpath on said morning; and that the plaintiff should not have raised his coat collar so as to cover his ears and so interfere with his hearing. These facts seem to be based also upon the further facts that it was a foggy morning, which rendered it impossible for a person in charge of motor vehicles to see a great distance ahead.

[1] The court also bases its conclusion in part upon the fact that the truck was loaded with empty milk cans which doubtless made considerable noise.

The court finds, however, that no horn was blown or signal given by the driver of the truck of his approach. The mere fact that the truck was loaded with empty cans is not sufficient and was not sufficient to comply with the law in giving notice, as the Motor Vehicle Act read at the time of the injury complained of. Section 12 of the Motor Vehicle Act, approved May 10, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 405), which was in force on the 10th day of January, 1922, specified that:

> "Every motor vehicle shall be equipped with a bell, gong, horn, whistle, or other device in good working order, capable of emitting an abrupt sound adequate in quality and volume to give warning of the approach of such vehicle to pedestrians. * * * Every person operating a motor vehicle shall sound said bell, gong, horn, whistle or other device whenever necessary as a warning of danger. * * *"

The fact, if it is a fact, that the car was equipped with lights or that the truck was loaded with milk cans, is not sufficient to comply with the statutes, as appears from the case of Woodhead v. Wilkinson, 181 Cal. 599, 185 Pac. 851, 10 A. L. R. 291. The court in that case said:

> "Admittedly, plaintiff saw the glare from his headlight and knew that a car was coming up from behind; therefore (so defendant argues) there was no use for an alarm and the laws of California do not require the sounding of a horn unless one means to pass another person or vehicle, and defendant, being about to stop, was not under the rule. The mere fact that plaintiff could see the glare of defendant's headlights was not enough. True, it apprised her of his approach, but not of the fact that he was leaving the paved portion of the road and running partly to the north thereof. She was justified in assuming (as she says she did) that he was following the usual custom of drivers. Lawyer v. Los Angeles Pac. Co., 161 Cal. 53 [118 Pac. 237]. He was under the necessity of sounding a warning 'whenever necessary.' Stats. 1915, p. 405, § 12. That plaintiff had a right to be there cannot be denied (Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 143 Pac. 743), and defendant was not absolved from the duty of giving her fair warning of his approach, if the circumstances made such warning necessary, merely because she could see the glare of his headlights. He was under the rule of section 20 (a) of the law of 1915, then in effect, which declares that: 'The driver or operator of any vehicle in or upon any public highway shall drive or operate such vehicle in a careful manner with due regard for the safety and convenience of pedestrians.'"

The holding of this case is not affected or modified by the case of Zechiel v. Los Angeles Gas, etc., Corp., 183 Cal. 777, 192 Pac. 720, in which the court used the following language:

> "If the movement and noise of the machine were sufficient to give the plaintiff notice of his danger, no obligation rested on the defendant to give further warning and his failure to do so was not actionable negligence. * * *"

The facts of that case show its inapplicability here. There the injured person was coasting down a side street at right angles and was not visible to the defendant or rather to the driver of the truck, belonging to the defendant, as he started to back the truck. He was not approaching any individual from the rear; there was no one in front of him in the direction in which he was traveling or moving; and he was not charged with the duty resting upon the defendant under the provisions of section 12 of the act above quoted and which applied to automobiles at that time approaching any one from the rear.

In drawing its conclusions the learned trial court appears to have been of the opinion that it was negligence for the plaintiff to be walking upon the highway in question. There is no showing that it was a much-traveled street, the testimony of the plaintiff being all the testimony called to our attention on that subject, and that is to the effect that he had never seen an automobile on that street at that time of the day, and that he was accustomed daily to use that street in going to his place of employment.

[2, 3] So far as the state of California is concerned, the right of pedestrians or foot passengers to use the streets has not been modified. The rule in this state is clearly set forth in 3 California Jurisprudence, 870, § 100, as follows:

> "As to foot passengers, the old common-law freedom of use of the king's highway has not been modified in California by statutory enactment, and it still remains the law that foot passengers have the right to use and traverse the highway at all its points, being chargeable only for the exercise of a due amount of care, to be governed by the use of the highway actually made. * * * A pedestrian, struck and injured by an automobile while he is walking in the center of a street, is not negligent as a matter of law in merely being where he was instead of walking along the sidewalk."

On page 884 of the same volume appears the following statement of the law:

> "A pedestrian is under no absolute legal obligation to look out for automobiles coming from behind, his duty, at most, being for the jury to determine. And so it has been held, where both pedestrians and vehicles were rightfully using the left-hand side of the highway, * * * the pedestrians, while keeping a reasonable outlook ahead, are under no legal obligation to look back to discover danger."

In other words, a pedestrian is not guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, because of failure to look behind him and discover an approaching car which may heedlessly run him down. These statements of the law are abundantly supported by the citation of authorities given in the footnotes to the sections cited. See, also, Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 143 Pac. 743, where the same rules of law are set forth. In the opinion deciding that case the following argument is used which is applicable here:

> "Upon the part of the foot passengers we have the unconsciousness of such approach, with absolute inability to inflict injury and a measurable inability to avoid the infliction of injury. While both parties are charged only with the exercise of the same degree of care, it is manifest that the amount of that care by law exacted of the driver of the motor vehicle is far greater than the amount exacted of the foot passengers. Of the driver of a vehicle under such circumstances, the law in terms requires that he shall not only give reasonable warning of his approach, but 'use every reasonable precaution to insure safety.' * * * In the exercise of 'every reasonable precaution' which the law enjoins, it is well within the spirit of the law to say that the driver of an automobile approaching pedestrians, and particularly women, must have his car under such control as that it may be promptly stopped. The sounding of the horn and the noise occasioned by the muffler cut-out are each and both well enough in their way, but they do not embrace and conclude all of the duties of the driver of the automobile."

In Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 Pac. 358, the law in relation to the use of highways by pedestrians is stated as follows:

> "The fact that a pedestrian who is injured by an automobile is walking on the left-hand side of the highway does not, of itself, constitute contributory negligence. A pedestrian has the right to use all parts of a road or street, being chargeable with the exercise of a reasonable degree of care to be determined under all the circumstances."

[4] The rule of reasonable precaution which the law enjoins upon a driver of an automobile upon a public highway includes the necessity of making certain that foot passengers are aware of the rearward approach of the vehicle; that the vehicle itself is at such a distance from the pedestrian as to avoid running over him in his sudden panic from surprise at knowledge of its unexpected approach; and, finally, that the vehicle is under such control as that it may be stopped promptly.

In the case of Deputy v. Kimmell, 73 W. Va. 595, 80 S. E. 919, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 989, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 656, and elaborately annotated, we find the following statement of the law applicable herein:

> "A person lawfully in a public highway may rely upon the exercise of reasonable care by drivers of vehicles to avoid injury. Failure to anticipate omission of such care does not render him negligent. A pedestrian is not bound, as a matter of law, to be continuously looking or listening to ascertain if automobiles or other vehicles are approaching, under penalty that if he fails to do so and is injured, his own negligence will defeat recovery of damages sustained."

[5] The plaintiff in this case was where he had a right to be. The testimony shows that there was plenty of room for the driver of the automobile truck to have passed him on the left-hand side. The time of day when the injury occurred was such that the law required the truck to be equipped with lights sufficient to enable the driver to perceive the person of others who might lawfully be using the same highway. The statement of the driver shows that he did not see the plaintiff until he had run him down. Had the car been equipped with proper lights, had he been traveling at such a rate of speed as the law requires under the circumstances to safeguard the rights of others and had he been keeping a proper lookout ahead, as the law requires, he would have discovered the presence of the plaintiff. A failure in any of these respects constitutes negligence.

The testimony in this case, as well as the findings of the court, show that the plaintiff, at the time of the injury complained of, was where he had a legal right to be; there is nothing in the testimony nor in the findings of the court which shows that the plaintiff varied his movements or suddenly crossed the path of the oncoming automobile; the plaintiff was traveling in the same direction as the automobile and was under no legal compulsion to be continually looking around to ascertain if any one was about to run him down; the testimony shows and the finding of the court is that no warning signal was given by the driver of the approaching auto truck. The testimony also shows that there was plenty of space on the highway for the truck to have passed the plaintiff without danger of collision. These facts certainly make out a prima facie case and cast upon the defendants the burden of showing that the driver of the truck was complying with the law and taking all precautions which the circumstances of the case required in order that his use of the highway might not be to the injury of any one who was lawfully thereon. The only showing made by the defendants was that the plaintiff was protecting himself from the cold at that early morning hour. Among other things, as we have said, the trial court found as follows:

> "The court finds that the plaintiff, had he exercised ordinary care and precaution, would have walked on said path on said morning. * * *"

And the conclusion of law was drawn that he was negligent in so doing. In support of this finding and conclusion, the respondents argue as follows:

> "Moreover his negligence did not end here, but in disregard of his own safety he was walking in the road although there was a well-defined footpath paralleling this road on one side and a clear space on the other side of the road, in either of which places he might have pursued his course with safety."

All of this is true. If the plaintiff had been somewhere else, the truck belonging to the defendants would not have run him down, but that is very far from constituting negligence on the part of the plaintiff or excuse from liability on the part of the defendants. We do not very well see how negligence on the part of the plaintiff can be predicated upon a statement of facts or finding of facts which show that the plaintiff was in a position where he had a right to be and where he had a right to conclude that no one would do him injury simply because he might have been elsewhere and thus escape being run down by an automobile truck driven by one who admits that he did not see the plaintiff until the collision had occurred.

We think that the findings are not supported by the evidence and that the judgment is not supported by the findings. It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the trial court be and the same is hereby reversed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. COX et al. (Cr. 722.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 21, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 19, 1924.)

1. Constitutional law 🔑90—Right of press or of free speech is not curtailed by act limiting constitutional change to peaceable means.

As long as the power of constitutional change is subject to the prerogative of a majority of the people, and may be advocated by any one, right of press or of free speech is not curtailed or abridged by an act limiting exercise of effort to make such changes to peaceable means.

2. Constitutional law 🔑90—Change of government may not be advocated by destruction of property or imperiling lives of those not agreeing to change.

While one may freely state his reasons why change in government is desirable, he has no license to advocate destruction or to incite others to destroy property or imperil lives of those who do not agree to such changes.

3. Criminal law 🔑1159(5)—Whether teachings of I. W. W. were being promulgated or had been eliminated held for jury, and not reviewable.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, whether teachings incorporated in literature of the I. W. W. were still being promulgated, or whether all literature as to sabotage and its advocacy had been eliminated, was for jury, and not for court of appeal, where there was testimony sufficient, if believed, to support verdict.

4. Criminal law 🔑1172(7) — Defendant not harmed by instruction requiring knowledge of membership.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, if knowledge of membership in prohibited organization may not be properly read into Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, to make a member amenable to penalties prescribed, defendants were not harmed, where question of essential knowledge by defendants of their membership was presented in court's instructions as a prerequisite to conviction.

5. Criminal law 🔑1170½(5)—Refusal to permit cross-examination as to whether witness had been confined in institution for mentally afflicted held not reversible error.

Refusal to permit cross-examination of a witness as to whether he had been confined in an institution for the mentally afflicted was not reversible error, where he was permitted to state facts showing himself to be of reprehensible character.

6. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Whether defendants organized society held immaterial if membership and criminal character of organization shown.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, it was immaterial that defendants had not organized or assisted in organizing a society of the character prohibited by statute, if defendant's membership in such organization was established, and its criminal character shown.

7. Criminal law 🔑695(2)—Admission of exhibits against general objection held not erroneous.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, admission of exhibits, seized at meeting place, was not erroneous, where objection was general in form, and did not call attention to fact that signatures to exhibits were not properly authenticated, as they were admissible to show transaction of business and its character.

8. Criminal law 🔑1168(2)—Failure to limit admissibility of exhibits in prosecution for criminal syndicalism held harmless error.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, failure to limit admissibility of exhibits, seized at meeting place of I. W. W., to showing transaction of business and its character, held harmless error, in view of other evidence of defendants' membership and admission thereof as to two of them.

9. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2 — Evidence held to sustain finding of membership.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding of a defendant's membership in the I. W. W.

10. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2 — Evidence held not to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, evidence of a defendant's membership in I. W. W. held insufficient to sustain conviction.

11. Criminal law 🔑450—Exclusion of opinions and conclusions of persons, not members of organization, as to its purposes held not erroneous.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, exclusion of opinions and conclusions of persons, not members of an organization, as to its purposes and patriotism was not erroneous, since it is what organization does that stamps its character, and not what others may think about it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Lauri Mammi and others were convicted of criminal syndicalism, and they appeal. Reversed as to Lauri Mammi, and affirmed as to other defendants.

R. W. Henderson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendants and appellants were jointly tried and convicted of the crime of criminal syndicalism upon an information in the following words and figures, to wit:

> "The said defendants, * * * on or about the 26th day of December, A. D., nineteen hundred and twenty-two, at and in the county of Humboldt and state of California, did then and there willfully, unlawfully and feloniously organize and assist in organizing, and each was then and there, and did knowingly become then and there a member of an organization, society group and assemblage of persons, to wit, The Industrial Workers of the World, then and there organized and assembled to advocate, teach, aid and abet criminal syndicalism contrary to the form, force and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

The defendants' motion for a new trial being denied, an appeal was taken therefrom and from the judgment of conviction to this court. At the trial the defendants appeared in person and not by counsel.

The information, as set forth, shows that the defendants were charged under subdivision 4 of section 2 of the act of the Legislature, approved April 30, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 281), defining criminal syndicalism and sabotage, etc.

[1] The usual constitutional objections to the act in question are again presented for consideration, but, as these questions have all been determined by the many cases decided by this court and by the Supreme Court of the state, it does not seem to us that it is necessary to again recite the same further than to state that the fundamental principle upon which government is established is the right of self-preservation against every form of illegal or violent assault. A constitutional government contains within itself the method, the manner, and the power of constitutional change, and that change is always subject to the will, wish, and prerogative of the majority of the people exercising the right of suffrage in a legal and constitutional manner. So long as these methods of procedure are open and may be advocated by any one, it cannot with consistency be urged that the right of the press or of free speech is either curtailed or abridged by an act which limits the exercise of the effort to make such changes as may be desired by peaceable means.

[2] Free speech and license are not convertible terms. One may freely state his reasons why a change in government is desirable, but he has no license by reason thereof to advocate the destruction of or take steps to incite others to destroy the property or imperil the lives of those who do not agree to such changes. One method is lawful, the other is not, because it strikes at the basis of all government, and denies the right of self-preservation. This does not presuppose the continuance of the existing order, but it does presuppose that the existing order, condition, and structure of society shall be changed only by peaceable means, and that violence and destruction have no place in human government. We find nothing in the Constitution of this state nor in the Constitution of the United States which denies the right of the state to protect itself from violent assaults whether directed from within or from without.

Though denominated a contest between labor and capital, this case exhibits nothing different from those that have preceded it which, as we have said, are all founded upon an act of the Legislature which seeks to enforce the right of the state to exist. We think this to be the fundamental basis of the law and a sufficient answer to the constitutional questions urged on this appeal.

[3] This case is also replete with exhibits of pamphlets, documents, and literature of the kind and character introduced, considered, and held sufficient to authorize a jury in determining the question of the unlawful purposes, teachings, and practices of the I. W. W., and it would serve no useful purpose to again set them forth. There is testimony that the teachings incorporated in the literature referred to are still being promulgated. There is also testimony that all literature as to sabotage and its advocacy have been eliminated. These matters were questions for the jury to determine and not for this court, so long as there is sufficient testimony, if believed by the jury, to sustain the verdict. Omitting all reference to sabotage, or assuming that the organization has eliminated that word from its literature, there are still other matters proper to be considered by the jury. The preamble and constitution of the order were admitted in evidence, and, while we have said that the preamble, in and of itself, does not import violence, yet there is one paragraph, when read in connection with other literature in which "direct action" is advocated, may be considered upon the question of the continued unlawful purposes of the organization. That paragraph is as follows:

> "Instead of the conservative motto, 'A fair day's wage for a fair day's work,' we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, 'Abolition of the wage system.'"

If the direct action or the taking possession of the farms and the factories of the country is to be other than that of returning a full equivalent in value for the property taken, the unlawful character of the organization, as it existed at the time of the trial of this cause, could be considered by the jury as established.

[4] The appellants also again raise the question of scienter or essential knowledge. While the word "knowingly" does not precede the word "is," in subdivision 4 of the act referred to, we are of the opinion that the subdivision has the same meaning as though it were worded in the manner contended for by the appellants. It does not mean that any one who was elected an honorary member without his knowledge or consent of any organization or assemblage to advocate or teach criminal syndicalism would be amenable to the penalties prescribed in the act, but it does apply to one who voluntarily and by action on his part has become and is a member of such an organization. Under such circumstances knowledge is imputed and would exist in fact just as much as though it were specifically set forth and denominated in the act of the Legislature condemning such organization. The learned trial court took this view, and instructed the jury as favorably as could be asked by the appellants as follows:

> "If you find from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the Industrial Workers of the World is an organization, society, group, or assemblage of persons organized to advocate, teach, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism, and that the defendants knowingly became members of said Industrial Workers of the World at the time and place set forth in the information, then you should return a verdict of guilty of the crime charged in the information."

Also:

> "In order to convict the defendants you must be convinced beyond reasonable doubt that the defendants knowingly belonged to an organization which in its nature was a criminal conspiracy to change industrial control and government by unlawful and criminal methods." (The italics are ours.)

The words "knowingly belonged" referred to a previous period of time, and impart the same meaning as "is," as that word is used in the statutes. The fact that the defendants knew of their membership in the organization was given to the jury as an indispensable prerequisite to a verdict of conviction. Upon the question of organization and becoming members the trial court instructed the jury as follows:

> "If you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the Industrial Workers of the World was at the time and place mentioned in the information, an organization, society, group, or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advise, teach, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism, and that the said defendants did at said time and place, willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously organize, or assist in organizing, or did knowingly become members of such organization, then your verdict should be guilty as charged in the information herein."

Other instructions covering practically the same grounds and couched in the same language were also given, showing that the question of essential knowledge on the part of the defendants was distinctly and clearly presented to the jury as prerequisite to conviction. Whether our interpretation of the statute as requiring knowledge is or is not correct, it appears that the interpretation contended for by the appellants was accepted and followed by the trial court, and, therefore, upon this ground no injury has been inflicted, should it be finally held that knowledge of membership may not properly be read into the statute.

[5] Much space and consideration is given in the appellants' briefs to the testimony of the witness Townsend, and also to the ruling of the trial court in sustaining objections to questions asked by the defendant as to whether the witness had or had not spent some period of his life in an institution for the care of the mentally afflicted. This court has held that such testimony is admissible, not that it tends to degrade the witness, but that it does bear upon his credibility and the weight and the consideration to be given to it by the jury, but for the same reasons that we gave in the case of People v. La Rue (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 627, we hold such error not sufficient to authorize a reversal of the verdict herein. The witness was allowed to and did state sufficient to show himself to have been one of the most reprehensible characters thinkable. He stated on the witness stand that he had never told the truth before in his life. He admitted participation in numberless atrocious offenses. It is unfortunate that any one confessedly guilty of so many despicable crimes must be used as a witness; but competency and character are separate and distinct terms. A witness may be competent and yet of such unspeakably degraded character as to be unworthy of belief, hence his testimony is admissible, and may be considered by the jury and given such weight as they may deem it entitled to under all the circumstances. It is not for the court to close the door of reformation and say that a witness, who has never told the truth up to a certain period of time, may not thereafter mend his ways and speak words conformable to the facts. The jury is the judge of the credibility of witnesses, and whatever views we may entertain of such a witness it is not for the court to deny the jury the right to pass upon the testimony of such a witness, or pronounce him in law incompetent and exclude him from the witness stand. It may be that, if the I. W. W. organization is a criminal conspiracy in its essential fundamental principles, doctrines, and advocacies no other kind or character of testimony or no other kind or character of witnesses may be had from its membership.

[6] Objection is also made to the admission of certain testimony consisting of papers and documents found in one of the rooms of the building known as 1211 Summer street in the city of Eureka and used as a meeting place of the I. W. W.'s. Objection is also made that there is no sufficient testimony showing the membership of Frank Cox and Lauri Mammi. The point is also made that there is no testimony showing that the defendants organized or assisted in organizing any local branch of the I. W. W.'s or any such association or organization. If membership is established and the criminal character of the organization shown, then, and in that case, it becomes immaterial whether the testimony is or is not sufficient to show that the defendants organized or assisted in organizing a society having for its purpose the promulgation of teaching the acts proscribed by the statute. The defendants Cox, McGrath, and Kuilman were arrested at 1211 Summer street in the hall used by the association. The testimony of the sheriff shows that at the time of the arrest there was an assemblage of some thirty persons; that a meeting was apparently in progress; that the defendant Cox was seated at a table taking minutes; that in an adjoining room was a great mass of literature including stub books, memoranda, delegates' blanks, and secretaries' financial blanks. Some of these blanks were filled out with the amounts of money received, the purposes for which the money was expended with the names of the defendants appearing as signed thereto. The stub books purported to be memoranda of moneys received from different members. A sample of each will suffice. One stub reads as follows:

> "Industrial Workers of the World Jan. 20, 1923, $9.10. Received from Frank Cox the sum of nine dollars and ten cents for propaganda fund. [Signed] Mike Donivan."

Another entitled:

> "Member's Record. Delegate's and Branch Secretary's Financial Report Blank. Industrial Union No. 120 of the I. W. W. Date 10—2—22.

Initiation fees	$ 8 00
Due stamps	12 50
Gen. Org. stamps	4 00
Gen. defense and relief stamps	3 00
C. case	50
100 workers	3 00
Literature 100 Sol.	3 00
Il Proletario	90
Russ paper	60"

Then follows a list of disbursements, at the bottom of which appears:

> "Delegate or Branch Sec'y Frank Cox. Del. No. H–1640."

On the reverse side:

> "Report of amount collected and of whom. I. U. No. 120 under the date 9—28 Oscar Horka card number 767180 Oct. Dec. Dues $1.50. Initiated by Union 120 month 9 date 18 year 21. The 9th month 29th day. Robert Whiteside. Card No. 723452. Sept.–Dec. dues, $2.00. Assessments $1.50. Initiated by Union 120. Month 7 day 1 year 22. A. Kent. Card No. X20123 Dec. Dues, 50c. Assessments 50c. Date 5—24—22."

There are several reports of this kind containing a list of the names of more than 20 persons purporting to be members, and of dues and assessments received therefrom. These stub books and reports were all found at the place occupied by the defendants at the time of their arrest. The fact that a meeting was being held is apparently undisputed. This is shown by the cross-examination of the witness, Sheriff Arthur A. Ross, conducted by the defendant Frank Cox. Upon the offer of the district attorney of the exhibit just referred to the defendant McGrath, apparently speaking for all of the defendants, made the following objection:

> "We wish to offer an objection against the introduction of these exhibits on the ground that the proper foundation has not been laid; nothing here to show there is any such an organization as the Industrial Workers of the World, no testimony to show there is such an organization existing; and there is no testimony to show just how that organization operates; nor shown that it has books or that it issues any membership books, or how it operates, whether by credentials or letters. It would seem testimony along that line should be given by some one familiar with its methods before any evidence of that kind is introduced. Those cards and credentials may have been issued by some (the transcript shows the word 'outcase' but must mean outside or some similar term) organization of the I. W. W., and the seal placed on the credentials. No evidence of a seal if they used a seal. There is no seal impression on those credentials and papers."

[7, 8] It must be admitted that for certain purposes there was no foundation laid for the introduction of the exhibits just referred to, but, as the objection was general in form, and does not call attention to the fact that the signatures to the papers were not properly authenticated, and, if admissible for any purpose, the rule announced in People v. Collins, 48 Cal. 277, applies. It is there held that where "evidence which is competent only for a particular purpose is admitted generally, and the counsel for the defendant fails to ask the court to limit the evidence to the purpose for which it was competent, or to ask a charge to the jury to that effect, the defendant can not afterwards complain that the testimony was inadmissible for some other purpose." This testimony was admissible in connection with what we have heretofore stated showing the presence of the three defendants, the fact that one of them was apparently taking minutes of the meeting, to show that the I. W. W. or whatever the assemblage was that was using 1211 Summer street was transacting business and also the kind and character of business that was being transacted. That it would not be sufficient to predicate a finding of membership therein or that the defendants were doing anything wrong may be admitted. So far as the defendants are concerned, for reasons hereinafter stated, the testimony is harmless, even though considered generally instead of limited specifically to the purposes for which it was admissible, and which doubtless would have been the case had the court's attention been called to the fact that the signatures were not properly authenticated. To constitute proof by way of an admission of the recitals contained in the exhibits the signatures thereto should have been authenticated in the manner provided by section 1940, Code of Civil Procedure. The exhibits being considered show only membership and transaction of business if taken at the full face value, which, as to two of the defendants, McGrath and Kuilman, is admitted.

Prior to the admission of this testimony, over the objection of the defendants, it appears that similar testimony had been introduced without any objection whatever, as appears from the following:

> "The bearer, fellow worker C. F. McGrath, has been duly appointed as delegate for all Industrial Unions of the I. W. W. and is authorized to collect dues and initiate new members. Dues are 50c per month. The initiation fee is $2.00. Dated this 26th day of November, 1922, signed by the General Sec'y-Treas. of the I. W. W. and Chairman of the G. E. B., who have been authorized to place the seal upon these credentials. The credential expires Mch. 31, 1923. [Signed] John Grady, General Sec'y-Treas. Rob't E. Daly, Chairman G. E. B. Issued by the Industrial Union No. 120."

Across the end appears:

> "Card No. 829978. Name C. F. McGrath."

Upon the line beneath:

> "Delegate's Signature and Card Number."

On the inside of the folder appears this entry. Under the head of date appears:

> "11—26—22. From Frank Cox Supply Clerk. Supplies received. Due Bks. $60.00. Due stamps $350.00. Assessments G. O. $100. G. D. 138."

On the bottom of the inside of the folder appears:

> "Name of delegate C. F. McGrath. Card No. 828878. Credential No. H 1417. Issued by Del. H 1640. Date, 11—26—22."

This exhibit was taken from the person of the defendant McGrath, and, together with 26 other exhibits covering the activities of the I. W. W. to the same purport as the ones objected to, were admitted in evidence without any objection whatever.

[9] We come now to the question of the testimony as to the membership of the defendant Cox. As we have stated, the defendant Cox, together with the defendants McGrath and Kuilman, were arrested at Normana Hall, 1211 Summer street, the place from which in an adjoining room a large number of exhibits, to which we have referred, were taken. At the time of his arrest the defendant Cox was seated at a table. Upon being searched, the following exhibits were taken from his person:

> "Lumber Workers' Industrial Union No. 120, I. W. W.
> "1001 West Madison Street, Chicago, Ill.
> "December 19, 1923.
> "Frank Cox, Box 91, Eureka, Cal.—Fellow Worker: We received your letter of the 14th. I. U. 310 has sent your five of the new credentials. I. U. 120 is figuring on putting the new credentials on the field the first of January.

We will send you some about that time. It is necessary for all the delegates to obtain the amount of supplies transferred from the old credentials to the new credentials in order to keep the accounts straight.

"With best wishes, yours for industrial solidarity, William Bryan, Chairman O. C."

Also the seal of the Industrial Workers of the World. Around the outside of seal, but within its circle, is "Industrial Workers of the World, March 12th, 1917, Chicago, Illinois."

Also a booklet entitled as follows:

"'An injury to one is an injury to all.' Preamble and Constitution of the Industrial Workers of the World. Organized July 7, 1905. General Administration: 1001 West Madison Street, Chicago, Illinois, U. S. A. As Adopted 1905 and Amended by Conventions and Ratified by Referendum Votes, 1906, 1907, 1908, 1910, 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1916, 1919, 1920, 1921."

There also was taken from the person of the defendant Frank Cox Exhibit No. 27, being a typewritten sheet of paper purporting to contain the minutes of the meeting of the I. W. W. organization held on December 17th, at Eureka, Cal., by the members of the organization, and is as follows:

"Meeting called to order 1 p. m. Dec. 17th, at Eureka, California. By traveling Del. 24 members present. Gus Louis elected chairman. Harry Williams, Rec. Sec'y."

At the bottom appears the seal of the Industrial Workers of the World, around the outer edge of which appears the following:

"Industrial Workers of the World. Eureka Branch, Eureka, California."

And then the signature:

'Frank Cox, Supply Clerk."

The membership card taken from the room referred to bearing the name of Frank Cox was also admitted. This card was admitted after the general objection to which we have adverted. The card reads as follows:

"I. W. W. headquarters in Eureka on the 23d day of January of this year," and on the fifth page of the book or card appears the name, "Frank Cox, initiated by # 573 D. Murray, M. J. M. W. I. Union No. 573. November 3, 1919. Department General Construction. Industry G. C.," with the printed signature of Thomas Whitehead, "Gen'l Sec'y-Treas. Gen. No. 748461." On the following page appears the following: "Transfer record month Nov. date 7 year 20. From Union No. 310 to Union No. 570. April 7—22. From Union No. 310 to Union No. 120. July 20—22 from Union No. 120 to Union No. 130. Sept. 17—22. From Union No. 130 to Union No. 120."

On other pages appear other data of transfers and canceled stamps of various denominations. The cross-examination of Sheriff Ross by the defendant Cox also brings facts material to be considered by the jury in determining his membership in the Industrial Workers of the World. We glean from the cross-examination the following upon this point:

"Q. Mr. Ross, you and Deputy Sheriff Mr. Long arrested Mr. Grath and I and another party in Normana Hall? A. We did. Q. Some time in December was it not, Mr. Ross, I mean about the month of January 6th, or somewhere around there? A. I am not certain of the date. Q. About what time was it when you came in, Mr. Ross? A. Oh, it was after 1 o'clock, some time between 1 and 3, if I remember rightly. Q. How did you gain admittance to Normana Hall, Mr. Ross? A. Walked in the door. Q. Walked in; was there any guard in the door? A. I think there was some one at the door, yes. Q. Do you recall seeing me in the hall that time, Mr. Ross? A. Yes. Q. What was I doing? A. You were at a table, I believe. Q. Was any one at the table with me, Mr. Ross? A. I think there was a man by the name of Williams. Q. Now, Mr. Ross, did you take the minutes of that meeting? A. I think I did, yes. Q. Do you know where they are at the present time? A. No, I can't say right now; they may be—I think they are in the possession of the district attorney, or they may be in my possession. I think they were used at the preliminary examination. I know they were given to me by you. Q. Mr. Cox: I want to get those minutes that you took away from us. Q. Did you take them away from the meeting—from the justice court? A. I think those minutes were all used at the preliminary examination. Mr. Cox: * * * If the court please, I would like to have the district attorney or the sheriff, I don't know which, to produce the minutes of the meeting held in Normana Hall here December 26, 1922. The Court: Is that the date of the arrest? Mr. Cox: Yes, sir."

Further questioning about the minutes brought out the following answers:

"The minutes of that meeting was in tablet. I know that I took the tablet and pinned it right through down the back through the writing and put the balance of the literature or whatever in the minutes there, and put it all together in the tablet."

These minutes were not produced, and do not appear in the transcript. All these facts and circumstances, we think, sufficient to justify the jury in coming to the conclusion that the defendant Frank Cox was a member of the organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World.

[10] As to the membership of the defendant Lauri Mammi, the testimony is strikingly slight. We are cited by the respondent to the following, being papers seized at Normana Hall and which lacked the authentication as hereinbefore stated. These papers are as follows:

"Receipt 20, issued to Lauri Mammi December 24, 1922, at Eureka, Calif., by Frank Cox, $2.50."

"Application card taken out at Eureka, California, December 20, 1922. Name, Abel Martin. Card No. 233757. Initiated by Union No. 800 Aug. 15, 1918. [Signed] Lauri Mammi H-1402."

"Application. Name Ida Palo at Eureka, Cal., Dec. 23, 1922, and the application signed by Lauri Mammi H-1402."

Also the following questions and answers and statements in the testimony of McMillan as to papers obtained at Normana Hall.

"Q. Where did you get that, also from the same place? A. Yes. Q. From where, the headquarters in Eureka? A. Yes. Mr. McGrath. We want it understood that the credential was taken from Lauri Mammi. The Court: The papers were taken from the headquarters at 1211 Summer street."

We are referred to this as an admission of Mammi of credentials. It is apparent from what the court said that the reporter's transcript is in error, and that McGrath intended to say, "We want it understood that the credential was not taken from Lauri Mammi," as it is evident is was not taken from his person, whatever the paper may have been. Outside of the reference given to us by the respondent we have found another exhibit of like import. It reads:

"Industrial Workers of the World. Union No. 120 Jan. 20, 1923. To Lauri Mammi. Del. No. H-1402. From Mike Donivan Del. No. H-1442. 5 membership cards. $10. Total $10."

There may be other reference or other receipts of like import in the transcript relating to the defendant Mammi, but we have not discovered them, but none of the exhibits to which we have referred were authenticated in the manner required by law to make their contents prima facie evidence of the matters therein stated, but, assuming that the receipts of the papers to which we have just referred to constitute prima facie evidence of everything therein stated, it does not prove membership in any organization whatever. At best it would only show dealings with and for the organization. This fact would be true of any one who rented Normana Hall to local Union No. 120 of the I. W. W. at Eureka, Cal., but that would not constitute proof of membership. No card was found upon the defendant Mammi, no card was found at the headquarters of the I. W. W., and the defendant Mammi was not arrested there, and was not participating in the meeting which was being held at the time of the arrest of the other defendants and the seizure of the literature contained in an adjoining room to the hall in which the meeting was being held. The transcript does show that some literature relating to the I. W. W., whether for or against does not appear, was found upon the defendant Mammi, but this literature was not introduced in evidence, and therefore we know nothing of its nature or effect. From the fact that the name Lauri Mammi appeared upon the papers to which we have referred the jury doubtless assumed that the defendant Mammi was a member of the organization. This assumption may be in accordance with the facts, but assumption is not waranted in criminal cases. There must be proof of facts from which the jury may deduce or draw its conclusion and render its verdict. In other words, the jury had no right to assume a fact, even though such assumptiton is correct, in the absence of legal proof of such fact. The jury having found generally that the defendants were guilty as charged, if any of the elements constituting the offense are sufficiently proven, it is immaterial that the testimony as to other offenses is insufficient. We have shown that the testimony warranted the conclusion of the jury that the defendants Cox, McGrath, and Kuilman were members of the organization, and it necessarily follows that whether they were organizing or assisting in organizing, as charged, becomes unimportant, and hence whether the word "organization," as used in the statute, is correctly interpreted in the case of People v. Thurman (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 394, is of no importance, so far as this cause is concerned.

[11] Complaint is also made by the appellants of the ruling of the court in excluding certain writings and pamphlets purporting to be the opinions and conclusions of persons not members of the organization as to its purposes, motives, aims. its loyalty, and its patriotism. The inadmissibility of such testimony is so clearly apparent that we do not need to give the ruling of the court thereon any extended consideration. It is what the organization does as an organization that stamps its character, and not what others may think about it. There were some other objections of minor importance as to the admissibility of testimony as to where some of the witnesses may have stated opinions and conclusions more or less interspersed with other testimony as to facts. These we have examined, but do not find in them anything of a reversible nature and so are not set forth herein.

The judgment and order of the trial court as to the defendants Cox, McGrath, and Kuilman are affirmed, and as to the defendant Lauri Mammi the judgment is reversed.

TOURNY et al. v. BRYAN et al.
(Civ. 2683.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 1, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 29, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Court's finding of fact on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Court's finding, based on conflicting evidence, that a bank, as beneficiary under a deed of trust executed by defendants as security for a promissory note, did not grant a further extension of time of payment after a certain date, held conclusive against defendants.

2. Mortgages 🔑409—Delay of 52 days from default in payment of installment of interest held not waiver of option to declare principal due.

Holder of note secured by deed of trust had a reasonable time in which to elect to declare principal due for failure to pay interest when due, and in waiting 52 days from such default before making such election it could not be held to have waived its option.

3. Mortgages 🔑319(3) — Evidence held to support finding as to reason holder of note did not credit payment.

Evidence held to support finding that failure of holder of note, secured by deed of trust, after defendant's default in payment of interest, to credit remittance thereafter made, was due to the fact that it was then intending to commence foreclosure.

4. Appeal and error 🔑870(4)—Attack on order appointing receiver held collateral attack, and appellate court could not review order.

Where defendants appealed from a judgment directing a foreclosure of deed of trust executed by them, but did not, as permitted by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, appeal from the order appointing a receiver, the attack on the order was collateral, and the appellate court, in view of section 956, could not review the order.

5. Mortgages 🔑469—Allegations in petition for appointment of receiver held sufficient as against collateral attack.

Allegations in petition for appointment of receiver of property, covered by deed of trust, held sufficient on collateral attack on order, to sustain order of appointment under Code Civ. Proc. § 564.

6. Mortgages 🔑469—Mortgagors held to acquiesce in appointment of receiver.

Mortgagors who did not ask the court to vacate order appointing receiver or in any manner question its regularity, or receiver's authority, prior to trial, 4 years after receiver's appointment, held to have acquiesced in the appointment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene McDaniel, Judge.

Suit by George Tourny and another as trustees against Louis A. Bryan and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order settling the account of a receiver, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William E. Davies, of Marysville, and Russell W. Cantrell, of San Francisco, for appellants.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants have appealed from the judgment entered against them herein, adjudging the amount due from them on their promissory note, and directing the plaintiffs, as trustees under defendants' deed of trust, given to secure such indebtedness, to sell the property therein described for the purpose of satisfying the indebtedness. They also gave notice of appeal "from the order and decree * * * settling the account of the receiver herein." The pleadings, findings, and decree cover nearly 700 folios, and, by reason of their length, it is necessary to state the issues material to the questions raised by the appeal in a somewhat disconnected manner.

August 28, 1916, the defendants executed their promissory note to the German Savings & Loan Society, hereinafter called the bank, for $90,000, payable 3½ years after date, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and if not so paid to be added to the principal. The note provided that—

> "In case said interest, or any part thereof, is not paid with 10 days after the same becomes due, the whole of said principal sum shall forthwith become due and payable, at the election of the holder of this note."

At the same time and as a part of the same transaction, the defendants executed and delivered to plaintiffs the aforesaid deed of trust, conveying to the latter 1,728 acres of land and 1,729 shares of stock of the Hallwood Irrigation Company. The deed of trust provided that the defendants should pay "all taxes and assessments and all other charges and incumbrances which now are or shall hereafter be * * * a lien upon the said premises"; that in default thereof the bank might make such payments, and that the deed of trust should stand as security for the repayment, on demand, of any amounts so paid. The trustees were authorized to sell the property on defendants' default "in the payment of the said promissory note, or the principal or interest or any part thereof," or in the payment of any other moneys agreed to be paid by them, to obtain the aid and direction of the court in the execution of their trust, "and either by themselves, or by a receiver to be appointed by a court therefor, to enter upon and take possession of the above-granted premises, or any part thereof, * * * and to collect and receive the rents, issues, and profits thereof * * * and to exercise such other powers in respect to said premises as the court in which said suit is pending may direct."

[1] February 24, 1917, defendant L. A. Bryan wrote the bank that he would be unable to pay the first installment of interest at the time it became due, February 28, 1917. The bank, on March 4th, granted an extension of time to June 15, 1917, for the payment of this installment of interest "on condition that you will provide for the payment of the water assessment of $844.50, which will be delinquent on the 16th inst., and which must be taken care of in all events by you by that time, and the receipts for same promptly mailed to us for our inspection." Defendants were unable to pay either the water assessment or the interest within the extension of time given, and the bank granted a further extension to August 28, 1917. The evidence is sharply conflicting as to whether there was any further extension of the time of payment, and the court's finding against defendants is conclusive on this appeal.

September 29, 1917, Bryan mailed money orders to the amount of $250 to the bank with the following direction: "Please pass to the credit of my loan account." This was the first and only tender of payment on the note or for moneys advanced by the bank. The bank received the money orders on the 30th of September, but the amount thereof was not applied to the defendants' indebtedness until November 1st. Plaintiff Tourny, vice president and general manager of the bank, testified:

> "I had a conversation with Mr. Bryan on or about the 1st day of November in respect to the $250 payment mailed by him to the bank. The remittance had been made but had not been applied for the reason that we did not wish to accept an account payment, and we never do when we know there is any question of foreclosing, and I told Mr. Bryan we would return the money, but instead of that he requested us to apply it, and that is why I wrote him this letter. And I told Mr. Bryan that these moneys had not been applied, and he said that, 'notwithstanding the fact that a suit has been commenced, you can credit that on my account,' and it was in accordance with that statement that the payment was then credited to his account."

The complaint herein was filed October 24, 1917. On the same day the court appointed C. L. Smith, a farmer and banker, and apparently a disinterested person, receiver—

> "to go upon the lands and premises in plaintiffs' complaint herein described and to take possession of, receive, hold, and preserve subject to the further orders of this court in the premises, all rents, issues, profits, and crops growing or being thereon and belonging to the said defendants * * * and to do any and all such other acts and things in the premises as may be or become necessary to hold and preserve the said premises, including said rent, issues, profits, and crops referred to in and secured by said trust deed."

The receiver was required to give a bond in the sum of $5,000. The court found upon ample evidence that—

> "The receiver has at no time gone upon said premises except for the purpose of collecting rents, issues, and profits thereof, * * * and at all times the said defendants * * * have remained in possession of said premises and have made and executed all leases in respect to the same."

Bryan testified that about the 1st of November, 1917, Tourny—

> "said if I could pay up the payments of the back interest he would dismiss the suit, and the receiver would be discharged."

The case was not brought to trial until February 7, 1922, and hence it does not appear that any advantage was taken of defendants' necessities by hasty action.

[2, 3] It is contended that the bank waived its option to declare the whole indebtedness due—

> "by waiting until the expiration of 52 days after default in the payment of the second installment of interest thereunder, and after it had received and retained a payment of $250 on account of overdue interest."

The bank had a reasonable time after default in which to exercise such option. It has been held that 59 days is not an unreasonable time in which to make the election. Fletcher v. Dennison, 101 Cal. 292, 35 Pac. 868. See, also, Kinsel v. Ballou, 151 Cal. 754, 91 Pac. 620; Hewitt v. Dean, 91 Cal. 5, 27 Pac. 423. "Waiver always rests upon intent." Alden v. Mayfield, 164 Cal. 6, 127 Pac. 45; Wienke v. Smith, 179 Cal. 220, 176 Pac. 42. The court found that "the bank did not actually credit said $250 received by it on the 30th day of September, 1917, for the reason that it then intended to request the commencement of legal proceedings on said deed of trust." It cannot be said that the evidence does not support such finding.

[4] Appellants urge that the receiver was the agent of the plaintiffs and that therefore they are liable for the alleged mismanagement of the property by him as set up by the defendants. As before stated, the court found on sufficient evidence that the receiver did not take over the management of the property further than to collect the rents thereof, and there is no claim of mismanagement in the collection and application of the rents, but had there been mismanagement on the part of the receiver, respondents would not be liable therefor. In support of their contention, appellants cite Atlantic Trust Co. v Chapman, 208 U. S. 360, 28 Sup. Ct. 406, 52 L. Ed. 528, 13 Ann. Cas. 1155. In that case the court said:

> "Whether a receiver should have been appointed or not was in the sound discretion of the court. Immediately upon such appointment and after the qualification of the receiver, the property passed into the custody of the law, and thenceforward its administration was wholly under the control of the court by its officer or creature, the receiver. In Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 322, 331, 15 L. Ed. 164, 167, it is said: 'A receiver is an indifferent person between parties, appointed by the court to receive the rents, issues, or profits of land, or other thing in question in this court, pending the suit, where it does not seem reasonable to the court that either party should do it. * * * He is appointed in behalf of all parties, and not of the complainant or of the defendant only. * * * It is the court itself which has the care of the property in dispute.' "

It was held that the party procuring the appointment of a receiver does not become responsible for his management of property intrusted to him as such, except under special circumstances, such as an unauthorized appointment, citing Ephraim v. Pacific Bank, 129 Cal. 589, 592, 62 Pac. 177, 178, where it is said that if the receiver—

> "has taken property into his custody under an irregular, unauthorized appointment, he must look for his compensation to the parties at whose instance he was appointed, and the same rule applies if the property of which he takes possession is determined to belong to persons who are not parties to the action, and is taken from his possession by paramount authority. As to such property his appointment as receiver was unauthorized and conferred upon him no right to charge it with any expenses."

Appellants, however, contend that the appointment of the receiver was unauthorized, and that therefore the respondents are answerable for his conduct in the management of the property. In appellants' reply brief it is said:

> "It is elementary that a receiver can be appointed by the court only under the provisions of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and not by consent of the parties. * * * There appears in the complaint no sufficient allegation * * * to authorize, or justify, the appointment of the receiver."

Baker v. Varney, 129 Cal. 564, 62 Pac. 100, 79 Am. St. Rep. 140, and Bank of Woodland v. Stephens, 144 Cal. 659, 79 Pac. 379, are cited in support of the propositions stated. In the former case, which was an appeal from the judgment, the court said that the receiver was not appointed under section 564—

> "but the authority to appoint a receiver was based entirely upon a stipulation in the mortgage itself. * * * Where a court has no authority under the law to appoint a receiver, such authority cannot be conferred by consent or stipulation of the parties. * * * We do not think that the appellant is precluded from making this point upon the ground that it is a collateral attack. Upon the record the order appointing a receiver must be considered as based solely upon the stipulation of the parties in the mortgage, and is therefore void."

In the latter case it is held that an allegation in the complaint that "the mortgaged premises are insufficient to pay and discharge the mortgage debt" states "no more than a conclusion." The court said:

> "Allegations of this character may be sufficient to uphold an order where the attack is collateral, but this cannot be allowed where, as in this case, there is a direct attack upon appeal."

In the instant case the petition for the appointment of a receiver alleges:

> "That there are now standing and growing upon the said lands and premises valuable crops. That the said crops are about to mature, and will thereupon be severed and removed from the said lands and premises by the said Louis A. Bryan and Winifred A. Bryan, or their successors in interest, and unless a receiver be appointed herein, will be discharged from the operation of said deed of trust and become wholly lost to the plaintiffs."

The attack here made is collateral. The order appointing the receiver was appealable. Code Civ. Proc. § 963. No appeal was taken therefrom. On an appeal from a judgment the court is without authority "to review any decision or order from which an appeal might have been taken." Code Civ. Proc. § 956; Bohn v. Bohn, 164 Cal. 532, 129 Pac. 981.

[5, 6] Whatever might be said if the attack were direct, the foregoing allegations in the petition for the appointment of a receiver are certainly sufficient against the collateral attack here made. The defendants did not ask the court to vacate the order of appointment or in any manner question the regularity thereof or the authority of the receiver at any time prior to the trial, which was commenced more than four years after the appointment. Such conduct justifies the inference that they acquiesced in the appointment. First National Bank v. Superior Court, 12 Cal. App. 335, 344, 107 Pac. 322.

The only objection urged to the settlement of the receiver's account is that he did not so manage the property as to produce as great returns as could have been secured. Since the management of the property, other than the collection of rents, of which no complaint is made, was in the hands of the defendants, the objection made to the account is not tenable.

Other grounds urged for a reversal are based upon the erroneous theory that the receiver was the agent of the bank, and, hence, no further consideration need be given them.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

While defendant in a criminal case cannot be tried for any other offense than that charged in information, evidence tending to prove crime alleged is admissible, though tending to prove commission of other crimes.

2. Criminal law 🔑369(2)—Evidence of defendants' arrest and escape for an offense after commission of robbery held admissible.

Evidence of defendants' arrest for a disturbance in a restaurant shortly after a robbery had been committed and their subsequent escape was admissible in a prosecution for robbery, though tending to show that defendants were guilty of other crimes.

3. Criminal law 🔑341—Cross-examination of defendant as to when he left jail held proper.

Where defendant in a robbery prosecution had testified on direct examination as to meeting his codefendant in county jail, cross-examination as to when he left county jail was proper to establish length of acquaintance with his codefendant.

4. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal of instructions covered by instructions given held not erroneous.

Refusal of instructions covered by the court's given instructions was not erroneous.

5. Criminal law 🔑814(12)—Refusal of instruction that defendants' reputation was presumed to be good held not erroneous.

Where no evidence was submitted as to defendants' good character for traits involved in robbery charges against them, court did not err in refusing an instruction that their reputation was presumed to be good.

6. Robbery 🔑24(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for robbery, evidence held to sustain conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Roy Oakleaf and Edson Piatt were convicted of robbery, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Frank W. Allender, of Los Angeles, for appellant Oakleaf.

Chas. I. Rosin and Nathan Goldberg, both of Los Angeles, for appellant Piatt.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and J. L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CURTIS, J. The defendants are charged jointly in the information with the commission of four robberies, all alleged to have been committed during the night of June 16 and the morning of June 17, 1923. The jury returned a verdict finding the defendant Oakleaf guilty on all four charges, and the defendant Piatt guilty of robbery as charged in count 2 of the information, and not guilty on the other three charges. The defendants have appealed separately from the judgment and from the orders denying their respective motions for a new trial. The defendant Piatt relies upon all the grounds advanced by defendant Oakleaf, and in addition thereto claims that the evidence is not sufficient to support the judgment against him.

[1, 2] We will consider the objections to the judgment which apply to both defendants, and afterwards that which is relied upon by the defendant Piatt only. The defendants, with a man by the name of Carlton, were arrested at about 2 o'clock on the morning of June 17, 1923, after the commission of the four robberies charged in the information. The arrest was made by a police officer of the city of Los Angeles in a restaurant in said city on account of a disturbance which occurred in said restaurant, and in which said defendants participated. The arresting officer, in taking the three prisoners to the police station in his automobile, was attacked by them and severely beaten, after which they all made their escape. Thereafter, the defendants were arrested about 3 o'clock of the same morning at a garage where they were in the act of renting a car from the owner of the garage. The defendants now claim that it was error to admit evidence of the arrest of the defendants on the first occasion, and their subsequent escape from the officer. It is defendants' contention that by the admission of this testimony the court permitted evidence of other crimes to be submitted to the jury, to the prejudice of defendants' rights. While it is universally recognized that a defendant in a criminal case cannot be tried for any other offense than that charged in the information, yet the rule is equally well recognized that evidence which is pertinent to, or tends to prove, the crime alleged, is admissible, even though it tends to prove the commission of other crimes. 8 Cal. Jur. 61; People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 193 Pac. 92. "Evidence of the conduct of the defendant subsequent to the commission of the alleged offense, which is admissible as tending to show consciousness of guilt, is not rendered inadmissible because it may tend to prove other crimes." 8 Cal. Jur. 72; People v. Mack, 14 Cal. App. 12, 110 Pac. 967. In the present case it was competent to show not only the whereabouts of the defendants immediately subsequent to the commission of the crime with which they were charged, but the fact that they were together with Carlton immediately after the time the crime was committed, and such evidence would not be rendered inadmissible because it might tend to show that they were guilty of other crimes.

Flight, attempts to escape, and assaults upon the officer having the prisoner in charge, made by the latter in his efforts to prevent arrest, or in his endeavor to escape therefrom, are always admissible in evidence as tending to show consciousness of guilt on the part of the prisoner. It is true that the first arrest of the defendants was made in connection with the disturbance in the restaurant. This circumstance, while it might be considered in determining the weight of the evidence complained of, would not render it inadmissible.

[3] There was no error on the part of the court in overruling defendants' objection to a question asked defendant Oakleaf on cross-examination, as to when he left the county jail. He had testified on direct examination that he had a short acquaintance with the defendant Piatt, and on cross-examination, that he had met him in the county jail. It was perfectly proper, therefore, for the prosecution, in an attempt to establish the length of this acquaintance, to ask the question objected to. Furthermore, neither of the defendants was injured by this evidence. Evidence had already been admitted, without objection, that the defendants met in the county jail, and it is not apparent to us how either could be injured by simply permitting the prosecution to show when the defendant Oakleaf left the jail.

[4, 5] We find no error in the ruling of the court in refusing to give certain instructions offered by the defendants. These proposed instructions, with the possible exception of that one relating to the good character of the defendants, were all covered by other instructions given by the court. There was no evidence submitted as to the good character of the defendants for the traits involved in the charges against them. It was not error, therefore, to refuse an instruction requested by the defendants that their reputation was presumed to be good. People v. Conte, 17 Cal. App. 771, 787, 122 Pac. 450, 457.

[6] Referring now to the objection made by the defendant Piatt that the evidence is not sufficient to support the judgment of conviction against him, we find that there is testimony that he and the defendant Oakleaf were together in the early part of the evening of June 16th, and that they were together in the restaurant where they were arrested at about 2 o'clock on the morning of the 17th of June. The testimony further shows that the robbery of which the defendant Piatt was convicted was committed at about 1:30 o'clock of the same morning. The witness Scovel, the victim of said robbery, positively identified Oakleaf as one of the persons participating in said robbery, and when asked whether he saw the defendant Piatt that night, after requesting Piatt to stand up, replied, "Yes, he appears very much like the man that held the gun." When further interrogated by a juror as to why he thought Piatt was one of the men who robbed him, he replied, "Because the features resemble him." In our opinion this evidence was sufficient to support the judgment against the defendant Piatt, notwithstanding the fact that the witness Scovel further stated that if it was a case of life or death he would not want to swear as to the identity of Piatt. Furthermore, as we have already seen, Piatt, along with Oakleaf and Carlton, after their arrest in the restaurant, and while they were being taken in an automobile to the police station, attacked the arresting officer, and after beating him up, all three of the prisoners made their escape from him. While the evidence does not show that the defendant Piatt took the leading part in this attack upon the officer, it does show that he participated therein, and that after the assault, with the other two prisoners, he made his escape from the officer. This evidence of the flight of the defendant Piatt the jury was authorized to consider together with the other evidence against him, and, taking it all together, we think it was clearly sufficient to justify the jury in rendering a verdict of conviction against the defendant Piatt.

The judgment and orders denying the motions for a new trial are affirmed.

NORTHCUTT v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

1. Parent and child 🔑2(4)—Act enjoining interference held inapplicable to proceeding after divorce for custody of minor children.

Former wife's proceeding for custody of children, and to restrain husband from interfering with her custody during hearing, was not authorized by Civ. Code, § 199, authorizing actions for custody, where marital relation had theretofore been dissolved.

2. Injunction 🔑163(1)—Statute requiring service of points and authorities to continue temporary order applies in suit for custody of children.

Code Civ. Proc. § 527, providing that, if party who has obtained temporary restraining order does not serve on opposite party, two days prior to hearing, copy of points and authorities in support of application, order will be dissolved, applies to action to obtain custody of children and restrain interference therewith.

3. Prohibition 🔑3(5)—Mere right of appeal does not bar unless adequate.

Mere right of appeal does not bar right to prohibition; right of appeal must also afford an adequate remedy.

4. Prohibition 🔑3(5)—Right of appeal from restraining order held inadequate remedy.

Right of appeal from temporary restraining order against husband's interference with former wife's custody of minor children held not an adequate remedy, and prohibition will issue restraining enforcement of order.

5. Prohibition 🔑3(5)—Not granted against further proceedings in action, because restraining order improperly granted.

Though in wife's action for custody of children awarded to husband by foreign divorce decree, order restraining husband from interfering with wife's custody was improperly granted, where husband has obtained custody by habeas corpus, and enforcement of order is to be prohibited, it would be improper to prohibit further proceedings in the action; remedy by appeal being adequate.

Prohibition by Carlton A. Northcutt against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, and another. Peremptory writ granted.

G. P. Adams and W. W. Orme, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Leo V. Youngworth, Harry J. McClean, John L. Richardson, and T. E. Parke, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. These are the facts shown, among others, by the petition for a writ of prohibition in this proceeding: One Myrna P. Sprague filed in respondent court her complaint against petitioner, which complaint was later superseded by an amended complaint, filed November 3, 1923. The latter pleading alleges in part that the plaintiff in the action, to whom we shall hereafter refer as the plaintiff, and the petitioner in this proceeding, whom we shall hereafter designate as petitioner, were wife and husband for a number of years prior to August 8, 1919; that during the subsistence of the marriage relation between the plaintiff and petitioner there were born to them two girls and a boy, the girls being, at the time of the filing of the pleading, of the ages, respectively, of 11 and 8, and the boy then being of the age of 5; that on August 8, 1919, a court in a certain county in Wisconsin, in which county the plaintiff and petitioner then resided, rendered its decree of divorce in an action in which petitioner was plaintiff and the plaintiff was defendant; that by the decree the care and custody of the daughters resulting from the marriage was awarded to petitioner and the care and custody of the boy was awarded to the plaintiff; that, except as later alleged in the pleading, the care and custody of the children has remained as by the decree ordered; that all three of the children were, at the date of the filing of the pleading, in the care and custody of the plaintiff; that then and ever since October 1, 1920, the plaintiff resided and has resided in Los Angeles county, Cal., and that all three of the children were, at the date of the filing of the pleading, residing with her at her place of residence therein; that since the granting of the decree of divorce conditions affecting the custody and control of the children have been changed and altered, particularly in certain respects which are set forth; and that the plaintiff is a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of the girls, is the person naturally entitled to their care and custody, and is desirous of caring for them, supplying them with the necessities of life, with a good home and motherly care, and with proper education and maintenance. The amended complaint prays that the temporary custody, and, finally, the permanent custody of the two girls be awarded to the plaintiff. Upon the filing of the amended complaint respondent court made its ex parte order requiring petitioner to show cause why the custody of the girls should not be awarded to the plaintiff during the pendency of the action, and restraining him, pending the hearing under the order to show cause, from interfering with the plaintiff's care, custody, or control of the girls, from removing them from her custody, and from taking them out of the state.

Petitioner, who is now a resident of Colorado, filed in the superior court an answer to the amended complaint of the plaintiff in which, in addition to many denials of allegations of the latter pleading, it is averred, in part, that the boy mentioned above is not the child of petitioner; that petitioner, who is a graduate of the United States Naval Academy, was absent from home in the service of his country during the late World War; that during that absence the plaintiff became infatuated with one Gowling, and that said Gowling was convicted in the federal court of a violation of the Mann Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8812–8819) so-called, for transporting the plaintiff from Nevada to California for immoral purposes; that the conviction was affirmed on appeal by an opinion reported in (C. C. A.) 269 Fed. at page 215; that by the divorce decree rendered by the Wisconsin court it was ordered that the two girls, from July 1 to August 31 of each year, might be left with their maternal grandmother if the latter so desired, during which time the plaintiff "shall be at liberty to there visit and associate with them"; that the plaintiff's present custody of the girls resulted from a violation of the terms of the divorce decree; and that the finding of the Wisconsin court upon which the award of the custody of the girls to petitioner was made was "that the interests of said children demand that their care and custody be given to" petitioner. When the cause came on for hearing under the order to show cause above mentioned, petitioner objected to the hearing upon various grounds, one of which will be mentioned below, and the objection was overruled.

At this juncture in the litigation the petition in the present matter was filed in this court, asking that a writ of prohibition issue to halt further proceedings in the action in the superior court. An alternative writ issued, and upon the return day the respondents interposed a general demurrer to the petition. An answer was also filed, but, except for certain express admissions, it presents nothing but legal conclusions, and it is conceded by respondents that the only question before us is as to the sufficiency of the petition for the writ of prohibition.

[1] It is provided by section 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the granting of injunctions, that—

> "When the matter first comes up for hearing the party who obtained the temporary restraining order * * * must have served upon the opposite party at least two days prior to such hearing, * * * a copy of his points and authorities in support of such application; * * * if he shall fail to serve a copy of his * * * points and authorities, as herein required, the court shall dissolve the temporary restraining order."

The petition alleges facts showing that in several respects the plaintiff failed to comply with provisions of section 527 which are not included in the foregoing quotation. It is enough for our present purpose, however, to state that it is also averred that the plaintiff never at any time served upon petitioner any copy of any points or authorities in support of her application for the restraining order which the court made. Respondents contend that section 527 can have no bearing upon the present controversy, for the reason that the action commenced by the plaintiff was instituted pursuant to the provisions of section 199 of the Civil Code. That section reads, in part, "Without application for a divorce, the husband or the wife may bring an action for the exclusive control of the children of the marriage," and provides, in addition, that the court may, during the pendency of such an action make such orders concerning the custody and care of the children involved in it as may be just. If we concede for the purpose of respondents' argument, which we do not decide, that section 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure can have no application to actions brought under section 199 of the Civil Code, we must hasten to assert that the action now under consideration was not commenced pursuant to the terms of that enactment. In the case of petitioner and the plaintiff there has not only been an application for divorce, but a divorce has been granted by a decree which deals fully with the question of the care and custody of their children. Not only so, but petitioner and the plaintiff are not husband and wife. For these reasons section 199 can have no application here. The plaintiff's amended complaint shows, so far as its support for an application for an injunction is concerned, merely a resort to the general jurisdiction of courts of equity to administer that form of relief.

[2] Turning from the claim that section 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no application to the action between petitioner and the plaintiff because of the terms of section 199 of the Civil Code, respondents also contend that the former section cannot avail petitioner because of the jealous regard, under the law, with which courts look to the welfare of infants. It is said that, in the present instance, the court will not allow the interference of section 527, because the welfare of the two girls is so transcendently important that any order made with regard to that welfare cannot be affected by a failure of the plaintiff to observe the provisions of the section. Viewed from the standpoint of its appeal to the heart, as well as of its importance to society, the question of the welfare and happiness of children cannot be measured in the same scale with mere questions affecting the disposition of property; and yet the administration of justice in each of these classes of cases must be governed by rules of procedure tending to aid the courts in a performance of their work with a minimum of friction and with a maximum of speed. In many cases affecting property, in which a crying need for injunctive relief was present, restraining orders have been vacated because of a failure to comply with the terms of section 527. Immense loss has thus been occasioned in many instances. Whatever the difference between such cases and cases like this upon social and humanitarian considerations, is there such a difference as to render one class of cases immune from procedural mandates like those found in section 527, while the other is governed by them? Where would be the end of arguments advanced to support the affirmative of such a proposition? What other rules of procedure must fall in the conduct of causes affecting the disposition of the custody of children? For example, are we to determine the welfare of infants under complaints which, for some minor or major reason, fail to state a cause of action? The Legislature has seen fit to make the provisions of section 527 general in their nature. We can see no reason why those provisions are not calculated to aid the administration of justice in the greater number of cases, as well in those in which the welfare of children is involved as in those in which property rights are at stake. Furthermore, we can perceive nothing annexed to our "inherent" right and duty to guard the welfare of children which empowers us to write an exception into the general terms of section 527. Whether such an exception shall be written is for the Legislature, granting that such a provision would not infringe the constitutional inhibition against special legislation. For us to write it would be a work of judicial lawmaking.

We are of the opinion that section 527 does apply here, that the restraining order issued by respondent court was void, and that it should have been dissolved by the court. Among the objections urged by petitioner against the hearing by respondent court under the order to show cause was the one that section 527 had not been complied with.

[3, 4] It is contended by respondents that prohibition will not lie to prevent the enforcement of the restraining order for the reason that an appeal may be taken therefrom. A mere right of appeal, however, does not bar the right to prohibition. The right of appeal in a given case must also afford an adequate remedy. Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 397, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192; Elliott v. Superior Court, 168 Cal. 727, 145 Pac. 101; Koerber v. Superior Court, 57 Cal App. 31, 206 Pac. 496. It is futile to assert that the right of appeal from the restraining order in the present instance would afford such a remedy. If the charges made against the plaintiff in the answer of petitioner are true—and a reading of the opinion reported in 269 Fed. at page 215, is most illuminating on this question—grave consequences might possibly result from the retention of the girls in her custody pending the appeal. Moreover, and even if the probable feeling between the plaintiff and petitioner should not prompt her to poison the minds of the two minors against him, their presence with her for the length of time necessary to dispose of the appeal might well alienate, or at least dull, their affection for him. We can see the possibility of great damage, not only to the rights of petitioner as a parent, but to the welfare of the girls, if they should be allowed to remain with the plaintiff for so long a time. The inadequacy of the right of appeal from the restraining order is to us apparent.

[5] It is evident that a peremptory writ of prohibition must issue against the enforcement of the restraining order. As to the application for the issuance of the writ as against further proceedings in the action as a whole, the situation is quite different. We are informed by counsel that the daughters of petitioner and the plaintiff have been released from the custody of the latter under a writ of habeas corpus issuing out of the superior court, and that they are now in the care and custody of petitioner. Under the circumstances surrounding this communication we must and do regard it as a stipulation to be considered, in making disposition of the present proceeding. The fact that the girls are now in the custody of petitioner, coupled with the fact that our writ of prohibition will issue in the matter of the restraining order, removes all necessity for the issuance of the writ against the action as a whole. In truth, these circumstances make it improper for us so to issue the writ. The two minors being now in the custody of petitioner, and the operation of the injunction against their removal to Colorado, in which state they have heretofore resided, being now removed, all objection to the adequacy of the right of appeal from any judgment rendered against petitioner upon a trial of the action necessarily disappears.

Demurrer overruled. A peremptory writ of prohibition will issue, restraining respondents from making any order for the enforcement of the restraining order made and entered on or about November 3, 1923, or from making any order with reference thereto except to dissolve the same.

SANDBERG v. McGILVRAY-RAYMOND GRANITE CO. et al. (Civ. 2707.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 20, 1924. Rehearing Denied April 19, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 19, 1924.)

1. Negligence ⟹23(2)—Car's injuring child held "attractive nuisance."

Death of a child run over by slowly moving train operated on a spur track to defendant's quarry held within doctrine of "attractive nuisance."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Attractive Nuisance.]

2. Railroads ⟹400(11)—Contributory negligence of child held question for jury.

Whether boy 8 years old, killed on railroad tracks, was sufficiently advanced in years and intelligence to be classed as willful trespasser, and could comprehend danger of moving cars as in case of adult, was for jury.

3. Railroads ⟹398(1)—Particular manner of injury to child by cars held immaterial.

Where child was injured while playing on or about defendant's slowly moving train, and would not have been there but for failure of defendant to exercise ordinary care, particular manner of injury or how he happened to be at the place where the accident occurred was unimportant.

4. Trial ⟹296(3) — Instruction eliminating question whether cars attractive to children error, but cured by other instructions.

Elimination from instruction that if child was possessed of judgment too immature to appreciate danger from playing on cars then it was defendant's duty to exercise reasonable care to prevent his so doing, of requirement that cars would attract an ordinarily reasonable boy of decedent's age, and that he was so attracted, held erroneous but harmless, in view of other instructions containing such requirement, and evidence which tended to show train was attractive to children.

On Petition for Rehearing.

5. Death ⚷42—Action for death of child maintainable by husband without joining wife.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 376, 377, right of action for death of minor child by wrongful act is given to the marital community, and in view of section 369, it is not necessary to join the wife to enable the husband to recover the pecuniary loss suffered by both.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Henry Sandberg against the McGilvray-Raymond Granite Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

B. M. Aikins and Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno, for appellants.

Fee & Ring and G. W. Raburn, all of Madera, and Gallaher, Simpson & Hays, of Fresno, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the death of his minor son, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendants in the operation of a railroad train. The defendants Whitfield and Beach were the engineer and brakeman respectively, in charge of the train, which was being operated by the defendant corporation. The corporation will be referred to as the defendant.

At the time of the accident the defendant was, and for many years prior thereto had been, engaged in the operation of a granite quarry. It also operated a railroad running from the quarry to the line of the Southern Pacific Company, a distance of between one-half and five-eighths of a mile, usually making one round trip a day. The greater part of this short railroad from the Southern Pacific line up to the quarry is on a grade of about 5½ per cent. The train consisted of a locomotive, called a "dago" by the witnesses, and two flat cars. The defendant's superintendent described the dago as follows:

> "It is a locomotive crane, commonly called a wrecking crane, and it is a machine that weighs about—I think the machine figures 36 tons. It has two cylinders, 8x10 cylinders, which exhaust into the open, and naturally very noisy."

The crane is used to load blocks of granite. The dago cannot be run at a speed exceeding one mile an hour, even on a down grade. It takes more than an hour to make the trip from the Southern Pacific line to the quarry. The cars were of the ordinary type used on broad gauge tracks. The dago was at the head of the train on the down trips and the return trips to the quarry were made by backing the dago, preceded by the empty cars. It was with difficulty that the cars were pushed up the steep grade by the dago. It was the custom to start with 125 pounds of steam and to stop when it dropped to 90 pounds until the pressure could be increased. On so stopping the brakeman would block the car next the dago to prevent the train from running back down the grade.

Near the quarry were the homes of men employed in various capacities by the defendant. Leading from the quarry to a point near the district schoolhouse, on the county road beyond the Southern Pacific line, was a private wagon road near to and generally parallel with defendant's railroad and crossing it at one point. Between the wagon road and defendant's railroad was a footpath. Children going to and from school and other persons were accustomed to walk along the wagon road, the footpath, and defendant's railroad. The brakeman testified that he had frequently seen children along the track, "gong down to school and coming back," and around the cars, and on the cars, and had made "them get off whenever we saw children." Defendant's superintendent testified:

> "There is a part of that track that the public use, and it is an impossibility to keep them off of it. The private road parallels the railroad track. * * * I have seen the track used by people there, both children and adults. * * * If the road happens to be muddy, the people will naturally get up on the embankment where they are out of the mud."

He further stated that he had "seen children playing about that track, and upon it"; that he had been told that children "were down there, probably trying to get on the cars, but not playing on the cars"; that Mr. Krohn, assistant superintendent, "has licked his boy whenever he has found him down there, and I have refrained from telling Mr. Sandberg, because I knew that Mr. Sandberg licked his boy very severely, and knowing the child as well as I did, I felt that I should not tell his father, because it meant quite a licking for the boy"; that he had warned the brakeman and engineer to keep the children off the cars, to "put them off, and warn them off, and keep them off"; and that "everybody knew Jim Beach, and Jim is a man who is very easy going and the fact of the matter is it would have taken Jim Beach and Toughy (the engineer) constantly putting children off the car if they would allow them down there at all." One witness for the plaintiff testified that he had frequently seen children walking along the track and on two occasions saw them on the cars. Another witness testified that she had seen children walking along the track many times, and had many times seen them riding on the cars. A schoolgirl testified that she had seen boys riding on the train on several occasions, some of them on the dago and others on the cars, and that she had seen children playing along the track "pretty often." Another schoolgirl testified that she had seen children playing about the track and cars "pretty nearly every day." A schoolboy testified that he had seen children playing on the track and cars "about five or six times." The plaintiff testified that he did not know and had never been informed that his son played on the track or the cars; that he had told the boy not to go on the track or the cars; that he had seen "lots of other boys walking back and forth the track." Mrs. Sandberg testified that she had never heard of her boy riding on the cars, but had seen him thereon once with other boys and that the brakeman was with them, "but did not tell the boys to get off," and that she said to the brakeman: "Please always keep my child off these cars;" and that she frequently told her boy not to go on the cars.

The plaintiff and his wife and their only child, Sulo, who was of the age of 8 years 8 months and 15 days, lived in one of the cottages near the quarry. Plaintiff was a stonecutter in the quarry, and his wife performed domestic service in the family of defendant's superintendent. Billy Krohn, a boy of about 7 years at the time of the accident, is a son of defendant's assistant superintendent. Sulo and Billy were chums. On the morning of the fatal accident the boys left their homes together to set some ice cream caps which were being given away at a store beyond the schoolhouse. What occurred thereafter must be told piecemeal as gathered from the testimony of a number of witnesses. Billy was not called as a witness by either party. His father and mother were witnesses for the defendant. Beach testified that as the train, the two cars loaded, approached the Southern Pacific line, he saw the two boys trying to climb on the rear car, but that they did not succeed. The engineer testified that the boys were on the dago when it was standing at the Southern Pacific platform, and that he "had to get down and push them off," that Sulo thereupon "told me to go to hell and mind my own business," and that on former occasions Sulo had made similar replies when warned to stay away and had thrown stones at the witness. One witness testified that on the morning of the accident she saw the boys riding down on one of the cars; that later she saw the boys riding back towards the quarry on the dago, and that the engineer was about a foot away from them, but that she did not watch them long. One of the schoolgirls hereinabove mentioned testified that she saw the boys riding down on the cars and saw them again walking about a yard ahead of the train as it was returning towards the quarry. Another witness, a boy of 10 years testified that he saw Sulo and Billy riding on the first car going up the grade; that they threw stones at him from the car "for fun"; that they jumped off the car and on again "a couple of times"; and that the boys were on the car all the way up the hill until the train went around a curve into a cut, in which the accident occurred. The engineer's view of the cars and the track up the grade was obstructed by an upright boiler on the dago and an oil tank on one side thereof and a water tank on the other. The brakeman sat on the front, or downgrade, end of the dago, about 5 feet lower than the engineer, facing down the track. The brakeman testified that neither the engineer nor himself was "in a position to see the track ahead of the flat car," or "whether those boys were on the cars or not." It thus appears that those in charge of the train backed it up the grade without maintaining any more effective lookout in the direction in which it was moving than if they had been blindfolded. When the train was in the aforesaid cut the brakeman left his position on the dago for the purpose of blocking one of the cars, and as he reached the end of the car next the dago he "saw that boy come over from under the axle" of the other car, the "second axle from the end" which was towards the quarry. The car wheel had passed over the boy's right shoulder and right leg, causing injuries from which he died three hours later. The brakeman testified that Billy was about 50 yards up the track, "coming down towards us" at the time of the accident. The engineer testified that Billy was about 25 feet up the track. Sulo was an "exceptionally" bright boy in school. He was making two grades in one year and had just been promoted from the third to the fourth grade.

[1] Appellant contends that Sulo was a trespasser, and that therefore it owed him no duty "except that of not wantonly or willfully injuring him." Under all the foregoing circumstances it might be argued with much plausibility that defendant's act of blindly backing its train up the track in reckless disregard of consequences was wanton. "Wantonness may exist without intent to injure." Kramm v. Stockton Electric R. R. Co., 3 Cal. App. 606, 618, 86 Pac. 738, 903. The case was tried, however, on the theory that the doctrine of the turntable cases, or the attractive nuisance doctrine, is applicable. Appellant urges that the facts of this case do not bring it within that doctrine. Since the doctrine has been approved in some states and repudiated in others, there are numerous cases on both sides of the question. Counsel for the respective parties have cited some 350 of these cases, but it is unnecessary to review any considerable number of them. A few clear definitions of the doctrine will go far towards the solution of the question.

In United Zinc & Chemical Co. v. Britt, 258 U. S. 268, 42 Sup. Ct. 299, 66 L. Ed. 615, Mr. Justice Clarke said:

> "The courts of our country have sharply divided as to the principles of law applicable to 'attractive nuisance' cases. * * * At the head of one group * * * has stood the Supreme Court of the United States, applying what has been designated as the 'humane' doctrine. Quite distinctly the courts of Massachusetts have stood at the head of the other group, applying what has been designated as a 'hard doctrine'—the 'Draconian doctrine.' * * * In 1873, in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. Ed. 745, this court in a turntable case, in a unanimous decision, strongly approved the doctrine that he who places upon his land, where children of tender years are likely to go, a construction or agency, in its nature attractive, and therefore a temptation to such children, is culpably negligent if he does not take reasonable care to keep them away, or to see that such dangerous thing is so guarded that they will not be injured by it when following the instincts and impulses of childhood, of which all mankind has notice."

In Cahill v. Stone & Co., 153 Cal. 571, 574, 96 Pac. 84, 85 (19 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1094) it is said:

> "One who places an attractive but dangerous contrivance in a place frequented by children, and knowing, or having reason to believe, that children will be attracted to it and subjected to injury thereby, owes the duty of exercising ordinary care to prevent such injury to them, and this because he is charged with knowledge of the fact that children are likely to be attracted thereto and are usually unable to foresee, comprehend, and avoid the danger into which he thus knowingly allures them."

In Mattson v. Minnesota, etc., R. R. Co., 95 Minn. 477, 104 N. W. 443, 70 L. R. A. 503, 111 Am. St. Rep. 483, 5 Ann. Cas. 498, it is said:

> "One who maintains dangerous instrumentalities or appliances on his premises of a character likely to attract children in play, or permits dangerous conditions to remain thereon with the knowledge that children are in the habit of resorting thereto for amusement, is liable to a child non sui juris who is injured therefrom, even though a trespasser."

In this case the proof is wanting in nothing to bring it within the doctrine as stated in the foregoing definitions. It cannot be held that the jury's implied finding that defendant's train was an attractive instrumentality is unwarranted. Certainly a little boy, accustomed to seeing the train move back and forth daily, would be tempted to steal a ride on the slowly moving cars, with those in charge out of sight, and there being little danger, therefore, of discovery, and, even if discovered, "everybody knew Jim Beach, and Jim is a man who is very easy going." Without any additional expense, the defendant could have stationed its brakeman in a position where the cars and the track ahead would have been under his observation instead of permitting him to sit idly upon the dago while the train was being backed blindly up the grade. Plainly the engineer and brakeman did not exercise ordinary care in their operation of the train.

[2, 3] Whether Sulo was sufficiently advanced in years and intelligence to be classed as a willful trespasser and to foresee and comprehend the danger of going about and upon the moving cars, as in case of an adult person, was a question of fact to be determined by the jury. Cahill v. Stone, supra. Appellant says:

> "There was absolutely no evidence to show how Sulo got under the wheels, or how he happened to be at the place where the accident occurred. * * * No living soul knows whether he was walking, lying, or playing on the track or trying to crawl under the car to ride on the trucks."

This line of argument would have weight in a case of injury to an adult, but can have no application where an immature child has been allured into danger to his injury by the negligence of a defendant. There is ample evidence to justify the inference that the boy was injured while playing upon or about the moving car and that he would not have been there but for the failure of defendant to exercise ordinary care in the discharge of its duty to childhood. Under such circumstances the particular manner in which the accident occurred is deemed unimportant.

Appellant contends that "the doctrine of the attractive nuisance cases does not extend to railroad cars, certainly not when in motion." As applied to ordinary cases this contention may be conceded. In the case of Allred v. Pioneer Truck Co., 179 Cal. 315, 176 Pac. 455, where a boy was injured while trying to climb upon a truck which was being driven forward in the ordinary way, it was contended that the defendant's failure "to place its men in a position where they could at all times inspect all parts of the vehicle it was operating" was negligence. The court said:

> "The proposition advanced, carried to its logical conclusion, would mean that the driver of an automobile or other vehicle whose duty requires him to observe the road along which he is traveling and attend to his motive power, must be Argus-eyed or accompanied by outriders charged with the duty of seeing that small boys do not find lodgment upon the running boards or other parts of the vehicle or approach, a position of danger where they may, as in this case, fall under a wheel. The law does not impose such duty on one lawfully operating a vehicle along a public street."

The facts of the instant case are unlike those in the case cited. The train was not moving forward in the ordinary way, so that the engineer would naturally see any person on or about the track, but was being backed very slowly, the end of the car farthest away being nearly a hundred feet from the positions of the engineer and fireman, neither of whom could see the cars or the track in the direction in which they were going, and the duties of the brakeman, at least, not being such as in any manner to prevent his keeping the cars and track under his observation. These facts are similar, in principle, to those of the case of Skinner v. Knickrehm, 10 Cal. App. 596, 102 Pac. 947, in which a judgment for damages was affirmed. In that case the defendants caused a wagon to be attached to the rear of a very slowly moving house on the public street. The wagon was left unguarded and unattended, and thereby became and was attractive to young children. A child climbed upon the wagon and was thrown therefrom by the jolting thereof and injured. It does not appear to be material whether the attractive instrumentality is stationary or moving, unless the movement thereof be such as to exclude it from the terms of the doctrine. The doctrine was first applied in this state in the case of Barrett v. Southern Pacific Co., 91 Cal. 296, 27 Pac. 666, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, a turntable case. It has since been applied as follows: Cahill v. Stone & Co., supra, a push car left standing on a street car track; Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 Pac. 700, leaving loose guy wire in such position that it could be brought into contact with live wire; Skinner v. Knickrehm, supra, slowly moving wagon, unattended; Faylor v. Great Eastern Q. Min. Co., 45 Cal. App. 194, 187 Pac. 101, leaving open stope in the floors of a mining tunnel.

> "The rule, of course, is not to be confined to turntables, but applies to any attractive and dangerous machinery." Cahill v. Stone & Co., supra; Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., supra.

[4] Appellant contends that the court erred in instructing the jury. As to the general objection that the court applied the doctrine of the turntable cases, nothing further need be said. The plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury as follows:

> "If you find by a fair preponderance of the evidence that Sulo Sandberg, whose age was 8 years 8 months and 15 days when the accident occurred, was possessed of a judgment too immature to appreciate the danger in his climbing, riding, and playing upon said cars, then I charge you that it was the duty of the defendant corporation to have exercised reasonable care to prevent his so doing, providing that you find that such cars would attract an ordinarily reasonable boy of his age and that Sulo was so attracted thereto."

The court struck out the italicized words and gave the proposed instruction as so modified. As so given the instruction is erroneous. It makes the defendant liable whether the cars were attractive to children or not. In the preceding instruction, however, the court had stated that if the defendant "ought reasonably to have anticipated that the operation of the trains operated by it would entice a child of immature years, without appreciating the danger therein, and induce him to climb, ride, or play thereupon, then said corporation must be held to have anticipated that such child would be so attracted," and that, if the jury further found that Sulo was so enticed and did enter upon such cars, and that by the exercise of reasonable care the defendant could have prevented the child from going upon the cars and failed to do so, it was negligent. In a subsequent instruction it is stated that, if the engine and cars were attractive to children, that defendant knew that children frequented the place where they were operated, and that Sulo "was a child of such immature judgment that he did not know the danger of being upon or about said cars, and that he was at the time of the accident attracted to said cars," the child was not negligent. In view of all the instructions given, and the almost conclusive character of the evidence tending to show that the train, as operated, was attractive to children, it is not believed the defendant suffered any prejudice from the instruction of which complaint is made.

It is contended that the court erred in giving the following instruction:

> "If the plaintiff is entitled to recover, his recovery must be based upon the pecuniary loss suffered by himself and wife through the loss of their child. In determining the extent of this loss, you are entitled to consider the detriment suffered by plaintiff and his wife in being deprived of the services, society, comfort, and protection of their son, if any."

The objection urged is that the instruction tells the jury that the husband is entitled to recover for the pecuniary loss suffered by the wife. The proceeds of the judgment is community property, and includes the loss suffered by both the father and mother of the child. Keena v. United Railroads of S. F., 57 Cal. App. 124, 207 Pac. 35. The husband has the management and control of the community property. The instruction was a correct statement of the law.

Most of the instructions given at plaintiff's request are attacked, and it is urged that the court erred in refusing a large number proposed by defendant. It would unduly and unnecessarily lengthen this opinion to discuss them all. They have all been carefully examined, and it is believed that there is no prejudicial error in any ruling of the court relative thereto.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [5] In their petition for a rehearing, appellants reargue the question of the right of a husband to recover for the pecuniary loss suffered by his wife by reason of the death of their minor child. Section 376 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "A father, or in case of his death or desertion of his family, the mother, may maintain an action for the injury or death of a minor child, and a guardian for the injury or death of his ward, when such injury or death is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another. * * *"

Section 377 provides:

> "When the death of a person not being a minor is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death. * * *"

These sections appear in title 3 of part 2 under the heading "Parties to Civil Actions." The various sections under this title relate primarily, though not exclusively, to matters of procedure, as indicated by the heading. Section 11 of the Practice Act was identical in language with the foregoing provisions of section 376 which are not italicized. Stats. 1851, p. 52. In Kramer v. Market St. R. R. Co., 25 Cal. 435, it is said:

> "The eleventh section of the Practice Act * * * does not create a right of action where none existed before, but merely designates the persons by whom an action, for the causes therein mentioned, which then existed or might thereafter be created by statute, should be brought."

There was no right of recovery at common law for the wrongful death of a person. The first substantive law in this state imposing a liability upon a person for wrongfully causing the death of another, and giving a cause of action for damages therefor, was enacted in 1862. Section 1 thereof provided:

> "Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default, is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who, or the corporation which, would have been liable if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony." Stats. 1862, p. 447.

In adopting the Codes in 1872, section 11 of the Practice Act was re-enacted verbatim as section 376 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 377 was enacted in the language quoted herein, except that the italicized words were not included. In 1874 the italicized words appearing in both sections were added thereto. In Benjamin v. Eldridge, 50 Cal. 612, it is said that sections 376 and 377 are substantially a re-enactment of the statute of 1862 and that, under the provisions of section 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure, they must be construed as continuations of that statute, and not as new enactments. In Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 281, 113 Pac. 366, 370 (48 L. R. A. [N. S.] 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50), after pointing out the peculiar provisions of section 376, it is said:

> "These anomalies show that section 376 was not carefully or skillfully drawn and suggest that caution is necessary in its construction and application."

The statute of 1862 has never been expressly repealed. Much of the uncertainty pointed out in the Bond Case would be overcome by holding that the statute of 1862 still constitutes the substantive law relative to the subject under discussion, except as repealed by necessary implication, and that sections 376 and 377, in so far as they relate to parties plaintiff, were intended to affect the procedure merely. It is not necessary, however, to so hold in order to affirm the judgment. An examination of the provisions of section 376, viewed in the light of the history of legislation upon the subject-matter embraced therein, discloses a legislative intent to give the marital community a right of action for the death by wrongful act of a minor child. What is recovered in such a case is community property and therefore the husband, who has control of the community property, is authorized to maintain the action. If the community is destroyed by the death or desertion of the husband, then the wife may sue. In Simoneau v. Pacific Electric Ry., 159 Cal. 494, 508, 115 Pac. 320, 327, in considering a case arising under section 377, it is said:

> "It is not intended that the amount recovered shall be divided into integral or proportional parts. The persons entitled do not take as heirs or by succession, but as beneficiaries of the statute; 'the statute being framed upon the theory that the heirs will always constitute the family of the deceased.'"

In Robinson v. Western States Gas, etc., Co., 184 Cal. 401, 410, 194 Pac. 39, 43, after quoting the foregoing language of the Simoneau Case, it is said:

> "The verdict should have been given for a lump sum to all the plaintiffs, including, of course, the damages to each of them."

It may be said, with equal reason, that section 376, in so far as it authorizes the husband to maintain an action for the death of a minor child, is framed upon the theory of the continuance of the marital community and that the husband is the representative thereof for the purpose of maintaining the action. There was no necessity of joining the wife as a party plaintiff.

> "A person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted." Code Civ. Proc. § 369.

The petition is denied.

RAGGIO v. RAGGIO. (Civ. 3995.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 27, 1924. Rehearing Denied April 25, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 26, 1924.)

1. Divorce ⚷295—Superior court held to have jurisdiction, after final decree, to order allowance for support of minor child, though decree did not refer to it.

Notwithstanding decree granting divorce to husband became final and was silent as to the existence of any child, superior court, on wife's application, held to have jurisdiction thereafter under Civ. Code, § 138, to make an order of allowance for support of minor child.

2. Divorce ⚷308—Orders of allowance for support of minor child became final on failure to appeal.

Orders of allowance for support of minor child became final upon failure to appeal therefrom within time prescribed by law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

After a decree of divorce was granted to Louis Raggio against Hazel Raggio, the Superior Court made special orders of allowance for support of a minor child, and Louis Raggio prayed to have such order set aside. From an order denying relief sought, he appeals. Affirmed.

Marshall A. Stutsman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. A. Stice, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. [1, 2] In May, 1912, in the superior court of Los Angeles county, an interlocutory decree was entered in this action adjudging that the plaintiff was entitled to a divorce from the defendant. The final decree of divorce was entered on December 15, 1913. Down to and including the final judgment the record contained no mention of the existence of any child of the parties to the action. In April, 1918, pursuant to an order to show cause issued at the instance of the defendant, on application for an allowance for the support of an alleged minor child of said parties, both parties appeared before the court by their attorneys and evidence was received. Thereupon the court ordered that, until the further order of the court, plaintiff pay to the defendant the sum of $1 per week for the support of "her minor child." In October, 1920, said parties again appeared before the court pursuant to an order to show cause on an application for increase of said allowance. The parties appeared by attorney and stipulated in open court that said allowance be increased to $10 per month "for the use and benefit of the minor son mentioned in the pleadings." In December, 1921, both parties again appeared before the court personally and by attorney on an application for a further increase of said allowance, and by order of the court said allowance was increased to $20 per month "for the support of their minor son." In February, 1922, the defendant applied to the court to enter an order vacating said orders made subsequent to the entry of the final decree of divorce. Said application or motion, as nearly as we can ascertain from the record, was based upon the ground that the court was without jurisdiction to make any of said orders subsequent to the final judgment, although it further appears that counsel for appellant was seeking to attack the legitimacy of the child. The child was born on the 3d day of November, 1912.

This present appeal is an appeal by the plaintiff from the order by which the court refused to vacate several orders of allowance for the support of said child. If the court had jurisdiction to make those orders, which had become final without any appeal therefrom, it at once becomes clear that there is no merit in this appeal. Section 138 of the Civil Code provides that in actions for divorce the court, during the pendency of the action or at the final hearing or at any time thereafter during the minority of any of the children of the marriage, may make orders such as those here in question. Under this section of the Code it is settled that the court has jurisdiction to make such an order in a divorce action, even after the principal decree has become final, and even though the judgment may have contained no provision on the subject of custody, education, or support of the child or children. Malvich v. Malvich, 51 Cal. App. 303, 196 Pac. 784; Harlan v. Harlan, 154 Cal. 341, 98 Pac. 32; Lewis v. Lewis, 174 Cal. 336, 163 Pac. 42; 9 Cal. Jur. p. 806.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. VANDERBOGERT. (Cr. 1051.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1. California. March 29, 1924.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1036(1)—Evidence admitted without objection cannot be complained of on appeal.

Evidence admitted without objection cannot be complained of on appeal.

2. Criminal law 🔑1144(14)—May not presume instruction not given at defendant's request and consider objection thereto.

Where record fails to show whether instruction was given by court at its own instance or at request of either party, appellate court cannot presume it was not given at defendant's request and consider objection thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

F. W. Vanderbogert was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Buel R. Wood, M. G. Phillips, and Cooper, Collings & Shreve, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and J. L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CURTIS, J. From a judgment finding the defendant guilty of the crime of rape and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant has appealed. His main contention is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict against him. It is not necessary to review the evidence produced at the trial, for the reason that it is so clearly sufficient that a detailed statement of it would serve no good purpose whatever.

[1] Defendant further contends that much of this evidence was immaterial and that in some instances incompetent evidence was admitted against him. As no objection was made by the defendant to the admission of any of this evidence, he cannot now complain.

[2] No error was committed by the court in instructing the jury upon the defense of an alibi. The testimony of the defendant tended to show that he was in his own room alone at the time he was accused of committing the assault upon the complaining witness and this defense was therefore in effect that of an alibi. Furthermore, as counsel for appellant suggests, the record fails to show whether this instruction was given by the court at its own instance, or at the request of the prosecution, or at the request of the defendant. If given at defendant's request, he, of course, could not complain of the action of the court in giving it, and, as the record fails to show that it was not given at his request, this court cannot presume that it was so given, and therefore, cannot consider any objection thereto.

The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

KOEBERLE v. FRIGANZA et al.
(Civ. 4203.)

1. Witnesses 🔑244—Leading questions properly asked of codefendant called by plaintiff.

A codefendant, in an action for goods sold and delivered, having been sued for the whole amount and denying all liability, if properly called under Civ. Code Proc. § 2055, allowing examination of adverse parties, could be asked leading questions as in any cross-examination, and her hostility or willingness to testify was immaterial, since she was adverse to all other parties.

2. Trial 🔑54(2)—Testimony of codefendant as to amount due held admissible against other defendant.

In an action for goods sold and delivered, uncontradicted testimony of a codefendant, called by plaintiff, as an adverse party under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, in the absence of the other defendant, but under cross-examination by his counsel, was admissible to prove the amount of indebtedness regardless of section 2055.

3. Principal and agent 🔑133—Creditor electing to extend credit to agent rather than principal cannot hold principal.

A creditor extending credit solely to an agent, knowing who is the principal, and electing to hold the agent rather than the principal, cannot recover from the principal.

4. Principal and agent 🔑170(2)—Facts held to render principal liable on account contracted in agent's name.

Where an actress purchased goods for a production in her own name, requesting plaintiff to charge them to her principal, who lived in another city and had no account there, plaintiff's communication with the principal's office, and the principal's approval of the account, rendered the principal liable.

5. Account stated 🔑5—Facts held to show an account stated between parties.

An acknowledged statement from a creditor to a principal, of goods sold and delivered to an agent, constituted an "account stated" between the parties.

6. Evidence 🔑376(9)—Plaintiff's books of account held admissible on bookkeeper's testimony.

In an action on account, testimony of plaintiff's bookkeepers that plaintiff's books of account contained items as charged from actual sales slips made when each transaction occurred, that the items were the same as appeared on plaintiff's statement to defendant, and testimony of a codefendant that she purchased each item as agent for defendant, rendered the books admissible.

7. Witnesses 🔑255(7)—Examination from a statement of copy of account held proper.

In an action on an account, examination of a codefendant from a statement or copy of the account, showing items of purchase, held proper.

8. Principal and agent 🔑195—Findings held not objectionable.

Findings against principal in action against principal and agent for goods sold held not objectionable as failing to find facts alleged in each count of the complaint, nor that the agent was not indebted to plaintiff.

9. Pleading 🔑248(6)—Amendment reducing demand to defeat new trial did not create new cause of action.

An amendment reducing the amount demanded for goods sold and on account stated, filed by court's permission, after trial, to defeat a motion for new trial, did not create a new cause of action and was favorable to defendant.

10. Pleading 🔑236(5)—Pending nonsuit motion, discretionary to permit plaintiff to amend.

Pending a motion for nonsuit, it is discretionary to permit plaintiff to amend to conform to the evidence.

11. New trial 🔑162(1)—Trial court may deny conditionally on remittitur by plaintiff.

Trial courts may deny new trials, conditioned on plaintiff remitting part of his judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Bertin A. Weyl, Judge.

Action by William Koeberle against Trixie Friganza, and Alice O'Day, as administratrix of the estate of Thomas O'Day, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and administratrix appeals. Affirmed.

Leon E. Morris, of San Francisco, and Henry L. Knoop, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Constan Jensen and Horace S. Wilson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The respondent, as assignee of J. W. Robinson Company, dry goods merchants, instituted this action against the above-named defendants for a balance claimed to be due for merchandise sold and delivered upon an open book account in September and October, 1919, and an account stated was also made the subject of a second count of the complaint, aggregating $2,148.37. The total amount for alleged purchases was $4,083.62, upon which $1,806 had been paid in cash, and defendants were credited with $129.25 for goods returned. Since the trial Thomas O'Day died, and the administratrix of his estate was substituted in his stead during the pendency of this appeal.

It appears that during the year 1919, Thomas O'Day procured from the author, one Elmer Harris, the manuscript for a theatrical production, in which he agreed to star defendant Trixie Friganza at a stipulated salary of $500 per week and 25 per cent. of the profits. O'Day resided in San Francisco, where this contract was entered into and signed by him, while Miss Friganza was to reside and conduct rehearsals at Los Angeles. The decedent did not make any of the alleged purchases in person, and had no charge account at Los Angeles; but defendant Friganza, being known and having credit with merchants in Los Angeles, purchased custumes and materials from the company for herself and members of the cast. Defendant Friganza testified that at the time of making purchases she directed that certain items of the account be sent to her personally at her address in Los Angeles, and that others be sent to Mr. O'Day at San Francisco. All the items were entered by the sales people upon sales slips in the name of Trixie Friganza, certain bills being forwarded to O'Day in the usual course of business. On October 2d, Robinson Company wired O'Day that Miss Friganza was selecting merchandise amounting to $3,000 for the production, that she requested that the same be charged to his account, and asking his approval. To this they received a reply that Mr. O'Day was absent, and the company on October 8th verified both communications by letter. October 22d, O'Day paid by check $1,000 on account, and on November 10th wrote Robinson Company of the fact, and stated:

> "A check will be sent from this office from time to time. Do not bother Miss Friganza about this account, as the account is handled entirely by this office."

He had been advised that the company's books were closed on the 25th day of each month, and wrote them requesting 90 days' credit, which was granted. Subsequently they wrote him that Miss Friganza had requested that an inclosed bill for a negligee be sent him, which had been charged to her personal account, but was used in his production. To this O'Day replied that the account he was handling for Miss Friganza was her personal account, which was being handled through his office, but that if she desired such items settled in the same manner, it was entirely satisfactory to him. On January 13, 1920, a statement was sent him showing a balance of $2,148.37, with the suggestion that it was overdue, to which he replied that Miss Friganza would close January 24th, after which time he would not "represent her," and that he was forwarding the statement to her.

The complaint herein was filed in July, 1920, against both defendants, alleging that said sales were made to them at their personal instance and request, to which the defendant O'Day answered, denying liability in any amount, and defendant Friganza denied that she had purchased merchandise of the value of $4,083.62. She alleged that she had purchased goods exclusive of those returned, reasonably worth $800, for which she had paid. She affirmatively alleged that the remainder "were not sold or delivered to this defendant by said company at her personal instance or request, or an open book account, but were sold and delivered by said J. W. Robinson Company to the defendant Thomas O'Day, this defendant acting in the purchase of said balance of said goods, wares and merchandise solely as the agent for said Thomas O'Day, and that said company well knew that this defendant was acting solely as the agent for said Thomas O'Day in the purchase of said balance of said goods, wares and merchandise, and well knew that said balance of said goods, wares and merchandise were not sold or delivered to this defendant personally."

Upon the trial the plaintiff, after ineffectual efforts to introduce the company's accounts as against defendant O'Day, called defendant Friganza pursuant to the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to which no objection was interposed on behalf of her codefendant until leading questions were propounded, whereupon objection was made by counsel for O'Day that the questions were leading, and that the witness was a willing one as to matters about which she was testifying, and that she was not an "adverse party" within the meaning and intent of that section. His objections were overruled, and the witness testified that O'Day had instructed her in Los Angeles to "go there and order the costumes for the ladies of the company and have the bill sent to me at San Francisco," and that thereafter, at San Francisco, O'Day went over the statement with her, inquiring about various items, and as to whether or not the company had overcharged; that she assured him that the prices were not unreasonable, whereupon he instructed the manager of his company to send a check on account, and stated to the witness: "I don't want you to worry your head about it any further, and it will be paid."

[1, 2] Appellant insists that the trial court erred in permitting the plaintiff to ask defendant Friganza leading questions. This contention is plainly without merit, if the right existed to call her at all. As was said in Estate of Carson, 184 Cal. 437, 447, 194 Pac. 5, 17 A. L. R. 239, section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, expressly permits just such an examination. The witness' willingness, from defendant O'Day's point of view, to testify in a manner detrimental to him, was not determinative of her status in the case, since she had been sued, like himself, for the whole indebtedness, and had by her answer denied any liability beyond her personal purchases, which she claimed to have paid. Thus she came into court as adverse, both to the plaintiff and to her codefendant. Defendant O'Day did not appear in person to testify, and defendant Friganza's testimony stands uncontradicted, and would have been competent without regard to section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure; she was vigorously cross-examined by his counsel, and the objection raised goes rather to the weight than to the admissibility of the evidence. Estate of McDonald (Cal. Sup.) 215 Pac. 545; Imperial Water Co. v. Imperial Water Dist. (Cal. App.) 217 Pac. 88. Appellant argues that the witness was more properly assuming the position of a joint plaintiff, interested in seeing the case proven against defendant O'Day; but there is nothing in the pleadings or the evidence to indicate any interest of defendant Friganza in the collection of the account. It is always the province of the trial court, and of counsel, to elicit the truth regarding any issue. Had she taken the stand in her own behalf, she would have been subject to cross-examination by the plaintiff. If the facts were as she testified, and they are not denied, she must have denied liability, and this would inevitably have demanded an explanation. Western Investment & Land Co. v. First National Bank of Denver, 64 Colo. 37, 172 Pac. 6, is cited by appellant as holding that a party appearing to the trial court not to be adverse should not be held to be within the statute, but it was there held that although a defendant who had suffered a default judgment to be taken against him might in the discretion of the court have been excluded, it was not error to admit the testimony, especially as the witness was fully cross-examined. Other authorities are cited which hold that a party so called must be an adversary, and not one maintaining the same issue; but they have no applicability to the facts before us. Moore v. May, 117 Wis. 192, 94 N. W. 45, 49, quoted in part by appellant, was an action involving some 209 defendants, members of a farmers' alliance, many of whom had previously dropped out, and certain of 120 defendants who did not answer, but admitted their liability, were called by the plaintiff as "adverse parties," and the trial court denied the answering defendants the right to cross-examine them. One of the vital issues was as to the liability of certain answering defendants who claimed they were not members of the combination, and denied that they had signed certain obligations. It was said by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin that the rulings of the trial court constituted error, and that the witnesses having defaulted, and admittedly authorized the borrowing of the money, it was for their interest to lower their own liability by shouldering some of it upon the others. It is not admitted, but is denied, that Miss Friganza ever purchased or assumed any part of the liability for the items in question, except as agent for O'Day, who had paid a portion thereof and had promised to pay the balance, instructing plaintiff not to look to her therefor. Further, a judgment against O'Day would not necessarily have absolved her from liability which under the pleadings might well have been found to exist jointly with him.

[3, 4] The same witness testified that at some time between the 16th and 19th of September she commenced purchasing for the production, and at the outset she requested of the credit manager that the costumes be charged to her name, inasmuch as Mr. O'Day was a San Francisco man, and had no account with the company, but that the bills should be forwarded to him. It is argued that, credit having been extended solely to the agent, with the knowledge of the existence of the principal, the latter cannot be held. Many authorities are cited to the principle that if a creditor, knowing the principal, elects to charge the agent and look to him as the responsible debtor, he cannot thereafter collect from the former, which is doubtless the law "when the third person knows that he is dealing with an agent and knows who is the principal, and elects to hold the agent rather than the principal." But there is no evidence that plaintiff's assignor at any time did not look to O'Day for collection. There is evidence that when the credit manager noticed the account steadily increasing to an amount in excess of $2,000, he at once communicated with O'Day's office, requesting approval of the same, which was subsequently received. Gosliner v. Grangers' Bank, 124 Cal. 225, 227, 56 Pac. 1029, cited by appellant, expressly recites that there was strong evidence tending to show that the "plaintiff did not believe that the Reeds were purchasing these goods as agents for the bank." Other authorities so cited involve contracts expressly made with the agent, as principal, all of which readily distinguish themselves without needed comment. Defendant Friganza received no bills after O'Day wrote Robinson Company.

[5] It is next insisted that no account was ever stated between Robinson Company and defendant O'Day, but as we have already indicated, on January 13, 1920, a statement in the sum of $2,148.37 was rendered to O'Day, who on January 16th acknowledged its receipt, and on October 10, 1919, an account was stated, for $3,093.37, as found by the trial court.

[6-7] It is contended that the books of account were not authenticated, and that the court erred in admitting them in evidence. Bookkeepers testified that the books contained the items as charged from actual sales slips made at the time of each transaction, that they were the same items as appeared upon the statement rendered Mr. O'Day, and defendant Friganza testified in detail to having purchased each article charged, and to having used all that were not returned in the production of which Mr. O'Day was the owner. Objection was made that counsel for plaintiff was examining Miss Friganza from a statement or copy thereof which had been offered but not received in evidence. The court ruled that the record did not show such to be the fact, and permitted the examination to proceed. However, the witness had been over the entire account with the bookkeeper of plaintiff's assignor, and she testified that she had purchased and received each item upon the date given by counsel for plaintiff. It was subsequently stipulated that the amount shown was due Robinson Company, so that the objection need not seriously be considered, but such examination under the circumstances was proper. Grant v. Dreyfus, 5 Cal. Unrep. 970, 52 Pac. 1074; People v. Lanterman, 9 Cal. App. 674, 100 Pac. 720; Carpenter v. Ashley, 16 Cal. App. 302, 116 Pac. 983.

[8] The findings recite that merchandise worth $4,083.62 was sold to defendant Friganza, of which $3,277.62 was purchased for defendant O'Day; that there had been paid by goods returned, and in cash, $1,129.25; that defendant Friganza had purchased for personal use merchandise worth $806, which she had paid in full. It was further found that on October 10, 1919, an account was stated with defendant O'Day, showing a balance of $3,093.37 due to plaintiff's assignor, of which $1,000 was paid October 22d, and judgment was rendered accordingly. Appellant's contention that the trial court did not find as to facts alleged in each count of the complaint is without merit, as is also the assertion that it failed to find that it was not true that defendant Friganza was indebted to plaintiff.

[9-11] Motion for a new trial was made, and in ruling upon the same the court announced that if the plaintiff felt advised to amend his complaint to conform to the proof by alleging that there was an account stated for $3,093.37, and that $1,000 had been paid thereon, permission would be granted to do so within ten days, and if so filed the motion would be denied. Plaintiff thereafter filed a consent that the balance demanded, $2,148.37, be reduced $55, and an order denying the motion for a new trial was entered. Appellant contends that the amendment so filed created an entirely new cause of action, but it was obviously the same cause of action for a lesser amount and was favorable to appellant. Laiblin v. San Joaquin Agricultural Corp. (Cal. App.) 213 Pac. 529. Pending a motion for nonsuit it is within the discretion of the trial court to permit the plaintiff to amend his complaint so as to conform to the evidence. Kamm v. Bank of California, 74 Cal. 191, 15 Pac. 765; Bean v. Stoneman, 104 Cal. 49, 37 Pac. 777, 38 Pac. 39; Wise v. Wakefield, 118 Cal. 110, 50 Pac. 310. The right of the trial court to deny a new trial upon condition that plaintiff remit part of a judgment is too firmly established in this state by a long list of decisions to be now questioned. "It would be almost as great a stretch of judicial authority for us to undertake to overthrow this long established practice, as it would be to undertake to dispense with a statute." Davis v. Southern Pacific Co., 98 Cal. 13, 18, 32 Pac. 646; Shaffer v. Arnaelsteen, 54 Cal. App. 719, 729, 202 Pac. 946; Bentley v. Hurlburt, 153 Cal. 796, 803, 96 Pac. 890. In the latter case it was held that the foregoing authorities constitute a complete answer to the contention that to remit an excess did not obviate the error in the original judgment. It nowhere appears that appellant was prejudiced by the entry of such order requiring modification in the absence of counsel, since there was abundant evidence warranting a judgment for the amount finally ascertained.

There are no other points requiring notice.

The judgment and order denying motion for new trial are affirmed.

Ex parte GREEN. (Cr. 782.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 27, 1924.)

1. Habeas corpus 🔑3—Appellate court will not interfere with custody of minor, pending superior court's determination of guardian's fitness.

Pending determination of question, in guardianship proceedings in superior court, as to whether mother, petitioning for writ of habeas corpus, is proper person to have care and custody of her minor child, appellate court will not interfere with superior court's jurisdiction with respect to such custody, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1747, where child's welfare can best be safeguarded by leaving her in her present home.

2. Guardian and ward 🔑8—Superior court has jurisdiction of guardianship proceedings if minor is inhabitant of county.

That residence of mother of minor is in another county than that in which guardianship proceedings by another are pending does not deprive superior court of jurisdiction, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1747, with respect to custody of such minor, it being sufficient that latter is "inhabitant" of county.

Application by Beulah Green Footman, for writ of habeas corpus, to obtain custody of Margretta Green, minor. Petition denied, and writ discharged.

Henry C. McPike, of Oakland, for petitioner.

L. G. Scott, of Sebastopol, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus, prosecuted by Beulah Green Footman to obtain the custody of her daughter, Margretta Green, a minor of the age of 14 years, now in the custody of Gretta Banks, a half-sister of petitioner. Mrs. Banks alleges in her return that she took the custody of the minor when the latter was but a few months old, "with the knowledge, consent, and approval of said Beulah Green Footman, and has ever since had the care, custody, and control of said Margretta Green, and has clothed her, provided her a home and medical attention, and with a musical, religious, and secular education at her own expense"; that, for reasons specifically alleged, petitioner "is not a fit and suitable person to have the care, custody, or control of said Margretta Green; that after attaining the age of 14 years, the minor filed in the superior court of Sonoma county her "petition joining with said Gretta Banks in the prayer that said Gretta Banks be appointed guardian of her person and estate, which cause is now pending in the superior court of Sonoma county, * * * in which said cause said Margretta Green has designated and appointed said Gretta Banks as her guardian, and requested the court to approve the same."

In the year 1920 Mrs. Banks filed in the superior court of Sonoma county her petition, praying that she be appointed guardian of the person and estate of the minor. Mrs. Footman appeared in opposition to the appointment. After a hearing, the court appointed Mrs. Banks guardian of the minor. The order of appointment was reversed by the Supreme Court. In re Green (Cal. Sup.) 221 Pac. 903. The remittitur was filed in the superior court of Sonoma county on the 28th of January, 1924. Thereafter the minor filed her aforesaid request for the appointment of Mrs. Banks as guardian. The cause is now pending in that court.

[1] Respondent contends that the minor, being of the age of 14 years, has the absolute right to nominate her guardian, who, if approved by the court, must be appointed, citing Collins v. Superior Court, 52 Cal. App. 579, 199 Pac. 352, and cases referred to therein. It is unnecessary to pass upon the merits of such contention. The question of whether petitioner herein is a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of the minor is in issue in the guardianship proceeding in the superior court of Sonoma county. Pending the determination of such issue by that court, this court will not interfere, by a writ of habeas corpus, with the custody of the minor. By the provisions of section 1747 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the superior court is vested with authority to make all necessary orders for "the temporary custody of such minor until a hearing can be had" on the petition for letters of guardianship. As said by the Supreme Court:

> "Where, under appropriate proceedings, a parent has been declared a fit and proper custodian of the person of a child, this court has been inflexible in the enforcement of the parental right. * * * But here we are not impelled to put into operation the decree of a court establishing the fitness of a parent for the custody and control of a child." In re Britt, 176 Cal. 177, 181, 167 Pac. 863, 864.

Under the circumstances of this case, the moral fitness of the mother being in issue both herein and in the guardianship proceeding, the welfare of the child is the paramount consideration, and such welfare can be safeguarded best by leaving her in the only home she has ever known, until the superior court determines the fitness of the mother.

[2] The petitioner's residence is in Alameda county. That of respondent is in Sonoma county. Petitioner urges that the mother's residence determines the residence of the minor and that, therefore, the residence of the latter is in Alameda county and that the superior court of Sonoma county has not jurisdiction of the guardianship proceeding. It is sufficient to give the superior court jurisdiction that the minor is an "inhabitant or resident" of that county. Code Civ. Proc. § 1747; Collins v. Superior Court, supra.

The petition is denied and the writ discharged.

FRESNO COUNTY v. BRIX ESTATE CO.
(S. F. 10810.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1924.)

1. Agriculture ⚷9—Boards of supervisors invested with discretion as to mode of eradication of ground squirrels.

St. 1917, p. 627, relating to eradication of ground squirrels by county horticultural commissioner, held to invest boards of supervisors with power to exercise their discretion as to whether or not they should continue to operate in eradication of these animals under their own procedure adopted under Pol. Code, §§ 4000-4325.

2. Statutes ⚷35½—Action of county board turning over to horticultural commissioner matter of exterminating squirrels before statute went into effect on referendum without effect.

Action of board of supervisors of county turning over to horticultural commissioner, from and after a certain date, matter of extermination of ground squirrels was without any effect where taken before St. 1917, p. 627, went into effect; law still being inchoate by virtue of initiative and referendum amendment (Const. art. 4, § 1, as amended in 1911).

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by the County of Fresno against the Brix Estate Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George R. Lovejoy, Dist. Atty., and John R. Fitch, Chief Deputy District Atty., both of Fresno, for appellant.

Williams & Fenstermacher, of Fresno, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court of the county of Fresno rendered in favor of the defendant after an order sustaining its demurrer to the plaintiff's amended complaint, the latter having declined to further amend. The action was one brought by the county of Fresno to establish and enforce a lien against certain property of the defendant, based upon certain expenditures made by the county horticultural commissioner of said county in the course of the eradication of certain ground squirrel pests with which the said lands of said defendant were infested, when said defendant had failed and neglected so to do, after notice requiring such action on its part had been given as required by the terms of the statute under which the said county official was purporting to act. The only question presented upon this appeal is as to whether the complaint sufficiently shows authority in said official to create and in said plaintiff to enforce said lien. In the year 1917 the state Legislature passed an act purporting to amend sections 2322 et seq. of the Political Code relating to the matter of the eradication of certain insect and animal pests injurious to trees and plants, providing for the appointment of a county horticultural commissioner in each of the several counties of the state and prescribing the powers and duties of such officials. Stats. 1917, p. 627. Prior to the enactment of this statute there had been various legislative enactments relating to the prevention of infectious diseases affecting trees, plants, vegetables, vines, and fruits and the eradication of insect pests and noxious weeds also injuriously affecting these productive growths. The earliest of these acts was that adopted in 1881 (Stats. 1881, p. 86) providing for the appointment by boards of supervisors of county horticultural commissioners, three in number, to be known as a "county board of horticultural commissioners," with powers to prevent and eradicate noxious diseases and insect pests from places where fruit trees and their products were grown and kept, to have any places infested with such diseases or pests declared to be public nuisances, to proceed with the abatement of the same, and to impose liens upon the land so infested for expenditures in the course of abating such nuisances and eradicating such pests. This act was amended in 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 413) and also in 1891 (Stats. 1891, p. 268) in certain particulars, but in which amendments the main features of the original enactment above referred to were preserved. In 1897 these former acts were revised and substantially re-enacted in a new act repealing the former acts, but preserving in the main their features providing for boards of horticultural commissions, for the eradication of fruit, vine, and vegetable diseases and insect pests, and for the creation of liens for expenditures incurred in their eradication. Stats. 1897, p. 244. In the year 1907 the statute of 1897 above referred to was codified in the form of sections 2322 et seq. of the Political Code, but without any material change in its phraseology, but in 1909 these sections of the Political Code were amended in certain material respects, chief among which was the provision substituting a single horticultural commissioner for the former board of three commissioners, and providing that such county commissioner should be appointed by the board of supervisors from a list of qualified persons certified as to their qualifications for such position by a state board of horticultural examiners to be appointed by the governor under the terms of said act. This statute transferred to the county horticultural commissioner the powers formerly exercised by the county board of horticultural commissioners, including the power to eradicate fruit, vine and vegetable insect pests and to create liens for the expense incurred therein, and for the foreclosure of such liens in the name of the county. Thus far in the history of this particular line of legislation no provision had been made therein for the eradication of such animal pests as squirrels and gophers through the action of county horticultural commissioners, but in the year 1917 the foregoing sections of the Political Code were further amended so as to include these animals among the list of pests to be eradicated by the exercise of the powers conferred upon horticultural commissioners under the provisions of said act of 1917. The particular features of said act applicable to the instant case will be hereinafter adverted to. In the meantime another line of legislation had been enacted looking to the destruction of these particular animal pests. By a statute enacted in 1870 (Stats. 1869–70, p. 316) the destruction of ground squirrels and gophers in certain counties of vided for through a bounty law, the funds for which were to be provided by taxation and were to be expended in the payment of the state, including Fresno county, was pro- bounties to those killing or causing to be destroyed these animals. The succeeding Legislature, however, amended this act so as to omit the county of Fresno from the list of counties in which it was to be in force, leaving it operative in certain other of the counties of the state. In the year 1897 this bounty law was superseded by the provisions of subdivision 26 of section 25 of the County Government Act (Stats. 1897, p. 465). By said subdivision of said section boards of supervisors of counties were empowered "to provide for the destruction of gophers, squirrels, other wild animals, noxious weeds and insects injurious to fruit or fruit trees, or vines, or vegetable or plant life." The County Government Act embracing this provision was from time to time amended in other respects, but not in respect to this subdivision thereof, and was finally and in 1907 codified into sections 4000 to 4325 of the Political Code, this particular subdivision being incorporated in hæc verba into subdivision 26 of section 4041 of said Code, where it still exists in its original form. It thus appears that when the statute of 1917 was enacted, and which by its terms added squirrels and gophers to the list of pests which might be eradicated through the exercise of the powers with which the horticultural commissioner was invested, the board of supervisors of Fresno county were already invested with power under subdivision 26 of section 4041 of the Political Code to adopt and enforce ordinances providing for the destruction of squirrels. In fact it affirmatively appears upon the face of the complaint herein that the board of supervisors of Fresno county had already exercised the said powers with which it was thus invested by the adoption and putting in operation of a local county ordinance providing a system of extermination of ground squirrels. It does not, however, appear from said complaint that the system thus adopted and put in operation by the county contemplated or provided for its enforcement through any action or exercise of authority on the part of the horticultural commissioner. On the contrary, the inference to be drawn from certain of the averments of said complaint is that it did not. In point of law such county ordinance could not so provide prior to the going into effect of the statute of 1917 for the reason that the statutes in existence prior to that time defined the powers and duties of the county horticultural commissioner, and these could not be either added to or taken away by a county ordinance. The act of 1917, as we have seen, re-enacted the provisions of sections 2322 and following of the Political Code in the form in which they had existed substantially since their amendment in 1909, with the exception of the incorporation therein of the provision adding ground squirrels and gophers to the list of pests to be eradicated by the county horticultural commissioner under the terms of said act. It thus appears that while the office of county horticultural commissioner had been in being in the county of Fresno for a time several years prior to the year 1917, that official had never, prior to the taking effect of said act, been invested with power to eradicate squirrels under and by virtue of the provisions of section 2322 and following of the Political Code. Having these conditions in mind we may now turn to the particular provisions of the act of 1917 relating to the facts of the instant case as they appear upon the face of plaintiff's amended complaint. The act of 1917 contained the following provision:

> "This act shall in no wise affect any other act or acts providing for the destruction of ground squirrels or applying to the proceedings thereunder but it is intended to and does provide the alternative system of proceedings for the extermination of ground squirrels and gophers referred to in this act; and it shall be within the discretion of the governing body of each county, city and county, city or town herein mentioned to provide for the destruction of ground squirrels whether under the provisions of this act or under the provisions of such other act or acts."

[1] It must be assumed that the Legislature in thus providing had in mind the provisions of such earlier acts of legislation as were still in force, and particularly those provisions of the County Government Act above referred to investing boards of supervisors with the power to provide their own system and procedure for the eradication of insect and vegetable and animal pests, and that it was the intention of the Legislature, expressed in the foregoing provisions in said act of 1917, to invest boards of supervisors with power to exercise their discretion as to whether they would continue to operate in the eradication of these animal and insect pests under their own procedure adopted under the provisions of the County Government Act, or to adopt and put in operation the procedure for the effectuation of such purpose provided by the act of 1917.

This assumption leads us to the crucial situation presented by the plaintiff's amended pleading in the instant case. The act of 1917 was passed by the Legislature on April 27, 1917, and was approved by the governor on May 17, 1917. The final adjournment of the session of the Legislature of 1917 occurred on said April 27, 1917. The amendment to section 1 of article 4 of the state Constitution adopted in 1911, and known as the "initiative and referendum" amendment thereto, provides that—

> "No act passed by the Legislature shall go into effect until ninety days after the final adjournment of the session of the Legislature which passed such act."

The amendment further provides that, upon the presentation to the secretary of state within 90 days after the final adjournment of the Legislature of referendum petitions in the form and with the requisite signatures of qualified electors, the secretary of state shall submit to the electors at the next succeeding general election such act and that—

> "No such act or section or part of such act shall go into effect until and unless approved by a majority of the qualified electors voting thereon."

Under and by virtue of the terms of the foregoing amendment to the Constitution the act of 1917 was not to go into effect until July 27, 1917. On July 10, 1917, the board of supervisors of the county of Fresno adopted the following resolution:

> "The 1917 Legislature having passed a law authorizing the extermination of squirrels by the county horticultural commissioner and this board having already in operation a system of extermination under a local county ordinance and it appearing that it would be to the best interest of all concerned for this county to avail itself of the state law authorizing such work to be done by the horticultural commissioner:
> "Now therefore, it is by this board ordered that the matter of exterminating squirrels within the county of Fresno be and the same is hereby turned over to the horticultural commissioner of this county from and after the 26th day of July, 1917."

[2] It would seem to be clear from our foregoing review of the legislation providing for the eradication of animal pests that the power of the board of supervisors of Fresno county to provide for the destruction of ground squirrels and gophers and for the creation of liens for the expenditures incurred therein under and in accordance with the act of 1917 did not and could not come into being until such time as the said act of 1917 itself went into effect. It is argued quite plausibly by the appellant herein that the board of supervisors under the broad powers granted to that body by the terms of subdivision 26 of section 4041 of the Political Code possessed the power to anticipate the going into effect of said act, since it was certain of going into effect upon July 27, 1917, the date upon which the resolution of the board of supervisors was itself and by its express terms to take effect. The authorities cited by the appellant and which are People v. Blanding, 63 Cal. 333, State of Nevada v. Irwin, 5 Nev. 111, People ex rel. Graham v. Inglis, 161 Ill. 256, 43 N. E. 1103, and Dunbar v. Cronin, 18 Ariz. 583, 164 Pac. 452, would seem to support its contention, provided its premise were conceded to be correct, viz., that the act of the Legislature having so far proceeded in the course of its passage and approval as to be certain of taking effect upon a particular date, the board of supervisors might anticipate that certainty by the adoption of a resolution to come within its terms, which resolution would go into effect contemporaneously with the act itself. But in the instant case this premise is not correct. The act in question, though passed by the Legislature and approved by the Governor, had not yet reached or passed the point of time when it would be certain of taking effect. It was still inchoate and prevented from taking present effect by the provisions of the referendum clause in the Constitution, and was further subject to be delayed in taking effect and even of being defeated altogether by the presentation of a referendum petition and by an adverse election. There was, therefore, no certainty of going into effect of this act at the time the board of supervisors undertook to exercise the discretion to come within its provisions which said board could only exercise when said act had become effective or when, under the cases relied upon by the appellant, it was certain to thus become effective. Such being the state of uncertainty as to when, if ever, this act was to become effective, we can find no escape from the direct application of the cases of Harrison v. Colgan, 148 Cal. 69–77, 82 Pac. 674, and Santa Cruz Water Co. v. Kron, 74 Cal. 222, 15 Pac. 772, to the status of this case as presented by the plaintiff's amended complaint. Even if it be conceded for the sake of argument that the board of supervisors of the county of Fresno were not required by the terms of the statute of 1917 to adopt any formal resolution declaring an intention to proceed thereafter in the matter of the eradication of squirrels under the provisions of said act, but that said board might manifest such determination by any other form of acquiescence in its provisions, the amended complaint herein is utterly silent as to any other formal or informal action being taken by said board other than that expressly pleaded therein and which, as we have seen, was premature. It follows that no sufficient foundation was laid in the plaintiff's pleading for the imposition of the lien which is sought therein to be established and enforced. The demurrer to said complaint was therefore properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

BAXTER v. SHANLEY-FURNESS CO.

(S. F. 10304.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 9, 1924, as Modified June 5, 1924.)

1. Statutes 🔑190—Liberal construction does not mean disregard of plain requirements of statute.

The rule of liberal construction does not mean a disregard of plain, unequivocal requirements of a statute or an enlargement or restriction of a plain provision of a written law.

2. Innkeepers 🔑11(11)—Notice held not compliance with statute concerning deposit of valuables.

Hotel company's posted notice, "Positively not responsible for any valuables unless left at hotel office," held not compliance with Civ. Code, § 1860, requiring innkeeper to post notice that he will not be liable for property unless placed in fireproof safe.

3. Bailment 🔑14(1)—Bailee for hire chargeable only with ordinary care in safeguarding bailor's property.

A depositary or bailee for hire is liable for loss of subject of bailment only when he has been guilty of some negligence; he being chargeable only with ordinary care and diligence in safeguarding his bailor's property.

4. Innkeepers 🔑11(11)—Not liable under statute as bailee for hire for loss of jewelry in absence of negligence.

Where defendant hotel company was not guilty of negligence in regard to loss of jewelry by guests, defendant as bailee for hire, under Civ. Code, § 1859, of personal property other than money, could not be charged with loss of the jewelry.

5. Innkeepers 🔑11(11)—Hotel company failing to comply with statute held liable as insurer for loss of money.

As to loss of money stolen from room of guests, hotel company which failed to comply with Civ. Code, § 1860, in regard to posting of notice, held subject to common-law liability as an insurer, notwithstanding its freedom from negligence; section 1859, limiting innkeeper's liability to that of depositary or bailee for hire as to personal property, expressly excluding money.

6. Innkeepers 🔑11(11)—Innkeeper failing to comply with statute liable as insurer.

If an innkeeper does not comply with the conditions of statutes exempting him from his common-law liability, such as Civ. Code, §§ 1859, 1860, the common-law liability as an insurer is imposed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by K. Baxter against the Shanley-Furness Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

S. Laz Lansburgh and S. Joseph Theisen, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Milton A. Nathan, of San Francisco (Thomas Maul, of Placerville, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. After a further consideration of this case since the granting of the application for a transfer and rehearing by this court after judgment of the District Court of Appeal, we are satisfied with and hereby adopt the opinion of that court herein, which was prepared by Mr. Presiding Justice Langdon, and is as follows:

"This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him in an action in which he, as assignee of the rights of Sylvia, Gertrude, and Edmond Loyal, sought to recover the reasonable value of certain jewelry and money alleged to have been taken from the apartment of his assignors while they were guests of the defendant company at a hotel in San Francisco conducted by it.

"The trial court found that on November 23, 1918, the defendant corporation conducted a hotel in San Francisco, known as the 'Continental Hotel'; that upon that date said corporation received Gertrude, Edmond, and Sylvia Loyal as guests at said hotel, for a valuable consideration; that on that date these persons were the owners and entitled to the possession of certain personal property, including money and jewelry, aggregating in value the sum of $2,629.50; that this property was brought into the hotel by Gertrude Loyal, who was the wife of Edmond Loyal and the mother of Sylvia Loyal, in an alligator hand bag, which the said Gertrude Loyal, personally, carried into her apartment. It was also found that while the personal property in dispute was in said hand bag and in the apartment of the Loyals, they admitted to their apartment as their guests two men; that while these five persons were dining in one room of the apartment, the personal property disappeared from another room of the suite. It was found that the defendant company had not carelessly nor negligently permitted the property to be stolen and that said defendant did not take or carry away the same; that the defendant at all the times mentioned kept a fireproof safe in its office at said hotel and gave notice of nonresponsibility to its guests by putting up a notice in a prominent place in said office in the following words: 'Positively not responsible for any valuables unless left at hotel office.'

"The judgment for the defendant was based upon a conclusion of law that it had duly complied with the provisions of section 1860 of the Civil Code of the State of California and was relieved, therefore, of liability; it not having contributed in any manner to the loss of the property.

[1, 2] "The question is squarely presented as to whether or not the notice found by the court to have been posted by the defendant is a sufficient compliance with section 1860 of the Civil Code to relieve the defendant of its common-law liability as a hotel keeper.

"Section 1860, Civil Code, provides: 'If an innkeeper * * * keeps a fireproof safe and gives notice to a guest, * * * either personally or by putting up a printed notice in a prominent place in the office or the room occupied by the guest, * * * that he keeps such a safe and will not be liable for money, jewelry, * * * unless placed therein, he is not liable, except so far as his own acts shall contribute thereto, for any loss of or injury to such articles, if not deposited with him to be placed therein.'

"The notice posted by the defendant contained no information that the defendant kept a fireproof safe and that guests should deposit valuables with defendant to be placed therein in order to charge it with liability therefor. The respondent argues that the liberal construction of Code sections expressly required by the Code itself demands an affirmance of this judgment. But the most extended application of the rule of liberal construction has never gone so far as to disregard plain, unequivocal requirements of a statute. As stated In re Jessup, 81 Cal. 408, 419, 22 Pac. 742, 745 (6 L. R. A. 594): '"Liberal construction" does not mean enlargement or restriction of a plain provision of a written law.'

"We are constrained to hold that under the findings the defendant has not been relieved of responsibility by virtue of the provisions of section 1860 of the Civil Code.

"Before the enactment of sections 1859 and 1860 of our Civil Code, in this state, an innkeeper was held to his common-law liability as an insurer of the goods of his guests. Mateer v. Brown, 1 Cal. 221, 52 Am. Dec. 303; Pinkerton v. Woodward, 33 Cal. 557, 91 Am. Dec. 657. Sections 1860 and 1859 of our Civil Code were enacted on the same date. Together, they were intended to relieve the innkeepers in this state of the burden of their common-law liability. Section 1859 changed that liability from that of an insurer to that of a depositary or bailee for hire as to personal property of every kind and description, 'other than money.' In addition to changing the liability to that of a depositary for hire, this section limits the same, even though the evidence shows the innkeeper to be liable under the rules applicable to such a depositary, to $100 for each trunk and its contents, $50 for each valise or traveling bag and contents, and $10 for each box, bundle, or package and contents.

"Section 1860, Civil Code, goes further than section 1859, and provides a method by which the innkeeper may relieve himself even of his liability as a depositary for hire for money, jewelry, etc., if he complies with the conditions provided therein and his guest fails to deposit such articles with him. But as we have stated, those conditions were not substantially complied with and that section cannot aid the defendant.

[3-6] "The only other question involved is whether the defendant is chargeable as a depositary for hire with the limited liability prescribed by section 1859. A depositary or bailee for hire is liable only when he has been guilty of some negligence. He is chargeable only with ordinary care and diligence in safeguarding his bailor's property. 3 R. C. L. §§ 22 and 23, p. 96. As the trial court has found that the defendant was guilty of no negligence whatsoever, it cannot be charged as a bailee for hire, in so far as the property covered by section 1859 is concerned. As to the money found by the trial court to have been lost by the plaintiff's assignors, section 1859 expressly excludes this from its operation, and section 1860, Civil Code, being inapplicable because of the defendant's failure to comply with its provisions, the plaintiff is entitled to recover for the loss of the money under the common law. If an innkeeper does not comply with the conditions of statutes exempting him from his common-law liability, the common-law liability is imposed. 14 R. C. L. § 28, p. 528. This liability is not predicated upon actual negligence, but is a liability as an insurer. Elliott on Bailments, § 108, p. 113; Mateer v. Brown, supra; Pinkerton v. Woodward, supra. The finding of the trial court that the defendant was free from negligence would not affect, therefore, this common-law liability as to the money.

"The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment upon the findings in accordance with this opinion for the amount of money found to have been lost by the plaintiff's assignors while they were guests of the defendant, with interest from the date of said loss."

RILEY, State Controller, v. HOWARD et al.

1. Limitation of actions 🔑95(1)—Failure on part of trustee and beneficiaries to set in motion machinery of Inheritance Tax Act stripped them of protection of statute.

Absolute failure or refusal on part of trustee or beneficiaries to set in motion machinery of Inheritance Tax Act or in any wise to recognize or conform to its requirements stripped them of protection which Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1, may have afforded in an action to compel payment of transfer tax on ground trust agreement was transfer in contemplation of death.

2. Taxation 🔑862 — Adoption of Inheritance Tax Act of 1905 did not disturb lien created by act of 1893.

Adoption of Inheritance Tax Act 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 374) did not in any way affect or disturb any lien created by Laws 1893, p. 193, or any amendments thereto.

3. Taxation 🔑861, 895(4)—Taxability of inheritances and devises determined by law in effect at time of transfer.

Taxability of inheritances, devises, etc., such as are provided for by inheritance tax acts, must be determined by law in effect at time transfer is made and market value thereof as of date of death of decedent.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑95(1) — Statute held not to bar action by state to compel payment of transfer tax until three years after knowledge of transfer.

Where deed of trust conveying corporate stock was executed in contemplation of death, but was not recorded, and officers of state were ignorant of existence of trust, and nothing appeared concerning trust in administration of estate of decedent, Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1, did not bar action by state to compel payment of transfer tax imposed by Inheritance Tax Act of 1893 until three years after notice by state officials of existence of trust.

5. Taxation 🔑905(1)—Action to compel payment of transfer tax held to lie though there had been no appraisement and assessment of shares of stock transferred.

In action to compel payment of transfer tax under Inheritance Tax Act of 1893 (Laws 1893, p. 193) it is no defense that amount of tax has not been ascertained for reason that there has been no appraisement and assessment of shares of capital stock transferred.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Ray L. Riley, as Controller of the State of California, in the place and stead of John S. Chambers, as Controller of the State of California, against Frederick Paxton Howard and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed as to some defendants, and reversed as to others.

Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco (H C. Lucas, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Charles W. Slack, H. S. Young, and F. A. Denicke, all of San Francisco (Chauncey S. Goodrich, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. The original petition in this proceeding was filed June 19, 1914, in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, to compel the payment of a transfer tax, as imposed by the Inheritance Tax Act of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 193) upon the right to transfer 4,995 shares of the capital stock of the Howard Investment Company, a corporation, made by Charles Webb Howard to Central Trust Company of California, a corporation, as trustee, to be held by it for the use and benefit of the several respondents herein, excepting defendants Trust Company and Investment Company. The Anglo-California Trust Company, a corporation, was, on July 2, 1912, substituted as trustee in place of Central Trust Company of California, the original trustee, and it has since continued to act as such. The action is continued in the name of Ray L. Riley, the successor in office of said John S. Chambers.

Demurrers to a third amended petition were sustained without leave to amend. The appeal therefore is from the judgment sustaining said demurrers. The grounds of demurrer are that the allegations of the petition do not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and that it appears upon the face thereof that the causes of action are barred by the provisions of section 338, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The petition sets out two causes of action. The first alleges that said Charles Webb Howard made and executed said transfer in contemplation of his death and without valuable or adequate consideration. The second cause alleges that he intended that such transfer should take effect in possession and enjoyment at and after his death and that it was also made without valuable or adequate consideration. The shares of stock transferred are alleged to have been of the value of $600,000 at the time the trust instrument was executed, to wit, October 1, 1903. The inheritance tax act in effect at that time was the act of 1893, and the act in effect at the time of the death of Charles Webb Howard, July 17, 1912, was the act of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 374), together with such amendments as had been made to each act.

By the provisions of the trust instrument 4,995 shares of the capital stock of the Howard Investment Company, held in the name and ownership of Charles Webb Howard, were by him indorsed in blank and placed in trust subject to certain covenants, agreements, and reservations. He was made the attorney in fact of the trustee, irrevocably, to vote each and all shares of stock as he might deem advisable and to give or grant the consent of or offer the opposition of said shares to any corporate act and to receive as often as declared the net amount of all dividends. Upon his death his son, Frederick Paxton Howard, if living, was to be appointed attorney in fact, irrevocably, of said trustee and to exercise, jointly with said trustee, the same powers that were conferred upon the father, Charles Webb Howard. After the death of said Howard, Sr., and while the trust continued to exist, the trustee was directed to pay to his daughter, Maud Howard, and to his son, Frederick Paxton Howard, $250 a month each. Lesser amounts were to be paid quarterly to Bertha Shafter Goodrich, Chauncey Shafter Goodrich, Elizabeth Ely Goodrich, Frances Juliana Webster Goodrich. Said trust was to terminate and be at an end upon the death of his daughter, Maud, upon which event said shares of stock were to belong to and become vested in the following persons, their heirs or assigns, in named proportions: Frederick Paxton Howard, Bertha Shafter Goodrich, Elizabeth Ely Goodrich, and Frances Juliana Webster Goodrich. Charles Webb Howard specifically reserved unto himself the power of absolute revocation and dissolution of said trust and upon such revocation all of the shares and certificates of stock were to revert to and belong to him absolutely as in his first and former estate. A written notice of revocation served upon the trustee was all that was required to terminate the trust. The trustee accepted the trust subject to this and other conditions not material to the main questions presented. Frederick Paxton Howard and Maud Howard, being lineal descendants of decedent, Charles Webb Howard, were properly eliminated from the proceeding by the ruling of the court below for the reason that the act of 1893, the law in effect at the time the transfer was made, specifically exempted from taxation a transfer made by a father to his children (Stats. 1893, p. 193). As to the other beneficiaries the allegations of the petition are that they are strangers in blood to said decedent, and this being so their interests and property are subject to a transfer tax unless the bar of the statute can be made to apply to their case or unless for other reasons their interests are not liable for a transfer tax.

Charles Webb Howard died without revoking or changing in any respect said trust instrument. His estate, amounting to $131.70, was duly probated. Some time after his death his widow, Emma Shafter Howard, brought an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against his estate and recovered judgment for her community interest, 2,497.5 shares of said stock, which have been delivered to her, leaving the remaining 2,497.5 shares in the possession of the trustee subject to delivery as provided by the terms of the trust instrument upon the death of the surviving daughter, Maud Howard. It is the claim of appellant, state controller, that the shares remaining in the hands of the trustee for the beneficiaries named in said instrument or their successors, saving and excepting the son and daughter, are subject to an inheritance or transfer tax.

The petition contains the allegation that the trust instrument was not placed upon record, but was kept by the trustee as a private document, and its existence was withheld from public notice, and the agents of the state had, therefore, no knowledge of or any means of knowing of its existence until June 21, 1911, on which day its existence became known. It is further alleged that defendants Edward F. Goodrich, Elizabeth Goodrich Whitney, James L. Whitney, Frances Goodrich Leon, and Maurice Leon were each absent from the state for a period greater than three years immediately prior to the filing of the original petition and after the cause of action herein had accrued. Section 351, Code Civ. Proc. The action, therefore, as to the absentee defendants, even if it be conceded that the provision of section 338, subd. 1, is, as claimed by respondents, applicable to their case, would not be barred upon a mere reckoning of the time which had run. In other words, if the time be computed from the day on which the absent defendants came within the state to the day on which the petition was filed, it would not amount to a full period of three years. Section 351, Code of Civil Procedure, upon this theory of the case, would stand in the way of the plea of the three years' bar of section 338, subd. 1, supra, so far as the bare question of the absence of certain of the defendants from the state is concerned.

Appellant places the state's right to maintain the action upon further grounds, which may be thus epitomized: That the statute of limitations has not and cannot run against the state's interest; that there has been no repudiation of the trust; that the trustee holds in trust property in which the state has a vested interest (Estate of Stanford, 126 Cal. 112, 54 Pac. 259, 58 Pac. 462, 45 L. R. A. 788, reaffirmed in Trippet v. State, 149 Cal. 521, 86 Pac. 1084, 8 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1210); and it has not and cannot be delivered to the beneficiaries until the death of a person in being; that the obligation of the trustee to deliver said property to the beneficiaries has not yet matured (Chambers v. Gallagher, 177 Cal. 704, 171 Pac. 931).

[1] We think the absolute failure or refusal on the part of the trustee and the beneficiaries to set in motion the machinery of the inheritance tax act, or in anywise to recognize or conform with its requirements, has stripped them of the protection which the shield of the statute may have afforded.

[2-4] Contrary to the claim of respondents, it must be announced at the outset as the law of this state, settled beyond the point of controversy, that the adoption of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1905 did not in any way affect or disturb any lien created by the act of 1893, or any amendment thereto. It has been repeatedly held by this court that the act of 1905 with its repealing clause did not operate to deprive the state of the right to collect or receive all transfer taxes accrued under the act of 1893, which had not been paid or ordered to be paid to the state at the time the repeal took effect, July 1, 1905. Estate of Martin, 153 Cal. 225, 94 Pac. 1053, and cases cited; Riley v. Havens (Cal. Sup.) 225 Pac. 275; Hunt v. Wicht, 174 Cal. 205, 162 Pac. 639, L. R. A. 1917C, 961; Chambers v. Gallagher, supra; Nickel v. State, 179 Cal. 126, 175 Pac. 641; Estate of Brix, 181 Cal. 667, 186 Pac. 135; Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 55, 204 Pac. 826. Many other authorities might be cited to the effect that the taxability of inheritances, devises, etc., such as are provided for by the several inheritance tax acts, must be determined by the law in effect at the time the transfer is made and the market value thereof as of the date of the death of the decedent. The means and mode for the collection of previously accrued and uncollected taxes were continued in force. Beginning with the act of 1893 and continuing through all subsequent acts the tax prescribed therein if not paid as provided by said acts, together with the interest thereon, "shall be and remain a lien on said property until the same is paid." (Italics ours).

This case cannot be brought within the rule announced in Chambers v. Gallagher, supra, and Chambers v. Gibson, 178 Cal. 416, 173 Pac. 752. The facts are widely different. The latter case was decided upon the authority of the former. That case involved the right of the state to recover an inheritance tax from the executor of an estate in a personal action commenced more than 12 years after distribution had been made to the heirs. The petitioner prayed that the court appoint an appraiser to appraise the property in said estate and ascertain the amount of such tax; that a citation be issued to the executor to appear before such appraiser and be examined under oath, and show cause why he should not be held chargeable for the payment of said tax, and for judgment that the executor be declared liable for the payment and directed to pay such tax to the treasurer of the county. A demurrer was sustained to the petition on the ground that the action was barred by the provisions of section 338, subd. 1, Code of Civil Procedure. The bar of said statute having run prior to the enactment of section 4 of the revised inheritance tax act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1066), which act purported to remove the bar of the statute of limitations with respect to taxes which were barred at the time of its enactment, it was held that the act could not have a retrospective effect and revive causes of action which had theretofore become barred. The court in fixing the time when the statute of limitations would commence to run in such a case used the following guarded language:

> "We do not think the provisions of the act as it stood prior to 1913 show an intent to prevent the running of the statute of limitations in favor of the executor after the distribution of the estate. The scheme of the act was that the executor should see that the taxes were paid before he had made final settlement of his estate, or within thirty days thereafter. His obligation became matured at the expiration of such thirty days at all events. The intention was that the court having charge of the administration should not order the settlement of the estate or the discharge of the executor until such tax had been paid. Nothing is said in the law regarding the operation of the statute of limitations or purporting to prevent it from running against such demand, or to differentiate it from any other matured obligation to the state. The act of 1913 expressly declaring such intent is a strong indication that the Legislature itself did not suppose that it had previously done so. Doubtless the liability of the executor, under the terms of the act, continued after the settlement of the estate, if the tax was not previously paid, and could be enforced in a proper proceeding by the district attorney for that purpose under the provisions of the act. But there is nothing in the language of the act which declares that the statute does not run against such liability, as in other cases." (Italics ours.)

By the language quoted it is clear that that case is not an authority in anywise supporting the claim that the statute of limitations has run against the state's right to compel the payment of a transfer tax on the shares of stock held by the trustee, as in the instant case, for future distribution to the beneficiaries. In other words, the trustee's obligation to the beneficiaries has not become matured. An analysis of the act cannot fail to strengthen the conviction that the tax in suit is not barred by the provisions of section 338, subdivision 1, supra. Section 1 of said act of 1893, as amended in 1903 (St. 1903, p. 268), provided that:

> "All property which shall pass, by will or by the intestate laws of this state, from any person who may die seized or possessed of the same while a resident of this state, or if such decedent was not a resident of this state at the time of death, which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this state, or any interest therein or income therefrom which shall be transferred by deed, grant, sale, or gift, made in contemplation of the death of the grantor or > bargainor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after such death, to any person or persons, or to any body politic or corporate, in trust or otherwise, or by reason whereof any person or body politic or corporate shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectancy, to any property, or to the income thereof, other than to or for the use of his or her father, mother, husband, wife, lawful issue, the wife or widow of a son, or the husband of a daughter, or any child or children adopted as such in conformity with the laws of the state of California, * * * or to any lineal descendant of such decedent born in lawful wedlock, * * * by reason whereof any such person or corporation shall become beneficially entitled in possession or expectancy, to any such property, or to the income thereof, shall be and is subject to a tax of five dollars on every hundred dollars of the market value of such property, and at a proportionate rate for any less amount, to be paid to the treasurer of the proper county, as hereinafter defined, for the use of the state; and all administrators, executors and trustees shall be liable for any and all such taxes until the same shall have been paid as hereinafter directed. * * *"

Section 2, as amended in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 33, § 1), provided:

> "When any grant, gift, legacy, or succession upon which a tax is imposed by section one of this act shall be an estate, income, or interest for a term of years, or for life, or determinable upon any future or contingent event, or shall be a remainder, reversion, or other expectancy, real or personal, the entire property or fund by which such estate, income, or interest is supported, or of which it is a part, shall be appraised immediately after the death of the decedent, and the market value thereof determined, in the manner provided in section eleven of this act, and the tax prescribed by this act shall be immediately due and payable to the treasurer of the proper county, and, together with the interest thereon, shall be and remain a lien on said property until the same is paid; provided, that the person or persons, or body politic or corporate, beneficially interested in the property chargeable with said tax, may elect not to pay the same until they shall come into the actual possession or enjoyment of such property, and in that case such person or persons, or body politic or corporate, shall execute a bond to the people of the state of California, in a penalty of twice the amount of the tax arising upon personal estate, with such sureties as the said superior court may approve, conditioned for the payment of said tax, and interest thereon, at such time or period as they or their representatives may come into the actual possession or enjoyment of such property, which bond shall be filed in the office of the county clerk of the proper county; provided further, that such person shall make a full and verified return of such property to said court, and file the same in the office of the county clerk within one year from the death of the decedent, and within that period enter into such security, and renew the same every five years."

Section 4 of the act provided that all taxes imposed thereby, unless otherwise therein provided for, shall be due and payable at the death of the decedent, and if the same are paid within 18 months, no interest shall be charged and collected thereon, but if not so paid interest shall be charged and collected from the time said tax accrued; provided, that if said tax be paid within 6 months from the accruing thereof, a discount should be allowed and deducted therefrom. In all cases where the executors, administrators, or trustees failed to pay such tax within 18 months from the death of the decedent, they were required to give a bond for its payment together with interest. Section 5 of said act provided for the modification of the imposition of the extreme penalty provided for in section 4 for the nonpayment of said tax by reason of claims made upon the estate, necessary litigation, or other unavoidable cause of delay, for which reason the estate cannot be settled at the end of 18 months from the death of the decedent. Section 6 makes it the duty of any administrator, executor, or trustee having in charge or trust any legacy or property for distribution, subject to said tax, to deduct the tax therefrom, or if the legacy or property be not money, he shall collect the tax thereon, upon the market value thereof, from the legatee or person entitled to such property, and he shall not deliver, or be compelled to deliver, any specific legacy or property subject to tax to any person until he shall have collected the tax thereon; but, if the estate be not in money, the executor or trustee shall make application to the superior court to make an apportionment, if the case require it, of the sum to be paid into his hand for such legatees, and for such further order relative thereto as the case may require. The act gives all executors, administrators, and trustees the power to sell so much of the property of the decedent as would enable him to pay said tax in the same manner as they may be able by law to do for the payment of debts of an estate. Section 11 provided that when the value of any inheritance or other interest subject to the payment of such tax is uncertain, the superior court in which the probate proceedings are pending, on the application of any interested person or upon his own motion, shall appoint some competent person as appraiser, as often as and whenever occasion may require, whose duty it shall be forthwith to give notice to all persons known to have or claim an interest in such property. From the report of the appraiser the court shall assess and fix the market value of all inheritances or other interest and the tax to which the same is liable, and shall immediately cause notice thereof to be given to all parties known to be interested therein.

Section 14 provided:

> "If it shall appear to the superior court, or judge thereof, that any tax accruing under this act has not been paid according to law, it shall issue a citation, citing the persons known to own any interest in or part of the property liable to the tax to appear before the court on a day certain, not more than ten weeks after the date of such citation, and show cause why said tax should not be paid. The service of such citation, and the time, manner, and proof thereof, and the hearing and determination thereon, and the enforcement of the determination or decree, shall conform to the provisions of chapter 12, of title 11, of part 3 [sections 1704 to 1724] of the Code of Civil Procedure. * * *"

By section 15 it is provided that:

> "Whenever the treasurer of any county shall have reason to believe that any tax is due and unpaid under this act, after the refusal or neglect of the persons interested in the property liable to said tax to pay the same, he shall notify the district attorney of the proper county, in writing, of such failure to pay such tax, and the district attorney so notified, if he have probable cause to believe a tax is due and unpaid, shall prosecute the proceeding in the superior court, as provided in section 14 of this act, for the enforcement and collection of such tax."

That the act has application to a trust arrangement such as the one before us is not, and, we think, cannot be, disputed. While this is true, the machinery provided by the act for its enforcement has more direct or special adaptability to the simple administration of the estates of deceased persons and to estates involving testamentary trusts than to a trust instrument not directly connected with either. The act was drawn on the theory that a disclosure or discovery of all property or interest subject to the tax would be made by appropriate proceedings to the court, and to the officers charged with the enforcement and collection of the tax, and if not brought to the attention of the proper officers by such a proceeding, that it should be brought to the attention of the court and the law officers by the trustees or beneficiaries named in the trust instrument. By section 6 it was made the duty of all trustees "having in charge or trust any legacy or property for distribution, subject to the said tax," to deduct the tax therefrom, and if "the legacy or property be not money he [executor or trustee] shall collect the tax thereon, upon the market value thereof, from the legatee or person entitled to such property, and he shall not deliver, or be compelled to deliver, any specific legacy or property subject to tax to any person until he shall have collected the tax thereon." It was also the duty of the beneficiaries of the trust, subject as such to a transfer tax, to make known that fact to the officers charged with the duty of collecting the same. The various provisions of the act to that effect are numerous and too plain to require restatement. Section 2 provided that when any grant, gift, legacy or succession upon which a tax is imposed by section 1 shall be an estate, income, or interest for a term of years or for life, or determinable upon any future or contingent event, or shall be a remainder, reversion, or other expectancy, real or personal, the entire property or fund by which the same is supported "shall be appraised immediately after the death of the decedent" and the market value thereof determined, and the tax prescribed by the act shall be "immediately due and payable to the treasurer of the proper county," etc. (Italics ours.)

Instead of paying the tax a bond may be executed by the persons or corporation beneficially interested in the property chargeable with said tax to the state conditioned for its payment with interest when they or it shall come into the actual possession or enjoyment of such property. Such person shall make a full and verified return of such property to the court and file the same in the office of the county clerk within one year from the death of the decedent and within that period enter into such security and renew the same every five years. Under such procedure the payment of the tax may be postponed for a number of years. The bar of the statute would not under such circumstances become available. The tax could not be actually paid in any case at the death of the decedent. It must first be determined by an appraisement of the property or interest which supports it, as provided by the act. By section 11 the court in which the proceedings are pending, upon the application of an interested party or upon its own motion, shall appoint an appraiser to fix the value of the property or taxable interest "as often and whenever occasion may require." This may be done notwithstanding the fact that more than three years have passed since the death of the decedent. The value of the property or interest is to be determined as of the day of death and not in reference to a subsequent day.

Chambers v. Gallagher, supra, as above pointed out, goes no further than to hold that any personal action brought against the executor more than three years after final distribution has been made is subject to the bar of the statute. That authority does not hold that the statute commenced to run immediately upon the death of the decedent. On the contrary, it was said that the executor should have seen to it that the taxes were paid before he made final settlement of his estate, or within 30 days thereafter, and the obligation to pay the taxes was held to have matured at the expiration of such 30 days in all events. In the instant case the trustee has the property in its possession, and its obligation to deliver it to the beneficiaries has not yet matured.

The estate of the decedent, Howard, as reported to the court, amounted to $131.70. Distribution was made of that amount. Neither the attention of the court nor any one else was called to the fact that a large estate, a portion of which, at least, was subject to the payment of a tax, had been transferred by deed to a trustee by a private instrument. Neither were the parties benefited thereby nor the subject-matter of the transaction brought to the attention of any court in any proceedings in which their liability to pay a tax could have been legally determined. In Chambers v. Gallagher, supra, as in all the cases cited, the parties and the subject-matter were before the court. Every fact necessary to authorize the court and the law officers to compel the payment of the taxes was known. Former Chief Justice Shaw, in delivering the opinion for the court, said that it was the intention of the act:

> "That the court having charge of the administration should not order the settlement of the estate or the discharge of the executor until such tax had been paid."

But the court having ordered the settlement of the estate, and the suit being one to compel the executor to personally make good the taxes after a long lapse of time it was concluded that the statute began to run not later than the day of the settlement of the estate. It was further said that—

> "The liability of the executor, under the terms of the act, continued after the settlement of the estate, if the tax is not previously paid, and could be enforced in a proper proceeding by the district attorney for that purpose under the provisions of the act."

Such an action, however, was subject to the bar of the statute.

It is clear upon authority that the cause of action did not accrue at the time of the death of the decedent. Whether the cause of action accrued at the time of the settlement of the estate, as held in Chambers v. Gallagher, supra, or whether under the provisions of section 4 it accrued within 18 months from the death of the decedent, as held in Ritcher v. Commonwealth, 180 Ky. 4, 201 S. W. 456, in construing a section of a statute identical with section 4, and both being proceedings in which the whole situation was before the court, would afford respondents no assistance, as the point fixed by either of those cases when the statute begins to run has not been reached by any progressive steps taken by respondents in the instant case. By their fault they have at no time initiated a proceeding by which they could claim the benefits provided by the statute. The law under such circumstances will not give them a greater benefit than they would have been entitled to had they pursued the course which it has defined. As stated before, the property subject to a tax is still in the hands of the trustee, and, both it and the interested persons having failed to set in motion the only procedure which the inheritance tax act contemplates, they will not for that reason be relieved of their legal obligations. If a will disposing of an estate subject to a tax should, innocently or with evil intent, be withheld from the records of a court for a period of three years and one day after the death of the testator, or if a person leaving a taxable estate should have been deceased for a like period before the fact of death became known, no court, we apprehend, under the act as framed, would hold that all claims to inheritance taxes were defeated by the three years' bar of the statute of limitations. This case is not distinguishable on principle from either of the above illustrations.

Our conclusion in this respect makes it unnecessary to discuss or decide the question whether the state, upon the death of the decedent, became vested with an interest in decedent's estate equal to the amount of taxes assessable against said property in the same sense that an estate vests in an heir upon the death of an ancestor, or whether the state became vested with a right, merely, to the tax. By this ruling other questions raised by respondents are also disposed of.

[5] It is the argument of respondents that no tax can exist until the amount of the tax is ascertained or determined, and, for the reason that there has been no appraisement and assessment of the shares of capital stock in the instant case, the tax never became "immediately" or "due and payable" at all. Conceding the soundness of this argument it follows that the statute of limitations has never been set in motion and petitioner's action has not become barred. Nothing, therefore, stands in the way of the state's attempt to subject the property to the processes of the law. Such is the purpose of the action.

Respondents claim a vested right to the property in suit by virtue of the trust instrument. It would make no difference, so far as the taxability of the stock herein is concerned, whether that right vested at the time of the execution of the instrument or upon the death of the decedent. There has been no moment of time since 1893 that there has not been in existence an inheritance tax act Riley v. Havens, supra. So the tax on the right to transfer must be appraised and assessed under the act of 1893 and the amendments thereto, or under the act of 1905, the act in effect at the time of the death of said decedent. If the latter act controls the matter, respondents Frederick Paxton Howard and Maud Howard might be placed in a worse position than they find themselves under the act of 1893, inasmuch as the act of 1905 provides for an imposition of a transfer tax, observing certain exemptions, upon gifts made to the children of a decedent, and the other respondents would in no wise be helped by being brought within the latter act. The fact that the trust instrument was subject to revocation by the trustor is not material, for the reason that there was no revocation made of the trust or transfer instrument.

We are of the opinion that the allegations of the petition do not state a cause of action against the Howard Investment Company. It is made a party to the action, appellant states in his brief, "because the capital stock of that corporation constitutes the trust fund upon which the state has a lien until the tax is paid." It is not alleged that that company asserts any right to or interest in said shares of stock. If such right or claim should hereafter develop, said company may be brought in as a party defendant, but upon the face of the pleading we cannot now see that respondent company is any wise interested in the result of the action.

It cannot be said as a matter of law that the pleading upon its face shows laches on the part of appellant which would be sufficient to justify the denial of the relief sought. The state was not a party to nor did it have notice of any action brought in any court in which the subject-matter of this controversy was at issue.

The judgment sustaining the demurrers without leave to amend as to Frederick Paxton Howard, Maud Howard, and the Howard Investment Company, a corporation, is affirmed. As to the remaining respondents it is reversed.

RAISCH IMPROVEMENT CO. v. ARATA.
(S. F. 10892.)

Appeal and error ⚷627(2)—Appeal dismissed for failure to file transcript in time.

Motion to dismiss appeal on ground appellant failed to file transcript upon appeal in time, as prescribed by law and rules of Supreme Court (including Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 953a) granted, notwithstanding filing of transcript pending continuance of hearing of respondent's motion for his failure to have the required certificate of the trial court supporting his motion.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Suit by the Raisch Improvement Company against Joseph Arata. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss. Motion granted, and appeal dismissed.

Archibald B. Tinning, of Martinez (R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

J. E. Manning, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The defendant appealed herein upon the judgment roll alone from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff foreclosing a street assessment lien. The matter now involved herein is a motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that appellant failed to file his transcript upon appeal in time. The judgment was entered in the lower court December 12, 1922; defendant's motion for a new trial denied January 17, 1923, and his notice of appeal therefrom was filed February 5, 1923. Thereafter he obtained successive orders from the trial judge extending his time to serve and present his proposed bill of exceptions on appeal to and including May 3, 1923, since which time no further extension has been granted. No notice under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, was ever filed here, and no draft or proposed bill or bill of exceptions was ever filed herein. October 26, 1923, the respondent served and filed notice of motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the appellant had failed to file his transcript within the time prescribed by law and the rules of this court, and accompanied the same with a certificate of the county clerk certifying to all of the facts hereinabove stated, together with affidavit of respondent's counsel to the above facts, and further to the effect that no draft or proposed bill of exceptions or bill of exceptions had been served upon respondent's counsel. The motion came on for hearing before us at the time for which it was noticed, November 5, 1923, at which time we refused to grant it, for the reason that the respondent had failed to furnish us with a certificate from the trial judge to the effect that any proceedings which may have been pending before him for the settlement of a bill of exceptions had been terminated. Counsel for respondent stated at the hearing that he had requested such a certificate from the trial judge, who declined to furnish the same, for the reason that no proceedings had been instituted before him for the settlement of a bill of exceptions or transcript. We thereupon continued the matter to the next succeeding San Francisco calendar to enable respondent to obtain and furnish such certificate. Thereafter, and on the same day, November 5, 1923, appellant filed herein his transcript upon appeal. The motion came on for hearing thereafter on March 11, 1924, at which time there was on file herein a certificate of the trial judge certifying that no proposed bill of exceptions herein had ever been presented to him for settlement or approval; that he had never been requested to settle any bill of exceptions herein; and that no notice had even been presented to him requesting a transcript of testimony; and that he had made no order for any such transcript of testimony; and that no such transcript as is provided by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, had ever been presented to him for approval, certification, or settlement. At said hearing counsel for appellant conceded that he was not entitled to be relieved from his default under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, for the reason that the six months' period therein limited had long since elapsed.

We are of the opinion that the motion to dismiss should be granted. At the time it first came on for hearing respondent was then entitled under the law and under the rules of this court to a dismissal of the appeal, in the absence of circumstances in excuse of appellant's delay. His motion would have been granted at that time but for his inability to then furnish the certificate of the trial judge above referred to, which inability was due to no fault or negligence on the part of counsel for respondent. We arrive at this conclusion the more readily by reason of the fact that we have examined the transcript, which is now on file, together with appellant's opening brief, and are of the opinion that nothing is shown therein which would justify a reversal of the judgment appealed from.

JOENS v. BAUMBACH. (Sac. 3522.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 15, 1924 Rehearing Denied June 12, 1924.)

1. Boundaries ⚷20(1)—Grant of land along highway presumed to extend to center thereof.

Where intent of grantor of land bounded by highway rests on presumption, grant will be deemed to extend to center of highway rather than edge.

2. Boundaries ⚷20(1)—Grant of land held to roadway bounding it and not to center of road.

A grant of land, describing it as fronting upon a particular reserved roadway, and also giving description by metes and bounds, held, notwithstanding the usual presumption, a conveyance up to the roadway and not to the center of it.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by John J. Joens against C. O. Baumbach. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Glen West, of Lodi, for appellant.

Levinsky & Jones, of Stockton, for respondent.

WASTE, J. Plaintiff brought this action to quiet title. Judgment was entered for the defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

Appellant and respondent are the owners of adjoining parcels of land; that of the respondent being described as lying immediately north of that belonging to the appellant. The location of the boundary line between the two properties is really the point in dispute, and the controversy involves the title to a strip of land 30 feet in width. A solution of the problem presented by the appeal depends upon the proper interpretation to be given the description contained in the deed by which appellant acquired his land. James W. McMannis was the common owner of both parcels of land. On June 2, 1902, he conveyed the land now owned by plaintiff to William T. Hughes, who, in turn, on July 11, 1919, and by deed containing the same description as in the deed to him, conveyed the property to plaintiff. The property so conveyed was designated as being in the county of San Joaquin, "and bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit: 17 acres in the southwest corner of the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 8 (8) in township three (3) north of range seven (7) east, M. D. M., more particularly described as follows: Beginning at a point on the county road 20 feet east of a line bisecting north and south said southwest quarter of section eight in equal halves; running thence easterly on the county road eight hundred and twenty-three (823) feet; thence northerly nine hundred (900) feet; thence westerly eight hundred and twenty-three (823) feet; thence southerly nine hundred (900) feet to the point of beginning, containing 17 acres more or less, and the land herein described fronts on the county road a distance of eight hundred and twenty-three (823) feet on its south line, and fronts 900 feet on a reserved roadway 40 feet wide, upon its west side."

On December 15, 1902, which was after the execution of the deed to Hughes, grantor of appellant, McMannis conveyed to Joseph Spenker, predecessor in interest of the respondent, Baumbach, who now owns the property, a parcel of land described as follows: "Commencing at the northwest corner of the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section eight (8) in township three (3) north of range seven (7) east, M. D. M., and thence east along the said section line to the northeast corner of land sold to Martha Ann Bunch Taylor by deed recorded in book A, vol. 117, at page 319, San Joaquin County Records; thence south on the westerly line of said land of said Martha Ann Bunch Taylor to the northeast corner of land sold to William T. Hughes by deed recorded in book A, vol. 125, at page 55, San Joaquin County Records; thence west along the north line of said Hughes' land to the west side of the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of said section eight (8); thence north along said west line to place of beginning; and excepting therefrom a roadway 20 feet wide along the west side of said tract of land, containing 8 acres of land, or thereabouts."

It is at once apparent that no assistance is to be derived from the deed to respondent in reaching a correct interpretation of the description of appellant's land. The references to the "county road" and "a reserved roadway" contained in the description of the land acquired and owned by appellant are made somewhat clearer by an inspection of a plat of the survey of the property of plaintiff introduced in evidence by stipulation, to show the location of these roadways. This survey discloses that there is a county road 60 feet wide immediately south of the property of appellant, and that a road 40 feet wide, spoken of by the parties as a "private roadway," is located immediately west of the lands of appellant and respondent. The survey also discloses that the south line of section 8 is the center line of the county road, and that the line "bisecting north and south said southwest quarter of section eight in equal halves," referred to in the description of appellant's land, is the center line of the private roadway. The point at issue is whether the land of the appellant is bounded on the south by the south section line which marks the center of the road, or whether the true southerly boundary line is the north line of the county road. If the land of appellant runs to the center of the roadway, the northerly 30 feet of the land claimed by him belongs to the respondent. If a correct interpretation of the description of the property fixes the north line of the county road as the southerly boundary of appellant's land, the property in dispute belongs to him. In other words if the call in appellant's deed, running "thence northerly nine hundred (900) feet," begins at the section line in the center of the county road, and the final call, running "thence southerly nine hundred (900) feet to the point of beginning," ends at the point of intersection of said line with the section line, the north boundary of appellant's land lies 30 feet south of the point where he contends it is, and where it should be if the north line of the roadway is the proper southerly boundary of his land.

[1] The respondent's contention that the section line marking the center line of the county road is the true south line of appellant's property is based upon the language of section 831 of the Civil Code to the effect that "an owner of land bounded by a road or street is presumed to own to the center of the way, but the contrary may be shown," and section 1112 of the Civil Code to the effect that "a transfer of land, bounded by a highway, passes the title of the person whose estate is transferred to the soil of the highway in front to the center thereof, unless a different intent appears from the grant." The argument of the respondent rests upon the general rule that, where a conveyance is of property abutting upon a public highway, the presumption is of an intention on the part of the grantor to convey title to the center of the highway. There can be no doubt that in those cases in which the intention of the grantor rests upon presumption the rule just stated may be applied, and that land described in a deed as bounded by a public highway or street will be considered as bounded by the center of the street, unless it clearly appears that it was intended to make the side line of the street a boundary, instead of the center. Moody v. Palmer, 50 Cal. 31. That rule, however, cannot be correctly applied in this case. The decisions of our court are to the effect that, while the presumption declared by the Codes will in all proper cases be given effect, it is one which in many ways may be rebutted, and one of the specific ways it may be rebutted is by a description by metes and bounds. Berton v. All Persons, 176 Cal. 610, 614, 170 Pac. 151.

[2] However clearly it may appear that an owner of a parcel of land holds title to the center of an adjoining roadway subject to a public easement, and that the boundary of the parcel is technically, therefore, the center of the street, in view of the fact that the owner of such land has no right to the possession or occupancy of any portion of such roadway, we are of opinion that, when a grantor describes his land, as was done in this case, as fronting on the county road, and running "thence northerly nine hundred (900) feet," it will be presumed that the grant conveys the given number of feet of land which is set apart for private use and occupancy. Earl v. Dutour, 181 Cal. 58, 60, 183 Pac. 438, 6 A. L. R. 1163. In the instant case we are aided in arriving at a solution of the problem by the descriptions in the deeds executed by McMannis, the common grantor. He did not include any part of the private roadway in the property conveyed to either Hughes or Spenker. In the deed to Hughes the private roadway was excluded by the description by metes and bounds, and in the deed to Spenker by the language "excepting therefrom a roadway twenty feet wide along the west side of said tract of land." Therefore the further description contained in the deeds from McMannis to Hughes, and Hughes to appellant, that the land fronts on the county road a distance of 823 feet on its south line, and fronts 900 feet on a reserved roadway 40 feet wide on its west side, is of material assistance in interpreting the description by metes and bounds. The land so described extended only to the easterly side of the private roadway, and that is undoubtedly what the grantors meant in using the expression "fronts * * * on a reserved roadway * * * upon its west side." The further description that the land "fronts on the county road * * * on its south line" should be given the same effect as that which is so clearly indicated by the description of the westerly front of the property. We think it clear that McMannis, in deeding to Hughes, and the latter, in deeding to appellant, intended that the property conveyed should be bounded on the south by the north line of the county road. The land of appellant commences at the north line of the county road, and extends 900 feet northerly. Consequently the title to the strip 30 feet in width, which is in dispute here, is vested in appellant.

Some evidence was introduced in the court below, on the part of respondent, tending to establish title in him by adverse possession. The 30-foot strip of land was part of a vineyard, and there was testimony that on some occasions appellant and his predecessor were in possession, and that at other times the respondent exercised rights of ownership over the property It was stipulated that each party had been assessed and paid taxes upon the land "as described in the deeds." It would seem, therefore, that in order to determine on what property the parties paid taxes it would be necessary to interpret the deeds to the property in question, which would, in effect, result in disregarding the question of adverse possession, and in relying upon the record title.

The judgment is reversed.

MILLER CREAMERY et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 4843.)

Master and servant ⟹419—Award of further compensation authorized.

Where condition of compensation claimant, whose compensation was terminated by agreement, grew steadily worse under strain of work, to which he returned on physicians' advice, until he had to remain away from work for several days in week, and physicians advised rest and medical treatment, there was such recurrence and increase of disability as authorized award of further compensation under Workmen's Compensation and Safety Act, § 20, subd. d, which changes rule of section 65, relating to grounds for rehearing, if new state of facts has developed since award, section 27 as to binding obligation of compromise settlement of rights not being applicable.

Petition by James Acker, employé, for allowance of further compensation under the Workmen's Compensation and Safety Act opposed by the Miller Creamery, employer, and the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, insurer. Further compensation awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and employer and insurer bring certiorari. Award affirmed.

Barry J. Colding and Theodore Hale, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes to us upon a writ to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission for further compensation to respondent James Acker, after an order had been made terminating compensation.

The respondent, James Acker, was an employee of Miller Creamery, working as a truck driver. He was injured in the course of his employment upon July 22, 1922, and while still suffering from the effects of this injury he was injured again in the course of his employment upon July 26, 1922. The petitioner Amsterdam Casualty Company, the insurance carrier, paid compensation to Acker in accordance with the orders of the Industrial Accident Commission up to June 9, 1923, and also furnished medical treatment to Acker, including a surgical operation and hospital care. Upon said last-mentioned date the Industrial Accident Commission made the following order:

> "Upon stipulation of the parties, it is ordered that upon payment to applicant of two weeks' additional compensation and the sum of $15 for the purchase of glasses, as prescribed in said stipulation, defendant's liability for continuing temporary disability payments under the findings and award of May 6, 1923, be and the same is hereby terminated."

This order was made upon a showing that Acker had returned to his work. On July 20, 1923, Acker petitioned the Industrial Accident Commission for an allowance of further compensation, alleging that since the termination of the compensation payments he had endeavored to work and had been steadily employed by the Miller Creamery, and that he had made every effort to continue in such employment, but his distress and pain had increased to such an extent that he had been obliged to be absent from his work for three days in the previous week and feared he would not be able to continue his duties. He requested an examination by Industrial Accident Commission physicians and an order allowing him compensation until his recovery.

A hearing was had upon this application. It was stipulated that a medical referee might be appointed at the expense of defendant to examine applicant to ascertain the nature of his present disability and report to the Commission as to the possible extent and duration of same, together with the prognosis of future treatment and recovery. After taking testimony and receiving reports from physicians, the Commission found that applicant was entitled to further medical treatment, as indicated in the report of Dr. H. L. Langnecker, and a temporary total disability compensation during the period of such medical treatment, and made its order accordingly.

The petitioners' position is that the Industrial Accident Commission acted in excess of its powers in making this supplemental award. This conclusion is reached upon the theory that the parties hereto had effected a compromise of their respective rights and that such compromise agreement is a binding obligation under the provisions of section 27 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), and the Commission has no power to impair the obligation of that contract.

On the other hand, the Commission insists that the order under review was a proper exercise of the power given it by section 20, subd. d, of said act, to "rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor, such power including the right to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate, within the limits prescribed by this act, any compensation awarded, upon the grounds that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated; provided, that no award of compensation shall be rescinded, altered or amended after two hundred forty-five weeks from the date of the injury"

The only question presented is whether section 20, subd. d, or section 27 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act applies to this case.

Petitioners rely upon the case of Georgia Casualty Co. et al. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 177 Cal. 289, 170 Pac. 625, but concede, as indeed they must, in view of the express provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, as well as the express language of the case cited, that section 20, subd. d, operates to change the rule of section 65 of the act of 1917 if a new state of facts has developed since the award, and where the disability of the person in whose favor such award is made has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated. And we think the situation in the instant case comes precisely within the provisions of section 20, subd. d, of said act. The record shows that after Acker had received medical and hospital care, his condition improved, apparently, to such an extent that the physicians advised a return to his work and he did return to it and stipulated with the petitioners that the compensation might be discontinued, and upon such stipulation an order was made terminating the compensation. Indeed it is difficult to see how such an order could have been refused at that time under the facts, even without the stipulation. Acker worked for about six weeks, and claimed in his peition for further compensation that his condition grew steadily worse under the strain of his work until he was forced to remain away from his work for several days in a week. This was, assuredly, a change in his condition—a change in the facts of the case. It was a recurrence or increase of his disability, probably due to the physical strain of his work. While resting in the hospital or his home, Acker's physical condition had been such that physicians had advised his return to work and he had acted upon this advice and the Industrial Accident Commission had acted accordingly in making its order for termination of the compensation. After six weeks of work physicians found his condition had so changed that they advised rest and medical treatment. This was clearly a recurrence of disability and a change in the condition of the applicant from the time the order terminating the compensation was made.

The award of the Industrial Accident Commission is affirmed.

Lower riparian owners, constructing and maintaining ditch across upper land under contract with owners thereof, who diverted water from ditch to their ditch on several occasions, as authorized by contract, held to have acquired no prescriptive right to use of water in river as against upper owners.

4. Contracts 🔑282—Right to cancel "satisfaction contract" may depend on whim or caprice, though question is one of operative fitness or mechanical utility.

Promisor's right to cancel "satisfaction contract" may depend entirely on his whim or caprice, though question is one of operative fitness or mechanical utility, rather than fancy, taste, sensibility, or judgment.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑156(9)—Right to cancel contract.

Under contract providing that if construction of ditch by lower owners across upper owners' land lessened latter's water supply, as shown by past experience in use thereof, which they had sole right to determine, they could terminate contract, it was immaterial, if they so determined in good faith, whether water supply was actually lessened, nor would lower owners be entitled to take water belonging to upper owners, even if latter capriciously breached contract.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑138—Riparian owners held not estopped by silence to assert rights as against lower owners.

Riparian owners, permitting construction of ditch across their land by lower owners, under contract terminable by former if, in their judgment, their water supply was lessened or impaired, held not estopped to assert riparian rights, after terminating contract on such ground by having remained silent and permitted lower owners to use water for 18 years.

7. Estoppel 🔑95—Mere silence insufficient, unless party stands by and sees other party infringing on his rights.

Mere silence will not work estoppel unless party against whom it is invoked stood by and saw other party infringing on his rights, and express or implied consent to acts done by persons asserting no adverse claim cannot be made basis for estoppel by silence.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by Norman Hall and others against E. H. Webb and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Charles C. Crouch and E. V. Winnek, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Gathered from the record, the facts of this controversy may be summarized as follows: The plaintiffs (known as the West Enders) are the owners of certain lands riparian to the San Pasqual river. The defendants are also riparian owners of lands located higher on the said river, and there are yet other owners of land (known as the East Enders) located still nearer the source of the stream. In 1898 the West Enders brought a suit against the East Enders with reference to the use of the waters of said stream, with the result that a compromise judgment was rendered whereby the use of 2,000 inches of the water of the river was divided between the parties to the suit. Neither the defendants here nor their predecessor in interest, although owning the land lying between the lands owned respectively by the West Enders and the East Enders in that litigation, were made parties thereto. The defendants, here instead of drawing their water supply directly from the river, obtained it from a cienaga located upon their land and lying closely adjacent to, and at a lower level than, the river. In 1902, which was several years after the compromise judgment was rendered in the litigation between the West Enders and the East Enders, the West Enders conceived the idea that they could obtain a greater supply of water by connecting directly with the water ditch of the East Enders, rather than by taking the water from the river after it had run in the river bed, not only past the land belonging to these defendants, but for a distance of about 3 miles in addition thereto, until it had reached a suitable point for its diversion in a ditch leading to the property of plaintiffs. To accomplish this plan it was necessary to obtain the consent of the predecessor in interest of these defendants to the construction of a ditch across his land. Accordingly an agreement was entered into between defendants' predecessor in interest as party of the first part, and the West Enders as parties of the second part. The recitals of their contract contained the following: That on the land of the party of the first part was a water supply which had a capacity of furnishing 300 inches and upwards of water for 6 hours out of every 24 hours; that the parties of the second part had a water supply taken from the river after said river left the property of the party of the first part; that the East Enders had a water ditch above the property of the party of the first part, which ditch extended down to the east line of the property of the party of the first part; that the parties of the second part desired to construct a ditch through the land of the party of the first part so that it would connect with the ditch of the East Enders; that the party of the first part desired to grant said permission, provided the construction of said ditch and the taking of said water through it would not in any way affect his said water supply. It was thereupon agreed that the ditch be constructed. The following parts of the agreement are also deemed pertinent to the present controversy:

> "And the parties of the second part also agree that they will not at any time put down to bed rock, the diverting dam at Garlock's place, or deepen the structure of the dam below the point at which it is at present constructed.
> "And the parties of the second part also agree to always keep said ditch in good repair, and also to keep said dam at Garlock's place in its present condition.
> "And the parties of the second part further agree that if the construction of said ditch should in any way lessen said water supply of the party of the first part as shown by past experience in use of said supply, of which the party of the first part, his heirs or assigns, shall have the sole right to determine, then the party of the first part, his heirs or assigns, shall have the right to notify the parties of the second part thereof, and thereupon the rights of the parties of the second part to use said ditch shall cease, and all rights of all parties under this contract shall terminate.

> "And the said party of the first part shall have the right to divert from said ditch a sufficient amount of water to irrigate, not exceeding thirty acres of land at any one time, which acreage shall participate with the other acreage of the parties of the second part pro rata. * * * And the party of the first part shall also have the right to use a pro rata of flood waters which may flow through said ditch."

It was further agreed that the party of the first part should not be liable for any damages caused to the ditch by live stock belonging to the party of the first part, also, that—

> "The parties of the second part shall have the right to conduct said water in said ditch where the same passes across the San Pasqual river in a submerged flume, but so long as said parties of the second part shall maintain an open ditch or dam to conduct said water across said river, they shall maintain it in such manner that it will not back water or sand to interfere with the reservoir of the party of the first part."

The ditch was constructed, and for a period of two or three years thereafter was used by the parties to the agreement in accordance with its provisions. The use of the ditch through the land of plaintiff's predecessor in interest, down to the point where it crossed the river, was then abandoned by the West Enders, who at that time, with the consent and permission of the party of the first part to said agreement, took their water supply directly from the river at a point on the land of the party of the first part and near the east boundary thereof.

In 1916 an extraordinary flood occurred, which resulted in filling the cienaga on the land of the party of the first part with trees, sand, and sediment, which utterly destroyed the cienaga as a source of water. In the month of February, 1920, defendants here served notice on plaintiffs terminating the easement created under the agreement of 1902. During all the time between the date of execution of the agreement and the date of the notice of termination of the easement the defendants had used "from said ditch a sufficient amount of water to irrigate not exceeding 30 acres of land at any one time," as provided by said agreement. After the said notice had been served, plaintiffs brought this action against defendants, by which plaintiffs sought to have it adjudged that defendants had no interest in the waters of the said river, nor any right to divert the same, save and except as to surplus water flowing in said stream in excess of the waters acquired by plaintiffs in the compromise judgment in the action between plaintiffs and the West Enders (and to which action defendants were not a party); and to restrain defendants from interfering with plaintiffs' use of said ditch and with their taking of water to the extent and in the manner aforesaid from said stream. Judgment went for defendants; the court thereby declaring that defendants, as owners of the lands described as belonging to them, are "entitled to all the rights of riparian owners in the flow of said stream." From that judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

[1, 2] Although there is no finding by the court on the point, it is clear from the evidence that the water in the cienaga was a part of the water of the river. Whatever water defendants took from the cienaga was the same, so far as riparian rights were concerned, as though the water had been taken directly from the river. Anaheim Union Water Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 328, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062; Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 623, 57 Pac. 585; Los Angeles v. Hunter, 156 Cal. 607, 105 Pac. 755; Montecito Valley Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 588, 77 Pac. 1113. The question therefore is whether or not the contract between the parties had any effect upon the riparian right of defendants to the water in the river; also, whether or not defendants had the power to determine that the construction of the ditch lessened defendants' "water supply." Considering the language of the contract, it purports only in the main to grant permission to plaintiffs to construct a ditch across the defendants' land. There was no attempt to directly convey to the plaintiffs any interest whatsoever in the "water supply" belonging to defendants' predecessor in interest, either as confined to the cienaga, or in his broader riparian right to water in the river. Neither are words used in the contract by which through even extremely liberal interpretation, such a result would follow. The greatest effect that can be given to the language of the contract is contained in the words of the contract itself, that "the parties of the second part (plaintiffs) may construct and maintain a ditch" over a designated route; in consideration of which right the plaintiffs bound themselves to do certain things and to allow the defendants certain privileges and immunities. In effect, a privilege was extended to the plaintiffs, to be exercised for such a length of time as might be agreeable to the defendants. It must therefore be concluded that, so far as the contract itself is concerned, plaintiffs acquired no interest in defendants' riparian rights.

[3] It is well settled that in circumstances such as are here presented no prescriptive right in the plaintiffs to the use of the water in the river could arise as against the defendants. In the first place, it is obvious that a permissive right such as was enjoyed by the plaintiffs could never ripen into a prescriptive right. Mr. Wiel, in section 587 of volume 1 of his third edition on Water Rights in the Western States, so lays down the rule and supports it by many cases, including Ball v. Kehl, 95 Cal. 606, 30 Pac. 780; Jensen v. Hunter, 5 Cal. Unrep. 83, 41 Pac. 14; Oliver v. Burnett, 10 Cal. App. 403, 102 Pac. 223; and Davis v. Martin, 157 Cal. 657, 108 Pac. 866. And in the succeeding paragraph Mr. Wiel also says that—

> "The use must 'substantially interfere' with the property right of the owner; there must be an actual invasion of his property. There must have been such a use of the water, and such damage, as would raise a presumption that complainant would not have submitted to it unless the respondent had acquired the right to so use it. The burden is on the adverse claimant to show such invasion."

In the case of Williams v. Costa, 52 Cal. App. 403, 198 Pac. 1017, where many cases are cited, the principle is laid down that the right to acquire water by prescription cannot be acquired by a lower riparian owner on a stream as against an upper riparian owner thereof. The facts of the instant case show that on several occasions during the time that the plaintiffs were taking water from the river the defendants diverted the water from the ditch of the plaintiffs to the ditch of the defendants, and the authorities appear to be to the effect that such an invasion will prevent the acquisition of the title by prescription. Authors v. Bryant, 22 Nev. 242, 38 Pac. 439; Wasatch Irr. Co. v. Fulton, 23 Utah, 466, 65 Pac. 205. But besides all this it is expressly admitted by appellants that, in view of the fact that the trial court found against the plaintiffs on the issue of prescription, the point is not urged here, and that "no such question is presented or involved upon this appeal."

[4, 5] Defendants' right to the use of the water in the river being unimpaired, either by virtue of the contract, or because of the permissive use of the water by plaintiffs over a term of years, the remaining question presented to this court has to do with defendants' cancellation of the contract, which involves only the right of plaintiffs either to maintain the ditch as originally constructed or as later used by its connection with the river proper on the lands of defendants at or near the east boundary thereof. As heretofore stated, the agreement provides that, if the construction of the ditch should in any way lessen the water supply of the defendants, as shown by past experience in the use thereof, of which lessening the defendants should have the sole right to determine, then the defendants should have the right to terminate the contract. In this connection, the findings of fact by the trial court were that the flood of 1916 lessened and impaired defendants' water supply, but that said water supply (referring to the cienaga) was in no wise lessened or impaired by any act or acts of the plaintiffs. However, the court further found that the defendants "in good faith determined that the water supply mentioned in the contract of 1902 had been lessened and impaired, and thereupon served the notices upon the plaintiffs set forth in defendants' answer." The effect of such finding is that, although the defendants honestly believed that the construction and the maintenance of the ditch by the plaintiffs had lessened defendants' water supply, as a matter of fact such was not the case. But the "water supply" of the defendants was not limited to the water which they obtained from the cienaga. Their real water supply included that which was obtained from the cienaga, but the defendants had a much wider and broader right from the river itself. So that, if the construction and the maintenance of the ditch on the lands of the defendants near the eastern boundary thereof actually had the effect of lessening defendants' water supply, as applied to the broader riparian rights of the defendants, then the "water supply" referred to in the contract was affected by reason of the plaintiffs' acts.

Considering that the riparian rights of the defendants were in no wise impaired by the terms of the contract of 1902, or by any subsequent act of the parties, the question of whether or not the defendants rightfully terminated the contract becomes merely incidental. If the defendants did not part with any interest in their riparian rights, it is of comparatively small importance whether or not plaintiffs are entitled to maintain a ditch over defendants' land. However, in that connection, appellants contend that the defendants could not capriciously determine that the effect of the construction and the maintenance of the ditch was to lessen their water supply, but that such determination must depend upon facts which caused the defendants to reach such a conclusion based in this particular instance upon "past experience in the use of said supply." The case falls within the principle governing what are sometimes called "satisfaction contracts." They are divided into two heads: (1) Where the fancy, taste, sensibility, or judgment of the promisor are involved; and (2) where the question is merely one of operative fitness or mechanical utility. As to the first class of cases, the authorities are practically uniform to the effect that the right of the promisor to cancel such a contract may depend entirely upon his whim or his caprice. Relating to the second class of contracts, it is said in 9 Cyc. p. 620, in announcing the prevailing rule, that—> "There is no good reason why in cases of operative fitness or mechanical utility the same principle of law should not be applied. Although the thing to be done may not involve the feelings, taste, sensibility, or personal opinion of the promisor, yet he, in making the contract, may not have been willing to leave his freedom of choice exposed to any contention or subject to any contingency. He is resolved to permit no right in any one else to judge for him or to pass on the wisdom or unwisdom, the justice or injustice, of his action. Such is his will. He will not enter into any bargain except upon the condition of reserving the power to do what others might regard as unreasonable. And as there is assuredly no law which prevents a person from making contracts of this kind if he chooses, the courts should not hesitate to enforce them. * * * Such a contract may be one-sided, in being dependent upon the caprice of one of the parties; it may be an unwise contract to make; but if it is entered into voluntarily, the promisee is bound, and can have no right to ask a court to alter its terms in his favor."

Counsel for appellants appear to concede that such is the law. The only contention in that regard is that in this particular case the decision of the defendants to the effect that their water supply was lessened, in order that it bind the plaintiffs, must have been founded upon "past experience in the use of said supply." But the difficulty with that argument is that the contract does not say that the defendants' conclusion in that regard must be logical or correct. The defendants' reasoning may be good, or it may be bad; but in either case it is final. The trial court found that the defendants "in good faith determined that the water supply mentioned in the contract of 1902 had been lessened and impaired; and so long as defendants in good faith, that is, honestly, reached the conclusion that the construction and the maintenance of the ditch lessened and impaired the water supply of the defendants, it is of no materiality that upon judicial inquiry it might be determined by the court, as a matter of fact, that the decision should have been to the contrary. The language of the contract here is that the defendants "have the sole right to determine" that fact, and, if the question is now to be left to any one else in the world, it injects into the contract something to which the original parties did not agree and to which, in all probability, the defendants' predecessor in interest would not have agreed. It is evident that the intent was that whether the water supply was affected by the acts of the plaintiffs was to be left to the sole determination of the predecessor in interest of the defendants or to his assigns. Having inserted such a provision in their contract, the court cannot now say that it was an unwise provision; that it was injudicious or indiscreet; that it should not have been agreed to; and therefore adjudge that the plaintiffs should be relieved therefrom. The legal rights of the parties must be ascertained and determined solely according to the provisions of their agreement. It is their contract; they are responsible for it, and they must abide by the consequences. Parlin & Orendorff Co. v. Greenville, 127 Fed. 59, 61 C. C. A. 591; Wood Machine Co. v. Smith, 50 Mich. 565, 15 N. W. 906, 45 Am. Rep. 57; Singerly v. Thayer, 108 Pa. 291, 2 Atl. 230, 56 Am. Rep. 207; McCarren v. McNulty, 7 Gray (Mass.) 139.

Even if it should be assumed that the defendants capriciously breached the contract, still such assumption would not help the plaintiffs' case. In an appropriate action the only judgment that the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover would be either damages for such breach, or relief in permitting the plaintiffs to use the ditch for conveying their own water. Certainly because the defendants failed to keep the covenant to which reference has been made would give the plaintiffs no right to take any part of the water belonging to the defendants.

[6, 7] Appellants also urge that the defendants are estopped now to assert their riparian rights because over a course of 18 years they were silent and permitted the plaintiffs to use the water as against the defendants' superior rights. But, as heretofore shown, the plaintiffs did not by their acts thereby acquire any new or additional rights. Whatever was done was with the acquiescence of the defendants, who were never called upon to disturb the plaintiffs in the exercise of the privilege thus accorded them until, in the judgment of the defendants, the water supply of the defendants was lessened or impaired. The contract was continuous in its nature; it was not limited as to time in any way. Whenever in the judgment of the defendants their water supply was affected by reason of the maintenance of the ditch, the defendants had the sole right to terminate the contract. Mere silence will not work an estoppel, except where the party against whom the estoppel is invoked has stood by and seen the other party infringing upon his rights (Crisman v. Lanterman, 149 Cal. 655, 87 Pac. 89, 117 Am. St. Rep. 167); and there never was any infringement here. No adverse claim as against defendants was ever asserted by the plaintiffs. Everything that the plaintiffs did was with the express or the implied consent of the defendants, and the plaintiffs cannot use such consent as a basis for an estoppel, on the ground that the defendants remained silent when it was their duty to speak.

No error appearing, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CITY OF REEDLEY et al.
(Civ. 2703.)

1. Constitutional law 🔑80(2) — Permit from state board of health to discharge sewage into river does not limit court's power to abate nuisance.

Permit by state board of health, authorizing city to discharge sewage effluent into river, does not authorize creation or continuance of nuisance, or limit court's power under Const. art. 6, § 5, to abate nuisance, in view of Public Health Act 1907, § 1, though section 3 provides that city may be enjoined from discharging effluent until permit has been obtained.

2. Constitutional law 🔑55 — Constitutional power to abate nuisance cannot be limited by legislative action.

Power of superior court, under Const. art. 6, § 5, to abate nuisances, can only be limited or abridged in manner provided for amending Constitution, and not by legislative action.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑838—Permit from state board of health held not to authorize pollution of stream.

Civ. Code, § 3482, providing that nothing done or maintained under express authority of statute can be deemed a nuisance, does not authorize discharge of injurious matter into public stream or empower state board of health to issue permit authorizing creation or continuance of such nuisance.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑846—Finding discharge of sewage into river was not a nuisance sustained.

In action to abate nuisance, consisting of discharge of sewage effluent into river by city, expert testimony in support of defense that effluent was rendered harmless before discharge by city's methods of treating it held sufficient to sustain finding that city was not maintaining nuisance.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1040(13), 1042(1)—Error in overruling demurrer to answer and denying motion to strike out defense held cured by finding.

Error, if any, in overruling demurrer to city's answer, in suit to enjoin discharge of sewage effluent into river as nuisance, and denying motion to strike out defense of permit by state board of health, held immaterial, in view of finding, sustained by testimony, that city was not maintaining nuisance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by the People against the City of Reedley and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. R. McKay, Dist. Atty., and H. Scott Jacobs, both of Hanford, R. Justin Miller, of Minneapolis, Minn., and F. E. Kilpatrick, of Gilroy, for the People.

C. W. Tackaberry, of Reedley, and Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This action was brought in the name of the state of California by the district attorney of Kings county to abate an alleged public nuisance. The nuisance complained of consisted of the discharge, by the city of Reedley, of sewage effluent into Kings river at a point about nine miles from where Kings river crosses the county line between the county of Kings and the county of Fresno. The action was begun in the superior court of the county of Kings and thereafter transferred to the superior court of the county of Tulare for trial.

The complaint sets forth that Kings river is a large natural stream of water having its source in the Sierra Nevada mountains and flowing in a general westerly direction through the counties of Fresno and Kings in the state of California; that a large portion of the waters of said river are diverted from the river into the numerous canals and irrigation ditches radiating from the river in different directions, and that in cases of extreme flood the excess waters of said river empty into Tulare lake; that the city of Reedley has a population of over 2,000 people and is situated on the southeasterly bank of Kings river, about 10 miles up the stream from the point where Kings river crosses the county line between Fresno and Kings counties; that for more than three years last past the city of Reedley had been, and at the time of the filing of the complaint was, discharging sewage effluent and other substances into Kings river, which substances were offensive, injurious, and dangerous to health; that said substances were polluting the waters of Kings river and rendering it unfit for use and were constituting an obstruction to the free use of property to the inhabitants of a large number of residents of Kings county living along said river; and, also, that said substances were rendering the waters of said river unfit for irrigation purposes, domestic purposes, and other purposes and uses to which said stream was naturally adapted were its waters pure and unpolluted. It is further set forth that such acts on the part of the city of Reedley are injurious to health, and will, unless restrained by the court, beget epidemics and various diseases to the great detriment of the inhabitants of Kings county.

As a defense to plaintiff's cause of action the defendants set forth that after due and regular proceedings taken and had therefor as provided by the Public Health Act, approved March 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 893), and the various amendments thereof, a permit had been issued by the state board of health authorizing said city to discharge sewage effluent into Kings river; that said permit was unrevoked and in full force and effect and, as a further and separate defense, the city of Reedley pleaded that the sewage effluent being discharged by it into the waters of Kings river had first been treated and subjected to such processes as rendered it harmless, free from deleterious substances, and in such condition as to be nowise injurious to health or tending to render the waters of said river unfit for use. The issues thus presented were tried by the court, findings made in accordance with the defenses interposed by the defendants, and judgment entered that the plaintiff take nothing by reason of its action. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and as grounds of reversal urges that the permit issued by the state board of health to the city of Reedley constitutes no defense and that the testimony is insufficient to support the findings of the court that the city of Reedley is not discharging into the waters of the Kings river substances injurious to health, etc., and is not maintaining a nuisance.

[1, 2] An examination of the authorities leads us to the conclusion that the appellant's first contention is correct, that is, that the permit by the state board of health, unrevoked at the time of the trial, is not a conclusive or absolute defense; that such a permit is only evidence that the state board of health has granted to the defendant city the privilege of discharging sewage effluent into the waters of Kings river under certain specified conditions provided for by the rules and regulations adopted by the state board of health and issued after the state board of health has satisfied itself that such sewage effluent will not be injurious. Such a permit does not authorize a city to create or continue a nuisance or in any wise limit the power of the court to abate the same in the event it finds that a nuisance exists or is being created and continued under the claimed authority of such a permit. Section 1 of the Public Health Act particularly sets forth that it is not the intent of the Legislature in passing the act to limit any of the laws of the state relating to the preservation of public health but only to supplement the same. The power of the court to abate nuisances is found in section 5, art. 6, of the Constitution, and can only be limited or abridged in the manner provided for amending the Constitution and not by legislative action. We do not think that section 3, providing that the city may be enjoined from discharging sewage effluent into the waters of any stream until the permit has first been obtained from the state board of health, tends in any manner to limit the constitutional power of the superior court to abate nuisances. It is a power given by the act of the state board of health in the exercise of its jurisdiction to conserve the health of the state to require cities to conform to all such regulations as the state board of health may deem necessary before such sewage effluent in any case may be discharged into any of the public waters of the state of California.

The powers of the superior court in relation to nuisances and in the general exercise of its jurisdiction are set forth very concisely in the concurring opinion of Justice Sloss in the case of Pacific Telephone, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, at page 690, 137 Pac. 1119, 1138 (50 L. R. A. [N. S.] 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822):

> "The courts of this state derive their powers and jurisdiction from the Constitution of the state. The constitutional jurisdiction can neither be restricted nor enlarged by legislative act. An attempt to take away from the courts judicial power conferred upon them by the Constitution, or to impose upon them judicial powers not granted or authorized to be granted by the Constitution, is void."

[3] This statement of the law is supported by a long list of authorities there cited. The defendants in connection with the first defense set out calls our attention to section 3482 of the Civil Code, which reads:

> "Nothing which is done or maintained under the express authority of a statute can be deemed a nuisance."

We do not see that this section alters the situation in any particular. It certainly does not authorize any one to discharge injurious matter into the waters of a public stream or empower the state board of health to issue a permit which would authorize any person to create a nuisance or continue a nuisance after being created. It has been held a number of times in this court that a license, permit, or franchise does not authorize the creation or maintenance of a nuisance. Voorheis v. Tidewater Southern Railway Co., 41 Cal. App. 315, 182 Pac. 797; Coats v. Atchison, 1 Cal. App. 441, 82 Pac. 640; Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 248, 13 Pac. 655, 1 Am. St. Rep. 51. Other states support the same rule. See extended note to Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. v. Mott, 98 Tex. 91, 81 S. W. 285, 70 L. R. A. 579.

[4, 5] The fact that we agree with appellant as to the inconclusiveness of the first defense set out by the defendants in their answer is by no means decisive of this case. The trial court, while it permitted the defendants' first defense, set forth in the answer, to remain as a part of the pleadings in the case and allowed the defendants to introduce testimony showing the proceedings taken and had before the state board of health and the issuance of the permit as provided for in the Public Health Act, did not base its findings and judgment thereon; that is to say, it did not stop simply with the introduction of the permit referred to herein, but allowed both the defendants and the plaintiff to introduce a great deal of testimony showing the character of the works maintained by the city of Reedley, the processes to which its sewage was subjected, and after a very full and complete admission of testimony, as to the present action of the city of Reedley, what it was doing to render the sewage effluent of the city harmless, came to the conclusion, as set forth in defendants' second defense, that the city of Reedley has not discharged into the waters of the Kings river any substance injurious to health or which prevented said waters from being safely put to any of the uses to which they were theretofore naturally adapted, and, upon these findings, drew its conclusions of law that the city of Reedley was not creating or continuing a nuisance and entered judgment denying the plaintiff's petition for an injunction. Upon the questions tendered by the defendants' second defense in their answer, much testimony is set out in the transcript. The plaintiff called as its principal witness F. E. Twining, a chemist, whose testimony tended to show that such sewage effluent was always a potential element of danger; but, as we read his testimony, we do not find anything therein going to the effect that the sewage effluent discharged by the city of Reedley into the waters of Kings river is absolutely inimical and a positive source of danger to the inhabitants using the waters of said stream in the manner and for the purposes to which it could be used were there no such sewage effluent discharged therein. The defendants, in support of the defense, that the sewage effluent of the city was first rendered harmless before being allowed to find its way to the waters of Kings river, called as witnesses Andrew M. Jensen, a civil engineer and sanitary expert; Ida May Stevens, chief bacteriologist for the bureau of communicable diseases for the state board of health; R. F. Goudey, assistant engineer in charge of the bureau of sanitary engineering of the state board of health at Berkeley, Cal.; Ralph Hilscher, a sanitary engineer and director of the bureau of sanitary engineering of the state board of health; and C. G. Gillespie, a sanitary engineer and at one time director of the state board of health. These witnesses went into the subject of sewage disposal at considerable length and explained the various processes by which obnoxious substances are rendered harmless and also the various methods of disposing of such substances. These witnesses agree that sewage farms suggested by the plaintiff as a possible means of disposal were not advisable in this case, and their testimony also is to the effect that there is no reasonable probability for a communication of diseases by the sewage effluent discharge by the city of Reedley into the waters of Kings river when it was treated as it was being treated or processed at the time of the trial.

Upon this testimony, covering a great many pages in the transcript, but, in substance and effect as above stated, the learned trial court found that the city of Reedley was not maintaining a nuisance and that the injunction should not be granted.

This being the finding of the court, and there being sufficient testimony to sustain such finding, it is wholly immaterial whether the trial court erred in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendants' answer and in denying the plaintiff's motion to strike out the defendants' first defense—that is, the defense of the certificate issued by the state board of health—because, if the city, at the time of the trial, was not maintaining a nuisance, whether the proceedings leading up to the issuance of the permit were regular or irregular, valid or void, would in no wise affect the judgment which the court should enter when it found that no present nuisance existed.

We therefore conclude that, irrespective of the first defense, the judgment of the trial court, based upon findings as just stated, showing no present nuisance, must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

BRININSTOOL et ux. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. (Civ. 4238.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 5, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹979(2)—Granting new trial on conflicting evidence discretionary.

Granting new trial on ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict, there being substantial conflict in evidence, rests so fully in discretion of trial court that its action is conclusive on appellate court, unless it appears that there has been an abuse of discretion.

2. Appeal and error ⟹979(2)—Granting new trial held not an abuse of discretion.

In action for injuries to passenger thrown from street car, action of court in granting new trial after verdict for defendant, on ground of insufficiency of evidence, held not an abuse of discretion warranting interference.

3. Appeal and error ⟹1015(2)—Test stated for determining correctness of grant of new trial for insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict.

Order granting motion for new trial upon ground that evidence is insufficient to sustain judgment will not be disturbed, where there was at trial a conflict in evidence, unless it can be said a verdict in favor of moving party would not have found sufficient legal support in evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by E. A. Brininstool and wife against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Verdict for defendant. From an order granting a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and W. R. Millar, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jones, Wilson & Stephenson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted to recover damages against the defendant for injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff Estelle O. Brininstool in attempting to board an electric street car belonging to and operated by the defendant in the city of Los Angeles. The case was tried before a jury, who rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant. Plaintiffs moved for a new trial upon all the grounds set forth in section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, except subdivision 5 thereof. The court granted the motion upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict. From this order the defendant has appealed, and now contends that the trial court was guilty of an abuse of discretion in granting this motion.

In the complaint it is alleged that, while the defendant's car was at a standstill at the usual stopping place for taking on and letting off passengers, at the corner of Hill and Fifth streets in the city of Los Angeles, the plaintiff Estelle O. Brininstool undertook to board said car for the purpose of becoming a passenger thereon, and that when she was on the lower step of said car, on her way into said car, the defendant negligently, carelessly, and suddenly started said car forward with a lurch, and she was thrown thereby from said car upon the paved street below. This allegation is denied by the defendant, and upon the decision of this issue thereby made hinges the final determination of this controversy.

In support of this allegation of the complaint plaintiffs produced four witnesses, including the said Estelle O. Brininstool, all of whom testified in substance that the car of defendant had come to a full stop before the said Estelle O. Brininstool attempted to board it, and that after she was on the lower step of the car it suddenly started up and she was thrown to the pavement. Mrs. Brininstool testified that she and Mrs. Frazier were at the northwest corner of Hill and Fifth streets waiting for the car; that the car approached the intersection of these two streets on Hill street from the north; that it first stopped a short distance north of the usual stopping place at said street intersection, on account of another car which was directly in front of it. When this second car passed down the street, the car for which the witness was waiting slowly approached the regular stopping place and came to a standstill, and the witness and Mrs. Frazier both stepped upon the first or lower step of the car for the purpose of boarding it and going to their homes. Almost immediately upon their stepping upon this first step the car started with a jerk, throwing Mrs. Frazier to the street first and then the witness. Mrs. Brininstool was corroborated in her testimony by Mrs. Frazier, whose statement of the affair agreed in all essential particulars with that of Mrs. Brininstool. Another witness, Isadore Gralla, a newsboy selling papers at this corner, testified that he saw the car come to a standstill and the ladies attempt to board it. After they got onto the lower step of the car, he turned around to sell papers, and the next thing he saw was Mrs. Frazier falling off of the car about 15 feet from the point where they started to board the car, and in about 15 feet more Mrs. Brininstool fell off. The other of the four witnesses, who testified in favor of plaintiffs, was Mrs. Moffatt. She stated that she attended a meeting with Mrs. Brininstool and Mrs. Frazier the afternoon of the accident; that she went with them to the corner of Fifth and Hill streets, where they were to take the car; that Mrs. Brininstool and Mrs. Frazier were standing waiting for the car when it approached very slowly and came to a complete stop; that when the car had stopped its rear entrance was in front of, or opposite, the point where the ladies were standing; that the ladies attempted to board it, but the bell to start the car was given "so quick that it was hard to tell how long it stopped." She further stated that on account of the traffic she did not keep her eyes upon the ladies all the time, but that immediately upon hearing the bell she looked to see where her friends were, and saw Mrs. Frazier thrown to the street and Mrs. Brininstool still on the first step of the car, and later she saw her, after she was thrown from the car, sitting in an upright position in the street. Another witness for plaintiffs was Mrs. Mary A. Rice, who gave her testimony by means of a deposition. She did not see Mrs. Brininstool or Mrs. Frazier at the time they attempted to board the car, but did see them on the step of the car and saw them fall from the car onto the street. Mrs. Frazier fell first and then Mrs. Brininstool.

Against this testimony the defendant produced four witnesses, the conductor and motorman on the car, and two passengers. These witnesses, with the exception of the motorman, testified substantially that the car did not stop at the point where Mrs. Brininstool and Mrs. Frazier attempted to board it, but that after the car had left its usual stopping place at this street intersection, and while it was in motion, Mrs. Brininstool and Mrs. Frazier attempted to board it, and that in so doing they were thrown therefrom to the street and injured. The motorman testified that he stopped the car at the regular stopping place, and that after receiving the signal to proceed he started his car slowly and in the regular way, and while moving at a very slow rate of speed down the street, he suddenly received three violent bells, very hard, and stopped his car with a jerk. From his position he could not see the ladies as they attempted to board the car, and he did not see them at any time either before or after the accident.

[1] It is apparent from this brief reference to the evidence in the case that there is a sharp and substantial conflict between the evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiffs, and that given for the defendant, upon the vital issue in the case as to whether the car from which Mrs. Brininstool was thrown had come to a full stop or was moving at the time she attempted to board it. With this testimony before it, the trial court granted plaintiff's motion for a new trial. It is well settled in this state that the action of the trial court, in granting or refusing a new trial, when there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, rests so fully in the discretion of the trial court that its action is conclusive on the appellate court, unless it appears that there has been an abuse of such discretion. Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 411, 35 Pac. 1024; Wright v. Salzberger (Cal. App.) 218 Pac. 785.

[2] It is the contention of the defendant, however, that the great weight of the evidence is in its favor, and that the order of the trial court, granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial, made under such circumstances, was an abuse of the discretion reposed in it. The fallacy of this argument lies in the assumption by defendant that it is within the province of the appellate court to pass upon the evidence and determine the weight thereof. The trial court, in granting the motion of plaintiff for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, must have necessarily concluded and found that the weight of the evidence was with the plaintiffs. This right to pass upon the evidence, as we have already shown, belongs exclusively to the trial court, and its determination thereof is controlling, not only of its action, but also of the action of this court. We are therefore unable to agree with the defendant that there was any abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in granting plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

[3] There is a further reason why the order granting a new trial must be affirmed by this court upon the ground stated in the order. The evidence of Mrs. Brininstool and Mrs. Frazier, corroborated by the other witnesses for the plaintiffs, would without question have sustained a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, and it is well established in this state that an order granting a new trial, upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the judgment, will not be disturbed, where there was at the trial a conflict in the evidence, unless it can be said that a verdict in favor of the moving party would not have found sufficient legal support in such evidence. Tweedale v. Barnett, 172 Cal. 271, 156 Pac. 483. It has also been held—

> "That the action of a trial court, in granting a new trial upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, 'is so far a matter within its discretion that, if there is any appreciable conflict in the evidence, it is not open to review.'" Otten v. Spreckels, 24 Cal. App. 251–256, 141 Pac. 224, 226.

The respondent also claims that the order of the court granting plaintiffs' motion for a new trial should be sustained on other grounds. In view of the conclusion reached by us that the order should be sustained upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, we deem it unnecessary to consider any other ground which might be advanced in support of the order.

The order granting plaintiffs' motion for a new trial is affirmed.

RUMMELSBURG et al. v. McDONALD, Sheriff, et al. (Civ. 2712.)

1. Pleading 🔑214(1)—Truth of allegation of complaint assumed on demurrer.

Truth of allegation of complaint must be assumed on demurrer.

2. Evidence 🔑418—Parol evidence admissible to determine whether contract is that of principal or agent, if doubtful.

Where reading of simple contract, such as chattel mortgage, however inartificially drawn, discloses its execution for or on behalf of principal, or intent to bind such principal, or leaves matter in doubt, parol evidence is admissible to determine whose contract it is, even if sufficiently clear to bind agent.

3. Chattel mortgages 🔑63—Affidavit of good faith held sufficient.

Affidavit of mortgagor and "H. R. of H. R. & Son, the mortgagees, in said mortgage," that it was made in good faith and without design to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, held sufficient.

4. Chattel mortgages 🔑84—Pleading 🔑192(6)—Defendants in foreclosure suit held not entitled to question sufficiency of unrecorded mortgage by demurrer.

Where complaint, in suit to foreclose mortgage, does not show that defendants, other than mortgagor, are creditors of latter or subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers, they cannot question sufficiency of mortgage by demurrer for absence of allegation that it was recorded, as provided by Civ. Code, § 2957; unrecorded mortgage being valid between parties thereto.

5. Chattel mortgages 🔑278—Burden held on defendants in foreclosure suit to set up and prove interest in mortgaged property.

In suit to foreclose mortgage, allegation of complaint that defendants, other than mortgagor claimed some interest in mortgaged property subject to mortgage, cast burden on them to set up and prove their interest.

6. Partnership 🔑199—Failure in action by, to allege publication and filing of certificate cannot be raised by special demurrer for uncertainty.

In suit to foreclose mortgage to partnership, failure of complaint to allege publication and filing of certificate of copartnership, as required by Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468, cannot be raised by special demurrer for uncertainty, but may be raised by demurrer for want of capacity to sue, or by plea in abatement.

7. Chattel mortgages 🔑277—Complaint in foreclosure suit held to sufficiently aver ownership by mortgagor.

It is disputable presumption that one exercising acts of ownership of property, as by executing mortgage on it, is owner, and allegation of such execution in complaint to foreclose is sufficient averment of ownership.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by H. Rummelsburg and another, as partners, doing business as H. Rummelsburg & Son, against J. J. McDonald, Sheriff of County of Solano, and others. From judgment for defendants McDonald and others, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Frances C. McInnis and W. U. Goodman both of Fairfield, for appellants.

Joseph M. Raines, and Theodore W. Chester, both of Fairfield, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This action was brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note and to foreclose a chattel mortgage given to secure the same. The demurrer to the complaint interposed by the defendants other than Painter was sustained, and judgment was entered in favor of the demurring defendants. This appeal is from the judgment.

In so far as material to the questions raised by this appeal, the complaint alleges that at the times mentioned therein H. Rummelsburg and R. Rummelsburg were partners, "doing business under the firm name and style of H. Rummelsburg & Son, certificate of said partnership under said name and proof of publication thereof being on file in the manner and form required by law in the office of the county clerk of the county of Solano"; that on the day they bear date the defendant Painter executed and delivered to "H. Rummelsburg & Son" the promissory note and mortgage on which the action is based; that the defendants other than Painter "claim some right, title or interest in the personal property described in the chattel mortgage above mentioned and referred to; that the claims of the defendants and each of them are subsequent to and subject to the mortgage of plaintiffs." A copy of the mortgage, containing a copy of the note, is attached to the complaint and made a part thereof.

[1, 2] Respondents contend that the chattel mortgage was not given to the plaintiff partnership, but to the individual partners. The mortgage recites that it is made "to H. Rummelsburg and Roland Rummelsburg, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of 'H. Rummelsburg & Son' * * * mortgagees," and the plural, "mortgagees," is employed throughout. If there were nothing else to indicate the intention of the parties, it might be inferred that the words "copartners, doing business," etc., are merely descriptive, but the mortgage further recites that it is given "as security for the payment to 'H. Rummelsburg & Son,' the said mortgagees." The promissory note set out therein is made payable "to the order of H. Rummelsburg & Son." The affidavit on behalf of the mortgagees is made by "H. Rummelsburg of Rummelsburg & Son, the mortgagees." The most that can be said in favor of respondents' contention is that on its face the mortgage is uncertain as to whether it was given to the partnership or to the individual partners. The complaint alleges that it was given to "H. Rummelsburg & Son." If this allegation is true, and on demurrer its truth must be assumed, then the mortgage was executed by H. Rummelsburg on behalf of and as agent of the partnership. If in their answer the defendants shall deny this allegation, parol proof will be admissible at the trial upon the issue thus raised. "The rule is well settled that, where a reading of a simple contract, however inartificially it may be drawn, discloses that it is executed for or on behalf of a principal, or discloses an intent to bind such principal, or even leaves the matter one of doubt, parol evidence may be employed to determine whose contract it is; and this even in cases where the instrument is sufficiently clear in its terms to bind the agent." S. P. Co. v. Von Schmidt Dredge Co., 118 Cal. 368, 371, 50 Pac. 650, 651; Bean v. Pioneer Mining Co., 66 Cal. 451, 6 Pac. 86, 56 Am. Rep. 106. In a case involving the question whether a promissory note was the individual note of the signers thereof or the note of the company of which they were officers, their signatures being followed by their official designations, the court said:

> "Promissory notes, like other instruments, must be given that effect which accords with the obvious intent of the parties to them." Farmers' & Mech. Bank v. Colby, 64 Cal. 352, 28 Pac. 118; McCormick v. Stockton, etc., R. R. Co., 130 Cal. 100, 104, 62 Pac. 267.

In opposition to the foregoing authorities respondents rely on the cases of Davidson v. Knox, 67 Cal. 143, 7 Pac. 413; Feder v. Epstein, 69 Cal. 456, 10 Pac. 785; Maclay Co. v. Meads, 14 Cal. App. 363, 112 Pac. 195, 113 Pac. 364; and Billings v. Finn, 55 Cal. App. 134, 202 Pac. 938. There is no inconsistency between the two lines of cases. Those cited by respondents have to do with the question of proper parties to actions and the manner of acquiring jurisdiction over defendants, matters which must be decided in accordance with what is done by a plaintiff rather than by what he intended. The cases hereinbefore reviewed involved the interpretation of contracts, questions in which the intention of the parties is the all-important consideration. Davidson v. Knox is typical of the cases cited by respondent. The defendants therein were described as "Richard F. Knox, Joseph Osborne, Samuel P. Ely, W. T. Robinson, and Philip V. R. Ely, copartners, doing business under the firm name of Knox & Osborne." Three of the defendants were served with summons. The Elys were not served. Section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that—

> "When two or more persons, associated in any business, transact such business under a common name, * * * the associates may be sued by such common name, the summons in such cases being served on one or more of the associates."

The court said:

> "We are of opinion that this is an action against the individual partners * * * and * * * the plaintiffs can only proceed against the parties served."

[3] Respondents urge that the affidavit attached to the mortgage is insufficient. The body thereof reads as follows:

> "Joseph E. Painter, the mortgagor in the foregoing mortgage named, and H. Rummelsburg of H. Rummelsburg & Son, the mortgagees, in said mortgage named, each being duly sworn, each for himself, doth depose and say: That the aforesaid mortgage is made in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay or defraud any creditor or creditors."

The affidavit is sufficient. Modesto Bank v. Owens, 121 Cal. 223, 53 Pac. 552; Alferitz v. Scott, 130 Cal. 474, 62 Pac. 735.

[4, 5] The complaint does not allege that the mortgage was recorded. Section 2957 of the Civil Code provides:

> "A mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers of the property in good faith and for value, unless * * * it is acknowledged or proved, certified, and recorded in like manner as grants of real property."

The complaint does not show that the demurring defendants are creditors of the mortgagor or subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers of the property, and therefore they cannot, by demurrer, question the sufficiency of the mortgage, which is valid between the parties thereto without being recorded. Lemon v. Wolff, 121 Cal. 272, 53 Pac. 801. The nature of the defendants' claim of interest in the mortgaged property does not appear from the allegations of the complaint. The allegation that they claim some interest therein which is subsequent and subject to plaintiffs' mortgage cast the burden upon defendants to set up and prove their interest. San Francisco Breweries v. Schurtz, 104 Cal. 420, 38 Pac. 92.

[6] It is urged that the allegation in the complaint of the publication and filing of the certificate of copartnership, as required by sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code, is insufficient. The defendants demurred on the ground that the complaint is uncertain in that it cannot be ascertained therefrom "whether or not the certificate of partnership * * * was ever published as required by law." In Spreckels v. Grace Darling Hosp. Ass'n, 28 Cal. App. 646, 153 Pac. 718, it was held that failure to allege such publication and filing cannot be raised by special demurrer for uncertainty, but may be raised by special demurrer on the ground of want of legal capacity to sue. In Holden v. Mensinger, 175 Cal. 300, 303, 165 Pac. 950, 951, it is said that such failure "merely subjects the complaint to the special defense of a plea in abatement." In Amundson v. Shafer, 36 Cal. App. 398, 400, 172 Pac. 173, 174, in which case a hearing was denied by the Supreme Court, it is said that a compliance with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 "need not appear upon the face of the complaint. If the fact be that the person maintaining such an action has not complied with the sections mentioned, the point may be presented as a defense by way of plea in abatement." In may be stated further that the demurrer herein was not sustained on the ground here urged. The order sustaining the demurrer reads as follows:

> "In the above entitled action, as to the demurrer of certain defendants directed to the point as to whether the mortgage was given to the partnership it is ordered that the said demurrer be sustained."

[7] It is urged that the complaint does not allege that Painter had any interest in the property at the time of the execution of the mortgage. In Sielbeck v. Grothman, 248 Ill. 435, 94 N. E. 67, 21 Ann. Cas. 229, it is said, although the statement is not necessary to the decision, that in a foreclosure proceeding "the bill should allege the title of the mortgagors in the mortgaged premises. 1 Wiltsie on Mortgage Foreclosures (1899 Ed.) § 276." In the section cited it is said:

> "It is not necessary to aver in so many words that the defendant has title to the mortgaged premises; it is sufficient to aver the making of the mortgage."

In Jones on Mortgages (7th Ed.) § 1454, it is said:

> "An allegation of the execution of the mortgage is also sufficient without any averment of title in the mortgagor. He is estopped by his deed from denying his title."

It is a disputable presumption:

> "That a person is the owner of property from exercising acts of ownership over it." Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 12.

In Henke v. Eureka Endowment Ass'n, 100 Cal. 429, 34 Pac. 1089, the court said:

> "The first contention of appellant is that no consideration is alleged in the complaint for the execution by defendant of the agreement upon which a recovery is sought. Section 1614 of the Civil Code provides that 'A written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration.' It is a familiar rule of pleading under our code system that every fact which a plaintiff will be called upon to prove at the trial must be averred in his complaint. It is equally a rule that presumptions of law should not, or at least need not, be stated. When the plaintiff averred in her complaint that the defendant executed a contract in writing wherein it promised, at a given date, to pay her a certain sum of money she stated facts from which the law presumed a consideration; hence it was unnecessary to aver it specially."

In this case the complaint alleges that Painter executed the mortgage in question upon the property therein described, and from the exercise of such act of ownership the law presumes, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that he was the owner of the property.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer and give the demurring defendants a reasonable time to answer.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 4, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1) — Appellate court bound by trial court's findings sustained by evidence.

The appellate court is bound by the findings of the lower court, where sustained by evidence.

2. Quieting title 🔑36—Decree not granted, where no property corresponding to description in complaint exists.

A decree quieting title will not be granted, where there is no property such as that described in the complaint.

3. Estoppel 🔑63—Defendants in suit to quiet title not estopped to claim description of property in complaint erroneous.

Defendants in suit to quiet title were not estopped from claiming that description of property was other than that contained in the complaint by having caused property to be returned for assessment purposes under such description.

4. Appeal and error 🔑757(3) — Appellate court not required to search record for evidence.

It is not incumbent on appellate court to search record for evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action to quiet title by H. B. Hunt against the Alamitos Land Company, a corporation, and others, in which defendants filed cross-complaint. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Irving McKenna and Catherine A. McKenna, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Denio & Hart, of Long Beach, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. In this action plaintiff sought a decree quieting title as against the several defendants as to a certain lot described in the complaint as lot 4 of block 82 of a survey of a certain tract. The defendants answered and set up a cross-complaint against plaintiff in which it was prayed that the title to apparently the same property, but described as lot 4 of block Z of another survey of the same tract, be quieted as against plaintiff. Judgment went for the defendants on their cross-complaint, and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

Plaintiff claimed through certain mesne conveyances originating in a tax deed, and the defendants claimed as owners both prior to and subsequent to the date of the tax deed. The identity of the property itself was not in dispute. The difficulty consisted only in a determination of whether or not it was lot 4 of block 82 or lot 4 of block Z.

Some years before the litigation here involved was instituted a decree had been granted by the superior court quieting title to plaintiff's predecessor in interest as against these defendants in lot 4, block 82. Three or four years later an attempt was made to modify that decree by changing the description of the property therein described so that it would apply to lot 4 of block Z. However, it was conceded on the trial that such amended judgment was invalid and of no effect. It appears that the tract which included the property here in question had been the subject of several different surveys and resurveys, each of which had been placed of record by the defendants. This particular lot 4 was triangular in shape, and was separated from any other lot or block by a street on each of two of its sides, and on its remaining side by the right of way of the Pacific Electric Railway Company. An examination of one of the surveys shows that before the Pacific Electric Railway Company acquired its right of way lot 4 of block Z was a large lot, which later, possibly by reason of part thereof having been taken for such right of way, was reduced in size and became of the triangular shape. One of the witnesses, who was a surveyor by occupation, testified at the trial that "the lot 4 of the unnumbered block in Map Book 5, p. 55, lies in the same position as the southwesterly portion of lot 4, block Z, on the map shown on Miscellaneous Records 43, pp. 9 and 10." There was nothing to indicate that this piece of property ever had been a part of block 82, and it is separated therefrom by a street which, according to the map, is over 60 feet in width.

[1, 2] On the evidence the trial court found that there was no such property described as lot 4, block 82, and that said block 82 consists only of three lots, numbered 1, 2, and 3; that said block 82 was separated by a public street known as Obispo street from lot 4, block Z, the property affected by this action, and that said lot 4, block Z, is correctly described as a triangular lot marked 4, bounded on the west by the easterly line of Obispo street, on the south by the northerly line of Second street, and on the northerly and easterly side by the southerly line of the Pacific Electric Railway right of way. That this court is bound by the findings of the lower court, which are sustained by the evidence, is so well settled as to require no citation of cases to support the statement. There being no such property as lot 4, block 82, it would follow that a decree quieting title to property under such a description of it could not be granted.

One of the contentions of appellant is to the effect that an estoppel against defendants existed by reason of the fact that defendants had caused a map of the property to be filed which showed it as being lot 4 of block 82. But that contention is disposed of by the finding of the court contrary to plaintiff's contention. There was no map which showed a lot 4 of block 82.

[3, 4] Appellant also urges that because in a certain year defendants caused the property in question to be returned for assessment purposes under the description of lot 4, block 82, defendants were thereby estopped to claim that in reality the description should have been lot 4 of block Z. The attention of the court has not been directed to either any evidence of or any stipulation to that fact, and defendants deny that either exists. While it is not incumbent upon this court to search the record therefor, our investigation has failed to disclose the fact upon which the contention of appellant for such estoppel must be founded. However, even assuming its existence, the elements of estoppel are lacking to such an extent that we are unable to agree with appellant upon the point itself.

No error appearing, it is ordered that the judgment be and the same is affirmed.

Interest of judges in outcome because inhabitants, taxpayers, and property owners of plaintiff city in action to quiet title in it as successor of pueblo to waters of river therein, as having right to use them as trustee for its inhabitants, held neither separate, severable, individual nor defined; not direct pecuniary or property interest or involving an individual right or privilege whereby liability or pecuniary gain would occur on event of action, but too remote and conjectural to operate as disqualification, under Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 1.

2. Judges ⚷44—Not disqualified because as taxpayers they could have brought action for city.

Judges are not disqualified in action by city to quiet title because had it neglected or refused to bring it they, as taxpayers, could have done so.

3. Judges ⚷42—Not disqualified because city intends, if unsuccessful in action, to acquire judge's rights in other property.

That judge owns water rights which city has declared its intention to acquire if unsuccessful in its action to quiet title to other waters does not disqualify him for the action, any interest not being direct, but indirect and consequential.

Application by the Cuyamaca Water Company and others for writ of prohibition to the Superior Court of California in and for San Diego County and the Judges thereof. Peremptory writ denied.

Crouch & Sanders and Sloane & Sloane, all of San Diego, and Flint & MacKay and Arthur R. Smiley, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

S. J. Higgins, City Atty., and A. F. H. Wright, Asst. City Atty., both of San Diego, and T. B. Cosgrove and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent all of the judges of the superior court of San Diego county from proceeding in a certain cause pending in that court wherein the city of San Diego is plaintiff and the petitioners herein are defendants. The sole ground for the application is the claim of a disqualifying interest possessed by the respondent judges under subdivision 1 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that no judge shall sit or act in any action or proceeding "in which he is interested." A general demurrer has been interposed to the petition and the matter is therefore submitted on the material facts thus admitted to be true.

The pending cause referred to is an action to quiet title. It is alleged in the complaint that prior to 1850 the pueblo of San Diego was situated along both banks of the San Diego river, and, under the laws of Spain and Mexico was entitled to a paramount and prior right to the use of all the waters of said river in trust for its inhabitants; that upon the incorporation in 1850 of the present city of San Diego it succeeded to all of the rights of the pueblo, and ever since has been and now is the owner of such prior and paramount right to the use of the waters of said river in so far as the same may be necessary for the city and the inhabitants. It is further alleged that the defendants therein claim an estate and interest in and to said waters and the use thereof adverse and superior to the interest of the city of San Diego, and that such claim is without right. Plaintiff prays that the defendants be required to set forth the nature of their claims to said waters, and that it be adjudged that whatever rights they possess in and to the same be declared to be subject and subordinate to the rights of the plaintiff. The theory of the action appears to be the same as that under which the city of Los Angeles established its paramount right to the use of the waters of the Los Angeles river. Los Angeles v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 645, 93 Pac. 869, 1135; City of Los Angeles v. Hunter, 156 Cal. 603, 105 Pac. 755. The nature of the right was involved in the earlier cases of Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674, and Vernon Irrigation Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, 39 Pac. 762.

It is alleged in the petition that each and all of the respondent judges are inhabitants, residents, citizens, and taxpayers of the city of San Diego, and that certain of them are owners of real property within said city. The alleged disqualification is asserted on the ground that, if the allegations of the complaint are true, the city owns the right to the use of the waters as trustee for the inhabitants of the city, and that each of such inhabitants, including each of the respondent judges, is the owner of a vested right in and to his proportionate share of such waters, and that the same is ascertainable and definable.

The petitioners describe the interest which will disqualify a judge as "a direct pecuniary or direct property interest or one which involves some individual right or privilege in the subject-matter of the litigation whereby a liability or pecuniary gain must occur on the event of the suit." In Meyer v. City of San Diego, 121 Cal. 102, 53 Pac. 434, 41 L. R. A. 762, 66 Am. St. Rep. 22, it is defined as "any certain, definable, pecuniary, or proprietary interest or relation which will be directly affected by the judgment that may be rendered." In the same case it is pointed out that if the so-called interest of the judge be "remote, contingent and speculative" it does not constitute a disqualifying interest.

It is contended that the status of an inhabitant of the city of San Diego as the successor of the ancient pueblo is peculiar; that in him is vested a beneficial interest in his proportionate share of the waters acquired by the pueblo; that this interest is common to all the inhabitants of the city and is a different interest than that held by an inhabitant of a city which is not the successor of a pueblo. The extent of the interest of the inhabitants of the former pueblo and of the occupants of land within the city, its successor, was defined in Lux v. Haggin, supra, as follows:

> "The inhabitants of the former pueblo who were using water when this territory was transferred to the United States had not acquired a vested right to any particular quantity of water. And the occupants of lands within the city, the pueblo's successor, are beneficiaries only to the extent that they are entitled to the use of such water and at such times as accords with the laws regulating the public and municipal trust."

The right of the present inhabitants of the city as thus defined and limited may be said to be similar to that conferred by section 549, Civil Code, on inhabitants of all cities in the state, including cities not successors of the ancient pueblos. That section provides that:

> "All corporations formed to supply water to cities or towns must furnish pure fresh water to the inhabitants thereof, for family uses, so long as the supply permits, at reasonable rates and without distinction of persons, upon proper demand therefor. * * *"

The obligation enjoined by that section of the Code has been held to apply to a municipal corporation. South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., 152 Cal. 579, 93 Pac. 490. If this right as thus defined does not create in an inhabitant a vested right to any particular quantity of water it would be impossible to determine what his proportionate share would be. In the pending quiet title action it will not, of course, be determined that the city is or is not entitled to any particular quantity of water. If the litigation terminates favorably to the plaintiff, the only right which will be established and determined to be vested in the city will be a right to the water and the use thereof prior and paramount to the defendant's rights therein, and then only to the extent necessary for the needs of the city and its inhabitants. The amount needed is necessarily uncertain and conjectural and dependent upon conditions such as rainfall and other estabished sources of supply. The subject-matter of the action is the establishment of the priority of right, and not the quantity of water to be taken.

Petitioners rely on numerous decisions of this court wherein a disqualification was declared to exist. Particular stress is laid on the cases of North Bloomfield G. M. Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 315; Meyer v. City of San Diego, 121 Cal. 102, 53 Pac. 434, 41 L. R. A. 762, 66 Am. St. Rep. 22; City of Los Angeles v. Dehy, 169 Cal. 234, 146 Pac. 662, and Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 315, 187 Pac. 1056.

In the case of North Bloomfield G. M. Co. v. Keyser, supra, the action was brought by the city of Marysville to enjoin the mining company from prosecuting certain hydraulic work, because the effect of such work was to so fill the bed of the Yuba river as to interfere with drainage, and thus endanger the lives and health of the inhabitants of the city. The respondent judge owned land, not within the city, but equally affected by the mining operations complained of. It was held that if the relief prayed for in the complaint were granted the same judgment that would stop the flow of tailings and débris on the lands of the city could stop such flow on the lands of the respondent. The interest of the judge was held to be not uncertain or remote, but a direct and immediate interest in the result of the action.

In Meyer v. City of San Diego, supra, an action was brought by a citizen and taxpayer of the city to set aside a contract between the city and a water company involving an expenditure of $1,500,000 of the city's money, and to enjoin the issuance and sale of bonds voted to carry out the contract. It was held that the judge, who was a resident, taxpayer, and property owner within the city, was disqualified. The disqualification was placed upon the ground that he was a property owner; that a decision upholding the validity of the contract and proposed bond issue would have the direct and certain result of immedi ately affecting the value of his property. The court said:

> "The disqualification does not spring from the fact that the judge is a citizen, inhabitant, and taxpayer of the city of San Diego, nor yet from the fact that the municipality is a party litigant in the action. It arises from the circumstance that he owns property within the city which may or may not be liable for the burden of a special tax for the period of forty years, as he shall decide. * * * The judgment which he renders in the case will be binding upon his rights and his property. His interest is in the outcome of the litigation, and it is a direct, measurable, pecuniary interest."

In the case of City of Los Angeles v. Dehy, supra, the Natural Soda Products Company instituted an action to enjoin the city of Los Angeles from diverting, by means of its aqueduct, all of the waters of the Owens river at points on the river above the lands of the plaintiff. The respondent judge owned lands riparian to the river immediately below the intake of the Collins ditch, which was the point of diversion by the city. Under the issues tendered by the complaint the court would be called upon to determine what quantity of water the city was to divert. With reference to the interest of the trial judge the court said:

> "* * * It seems clear to us that he has a direct and immediate interest in at least one of the matters involved, an interest that is of pecuniary concern to him. * * * It is obvious that it is to the interest of respondent as a riparian owner below the intake of the Collins ditch, that the quantity of water to be awarded the city by virtue of its Collins ditch rights be as small as possible. The smaller the amount so awarded, the greater will be the amount left to flow over his land, subject to his rights as a riparian owner."

The case of Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District v. Superior Court, supra, involved the disqualification of a judge to try an action involving conflicting claims between two irrigation districts to underground waters in which the plaintiffs sought to enjoin the defendants from pumping operations which would have the effect of depleting those underground waters. The judge was the owner of a city lot within one of the districts, and this court held that he was disqualified because of the circumstance that the continued pumping would in time lower the water plane beneath his lot, and that his interest in the result of the litigation was therefore direct, pecuniary, and proprietary and served to disqualify him even though the extent of the interest was very small in amount.

In the case of Oakland v. Water Front Co., 118 Cal. 249, 50 Pac. 268, on which the respondents rely, the complaint alleged that the city was the owner in fee of certain lands lying in front of the city of Oakland below the line of ordinary high tide, and alleged that the company claimed some interest or estate in and to the lands adverse to the city. The action was brought to determine such adverse claim. The defendant denied the title of the respondent and alleged title in itself. The company sought to disqualify the judges of the superior court of Alameda county on the ground that they were owners of property located in said county assessed by the city for taxes. The court said:

> "The theory of the appellant is that, if the respondent should recover the land sued for, it might be so used as to produce some municipal revenue, and thus affect to some extent the rate of taxation, as a consequence of which the taxes which the said judges would have to pay on their property might to some imaginable extent be lessened, and that thus they are interested and disqualified. * * * In our opinion the word 'interested,' as used in the section of the Code relied on, embraces only an interest that is direct, proximate, substantial, and certain, and does not embrace such a remote, indirect, contingent, uncertain, and shadowy interest as that asserted as a disqualification in the case at bar."

With reference to the rule that "no man shall be a judge in his own cause" the court said:

> "But surely that means a cause which is really his own cause; not that he must be a formal party to the record, but that it must be such a cause that a judgment rendered therein would necessarily and directly and substantially affect his personal rights. We cannot conceive that the Legislature meant to declare that a mere contingent possibility that some future supposable financial condition of a municipality might in a slight degree affect a judge as a taxpayer would strip him of all his personal judicial qualities."

In the case of Higgins v. City of San Diego, 126 Cal. 303, 58 Pac. 700, 59 Pac. 209, the plaintiffs brought the action for themselves and all taxpayers of the city against the city and the San Diego Water Company, to obtain a judgment declaring a certain lease from the water company to the city to be void and to enjoin the city and its auditor and treasurer from making any further payments to the water company thereunder. The respondent judges were resident property owners and taxpayers in the city. This court held that their interest was too remotely involved to operate as a disqualification. The court reviewed the holding in the Meyer Case, and said, at page 312 (58 Pac. 703):

> "In the Meyer Case, supra, the validity of the bonds was involved; by that judgment the judge was to place upon his property, or to refuse to do so, a certain, direct, definable, pecuniary burden, capable of mathematical ascertainment, and it was for this reason the judge was held to be disqualified. But such is not the case here, and we do not think the rule should be extended beyond the boundaries defined in the Meyer Case. The action here is on an implied contract for the reasonable value of the use of the water company's plant and may be tried by a jury. We can see no difference between this case and ordinary cases involving liabilities upon contract generally where judgments may be entered against cities, counties, or the state. To hold that no taxpaying judge could sit in such cases would render the administration of justice in the courts nearly impossible."

The case of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 133 Cal. 529, 65 Pac. 1049, was an action by the city to condemn certain water-bearing lands, the result of which, if successful, would be to impose upon the city the burden of paying the water company a large sum of money. The fact that the judge was a resident, taxpayer, and property owner within the city was held not to disqualify him.

[1] We are satisfied, from an examination of the issues involved in the pending quiet title action and the authorities on the subject, that the so-called interest of the respondent judges in the outcome of the action is neither separate, severable, individual, nor defined; that it is not a direct pecuniary or direct property interest or one involving an individual right or privilege whereby a liability or pecuniary gain would occur on the event of the suit, and that the alleged interest is too remote and conjectural to operate as a disqualification.

[2] Petitioners further contend that, if the city had neglected or refused on proper demand to bring said action, either one of the respondent judges might have done so as an inhabitant, taxpayer, and property owner of the city, and that in such case he would in effect be in the position of sitting in judgment in his own case. We cannot assent to this view. If this contention be upheld it would operate to disqualify the local judges in all taxpayers' suits, and innumerable judgments heretofore rendered in this state, as was declared by the court in Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co., supra, "would have to be held void, and extreme embarrassment and confusion would follow." It was said in Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District v. Superior Court, supra, quoting from Johnson v. German, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 336, 88 Pac. 985:

> " 'Any act of the disqualified judge in violation of the provisions of the statute, is absolutely void wherever brought in question.' "

A reference to a few cases will illustrate that the test sought to be applied by petitioners cannot be approved. The case of Harter v. San Jose, 141 Cal. 659, 75 Pac. 344, was an action brought by a resident and taxpayer of the city of San Jose to enjoin the mayor and common council of that city from executing a lease to one Terry of a portion of a public park for hotel purposes. It was contended by the plaintiff that the city was without power to execute the lease.

The case of Spires v. City of Los Angeles, 150 Cal. 64, 87 Pac. 1026, 11 Ann. Cas. 465, was an action brought by a resident and taxpayer of the city against the municipal authorities to restrain them from erecting a public library on a tract of land owned by the city of Los Angeles known as Central Park, on the ground that the city, as owner of said property, had dedicated it to the use of the public for park purposes and that such purpose would not permit erection therein of a public library building.

The case of Caulfield v. Berwick, 27 Cal. App. 493, 150 Pac. 646, was an action brought by the plaintiff as a resident and taxpayer of the city of Pacific Grove to restrain the defendants, as board of trustees of the city, from placing and maintaining tennis courts, croquet grounds, and children's playgrounds upon and in a certain public park known as Caledonia Park.

The recent case of Kelly v. Town of Hayward (Cal. Sup.) 219 Pac. 749, was an action brought by a citizen and taxpayer of the town of Hayward to secure an injunction against the erection by the board of trustees of a town hall, including rooms and offices for town officers and a jail, upon the plaza in said town.

It will thus be seen that taxpayers have been permitted to prosecute actions for alleged violations of public rights wherein the plaintiff taxpayer's situation is one in the nature of a beneficiary of a public trust and he is allowed to litigate the question on behalf of himself and all taxpayers similarly situated. See Davenport v. Buffington, 97 Fed. 234, 38 C. C. A. 453, 46 L. R. A. 377. To hold that in such cases a taxpaying judge, whose rights might be said theoretically to be affected the same as the rights of the plaintiff and all other taxpayers, would be disqualified on the ground of "interest," would be an unwarranted extension of the rule, and therefore the test sought to be applied by the petitioners cannot be approved.

[3] The petitioners allege another and different ground of disqualification on the part of one of the respondent judges, to wit, that he is the owner of water-bearing land and water rights upon another and different stream and that the city of San Diego has publicly announced through its common council and attorneys that it is the intention of the city to acquire said lands and water rights in the event that it shall be unsuccessful in said action. Petitioners allege that if said judge should decide against the city in said action the effect of the decision would be to create a market for his water-bearing lands and water rights on the other stream, and that therefore he is disqualified by his interest in this respect. Clearly this alleged interest is not a disqualifying interest, for the reason that it is not a direct interest. If anything, it is indirect and consequential.

The peremptory writ is denied.

In re ROLLS' ESTATE. (L. A. 7666.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 21, 1924.)

1. Husband and wife 🔑264—Clear and satisfactory proof necessary to overrule presumption of wife's community interest and property acquired after marriage.

The presumption created by Civ. Code, § 164, as limited by sections 162, 163, of wife's community interest in property acquired after marriage, can be overcome only by clear and satisfactory proof that the property was the separate property of the husband.

2. Husband and wife 🔑264—Evidence held not to show property was acquired by deceased as his separate property.

Evidence held not to show property of which deceased husband died seized was acquired by him as his separate estate, as against presumption under Civ. Code, § 164, that the property belonging to his estate was community property.

3. Equity 🔑44—When and for what purpose courts of equity will interfere in administration of estates.

Courts of equity will interfere in the administration of estates where the powers of courts of probate and their modes of procedure preclude them from doing complete justice, and then only for the purpose of rendering indispensable aid to courts of probate, remitting their decrees to that court to be carried into effect.

4. Wills 🔑64—Statute gives notice to parties to conjoint or mutual will, of its revocability.

Civ. Code, § 1279, gives notice, to all parties to a contract to execute a conjoint or mutual will, that such a will is subject to revocation.

5. Wills 🔑64—Joint disposition of property under testamentary instrument revocable as will, though irrevocable in equity as a compact.

Joint dispositions of property under a testamentary instrument are revocable as a will by either testator in the usual manner so far as relates to his own disposition, though such instrument as a compact is irrevocable in equity.

6. Wills 🔑63—Decree of final distribution where conjoint will was revoked by surviving testator as to her, held proper.

Where the survivor of two testators, husband and wife, who united in a conjoint will as to community property, revoked the same as to her, after having accepted the benefits thereof and by a later will disposed of the property in a different manner, a decree of final distribution in the probate of the conjoint will as the separate will of first testator, ordering one-half the property distributed in accordance with terms of conjoint will as the will of first testator, subject to the payment of certain legacies to the persons named therein, together with certain claims and expenses of administration, and decreeing the remaining one-half of the estate to be the community interest of the surviving testator subject to her testamentary disposition, held proper.

7. Wills 🔑68—Equity only has jurisdiction to enforce contract between spouses not to execute will contrary to disposition made under conjoint will.

Every will being subject to revocation by the testator, the remedy to enforce a contractual obligation or right such as an agreement between husband and wife not to execute a will that would change the disposition of community property made by a conjoint will pursuant to Civ. Code, § 1279, must be found in a court of equity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William D. Dehy, Judge.

Proceedings to probate conjoint will as the separate will of John Rolls in which an appeal is prosecuted from an order and from final decree of distribution. Affirmed.

Bowker & Sheridan, of Ventura, for appellants.

Lawrence W. Allen and Ellis Eagan, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. Section 1279 of the Civil Code of this state provides:

> "A conjoint or mutual will is valid, but it may be revoked by any of the testators, in like manner with any other will."

On April 16, 1919, John Rolls and Leah Rolls, husband and wife, residents of the city of Los Angeles, pursuant to the foregoing provision of the Civil Code, executed a conjoint and mutual will. The husband, being then ill, was taken to a hospital, where he died on the next day, following, as intimated, a surgical operation, at the age of 72 years. He left surviving him four children, the issue of a former marriage. On November 6, 1920, after the death of her husband, Leah Rolls executed a separate will and revoked as to herself said conjoint will. By the later will she made a different disposition of the estate described and referred to in said conjoint will than that made by said conjoint will. This act left the conjoint and mutual will as the separate will of her husband. Leah Rolls died on the 11th day of April, 1921. Two daughters, the issue of herself and a former husband, survived her. No steps were taken to probate the estate of John Rolls, deceased, until after the death of his wife, to wit, April 14, 1921, on which day a petition for the probate of the conjoint will as the separate will of John Rolls, deceased, was filed. Letters testamentary were issued May 2, 1921. Upon the hearing of the petition for a decree of final distribution in the matter of his estate, the court found, over the contest of appellants, that all of the property of the said estate was the community property of John Rolls and his wife, Leah Rolls, and that the will executed by the wife on November 6, 1920, had revoked said conjoint and mutual will as to said Leah Rolls. By the decree of distribution one-half of the property was ordered distributed in accordance with the terms of said conjoint will as the will of John Rolls, subject to the payment of certain legacies to the persons named therein, together with certain claims and expenses of administration, and the remaining one-half of said estate was decreed to be the community interest of Leah Rolls, subject to her testamentary disposition.

The appeal is taken from that portion of the decree of final distribution which finds that all of the property belonging to the estate of John Rolls was community property and that the conjoint and mutual will, executed April 16, 1919, was revocable at any time thereafter by either of the makers. By these findings the strength of appellants' appeal must be tested. Two other grounds are stated, but they are necessarily included in a consideration of the other grounds and do not require special notice.

John Rolls and Leah Rolls intermarried in Newfoundland in 1889. John Rolls was then and previously thereto had been engaged in conducting a general merchandise business, first at Rose Blanche and later at Grand River, Newfoundland, and his wife Leah was, at the time of said marriage, and previously thereto had been, engaged in conducting a private boarding house at St. John. At the time of this marriage John Rolls was the father of eight children, the issue of his marriage with Emily Lucretia Rolls, who died in 1887. The eldest of these children at the time of said marriage of John Rolls and Leah was 17 years of age and the youngest was not more than 5 years of age. All of said children, except those named in the will hereafter set out, died without issue. Those named in said will survived John Rolls. Leah Rolls was then the mother of two children, Maude Agnes Prouse and Sarah Dicks, the issue of herself and a former husband. No children were born as the issue of the marriage of John Rolls and Leah Rolls. In 1891, two years after their marriage, Rolls and his wife, accompanied by all of his children, became residents of the state of California, first locating at Santa Paula, Ventura county. The children of Leah Rolls remained in Newfoundland. Both John Rolls and his wife remained residents of California for a period of 30 years, residing at Santa Paula for a period of about 20 years, later at Merced, and finally making their home at Los Angeles, where both died. The children of John Rolls seemed to have made their home with the father and stepmother. There is nothing before us to indicate that there was anything of a discordant nature that occurred during their marriage relations which disturbed domestic tranquillity.

[1, 2] Shortly after his arrival at Santa Paula in 1891, John Rolls negotiated for and purchased a tract of land situate near Santa Paula, containing about 46 acres, at the price of $7,500. This purchase seems to have been the foundation of his estate which, in 1922, was inventoried to be of the value of about $23,000. He paid down on the purchase price $4,300 and gave back a mortgage for the balance—$3,200. Of the cash payment, amounting to $4,300, his brother, William Rolls, furnished $2,500, leaving but $1,800 as furnished by John Rolls, deceased. No evidence of sufficient strength was adduced at the trial to overcome the presumption created by section 164, Civil Code, that all property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, except such property as may be acquired in accordance with the provisions of the two preceding sections (sections 162, 163) of said Civil Code, is community property. The presumption of the wife's community interest in property acquired after marriage can be overcome only by the production of clear and satisfactory proof that the property in question was the separate property of the husband. Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 251, 73 Am. Dec. 538; Morgan v. Lones, 78 Cal. 59, 20 Pac. 248; Dimmick v. Dimmick, 95 Cal. 326, 30 Pac. 547; Jordan v. Fay, 98 Cal. 267, 33 Pac. 95; Davis v. Green, 122 Cal. 366, 55 Pac. 9; Rowe v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., 134 Cal. 405, 66 Pac. 569. No such proof was produced at the trial below. Both spouses had been engaged in business before marriage. The evidence is very convincing to the effect that John Rolls, upon arriving in California with his wife and large family of young children, was not able to raise more than $1,800 in cash. The source from which that sum came, or the manner in which it was acquired, is unexplained. There is no presumption that John Rolls had been more thrifty or sagacious in business than his wife had been. In fact, there is substantial evidence from which the inference must be drawn that he was financially weak at the time he moved from Newfoundland to California. The proof directed to this issue is not sufficient to produce conviction in an unprejudiced mind that the property of which John Rolls died seized was acquired by him as his separate estate. The finding of the trial court as to this issue must therefore be sustained. The Estate of Nickson, 187 Cal. 603, 203 Pac. 106, cited by appellant, is not an authority out of agreement with our conclusion in the instant case. The facts of that case are altogether different from those disclosed by the record now before us. The law, as there stated, may as well be invoked in affirmance of the instant case.

This brings us to a consideration of the question whether either of two testators who have united in a conjoint and mutual will may, after the death of the other, and after having accepted the benefits conferred by said conjoint will, revoke the same as to the survivor. The portions of the will material to this issue are as follows:

> "Second. Our joint estate consists of a mortgage of seventeen thousand dollars ($17,000) on a ranch formerly owned by us at Santa Paula, California, and at present the property of J. G. Leavens. The property now occupied by us, known as 5343 Santa Monica boulevard, Los Angeles. Eighty-five hundred (8500) shares of the capital stock of the Ben Ezra Mining Company of Nevada. And whatever money, either in our separate or joint accounts, in any bank at the present time.
> "Third. The above property, both real and personal, at the time of the death of either of us, shall be held by the survivor during his or her lifetime, the use and income thereof to be enjoyed by such survivor as he or she shall deem best, during the remainder of the life of such survivor.
> "Fourth. At the death of the survivor, after all funeral expenses and debts have been paid, the above property shall be distributed as follows: One thousand dollars ($1,000.00) to be paid to Thomas K. Winsor, our grandson, when he shall become of age. Five hundred dollars ($500.00) shall be paid to Jessie Rolls, our daughter-in-law. The balance and residue to be divided equally among the surviving children of John Rolls.
> "Fifth. All personal effects of either of us, at the time of the death of either of us, to be distributed among the surviving children of John Rolls."

[3] The will declares itself to be joint as well as several. The probate court has determined that the property thereby devised was community property. The joint and several will, so far as it purported to be the will of Leah Rolls, was denied probate because of the execution of the later will revoking the first. It is not claimed that Leah Rolls was wanting in testamentary capacity or that her will does not conform fully to all legal requirements. The grounds of objection are that she agreed and contracted with her husband not to execute a will that would in any wise change the disposition of the property made by the conjoint will. Whatever there may be of merit in this claim, we are satisfied that the question cannot be litigated in a probate court, but that relief in such cases must be sought in a court of equity. The remedy of a person injured by the violation of a contract to make testamentary provision for another must be pursued in a court of equity and not in a court of probate. Courts of equity will interfere in the administration of estates where the owners of the courts of probate and their modes of procedure preclude them from doing complete justice and then only for the purpose of rendering indispensable aid to courts of probate, remitting their decrees to that court to be carried into effect. Redfield on the Law of Wills, vol. 3, § 20, p. 305. The case of Monsen v. Monsen, 174 Cal. 97, 162 Pac. 90, was a suit in equity to enforce an alleged contract by which the decedent had agreed that the plaintiff should receive and inherit a child's share of the property which decedent might leave. It was there said:

> "The action is of a type familiar in this court, and illustrated by a line of decisions beginning with Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 444 [33 L. R. A. 369, 45 Pac. 710]. As was said in that case, there has been 'from a very early date a general concurrence among the authorities upon the proposition that a man may make a valid contract binding himself to dispose of his property in a particular way by last will and testament, and a court of equity will enforce such an agreement specifically by treating the heirs as trustees and compelling them to convey the property in accordance with the terms of the contract.' Without referring to the numerous decisions in other jurisdictions, we make note of the cases in which the rule, as thus declared, has been recognized here. (McCabe v. Healy, 138 Cal. 81 [70 Pac. 1008]; Baumann v. Kusian, 164 Cal. 582 [44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 756, 129 Pac. 986]; Rogers v. Schlotterback, 167 Cal. 35 [138 Pac. 728]; Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719 [141 Pac. 217].)"

To this list may be added Osborn v. Hoyt, 181 Cal. 336, 184 Pac. 854; Estate of Ross, 180 Cal. 651, 182 Pac. 752; Estate of Ross, 185 Cal. 8, 195 Pac. 674; Roy v. Pos, 183 Cal. 359, 191 Pac. 542; Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 Pac. 432.

Schouler on Wills, Executors and Administrators (6th Ed.) vol. 1, § 718, p. 817, thus comments on the unfriendly spirit with which mutual or conjoint wills were regarded by the common law and spiritual courts of England and by our earlier American cases:

> "When these mutual or conjoint wills first came up in practice, the common-law and spiritual courts of England pronounced against them. A mutual or conjoint will, it was said, is unknown to the testamentary law of this country. These courts saw, doubtless, that to give the contract under which such wills were made a practical operation as mutually intended was beyond their own jurisdiction; and regarding the instrument simply as a will the irrevocable nature of such a writing interposed to their minds a strong ground of objection. The same unfavorable position is taken by some of our earlier American cases, on the theory that they could not be revocable and that it was a necessary characteristic of a will that it be revocable.
> "But the later and better opinion, in both England and the United States, treats the conjoint or mutual will as capable of probate, provided it has been executed with all the statute formalities requisite for other wills, and has not been revoked by some later instrument. The real point of decision by Sir John Nicholl in Hobson v. Blackburn (the leading case adverse to such wills), was that such an instrument, though jointly executed, could not be set up in probate against the later will of one of the parties which revokes his share of the mutual disposition; in other words it only denied the theory that joint wills were irrevocable, in the strict testamentary sense, unless by the joint or mutual concurrence of the testators. Joint dispositions of property, under a testamentary instrument, are, therefore, though irrevocable in equity as a compact, revocable as a will by either testator in the usual manner so far as relates to his own disposition. But, on the other hand, if either testator dies without revoking his disposition, the will may be admitted to probate as his last and separate will on proof of due execution as in other cases, notwithstanding some one else executed and disposed of property by the same instrument. Hence a conjoint or mutual will, is not necessarily invalid, even when viewed for probate merely and in the simple sense of a testament. That the will happens to be made in conformity to some agreement, or imports on its face a mutuality of testamentary purpose, and a compact not to revoke without a joint assent, does not defeat its character as a will."

[4] Mr. Schouler further observes that the law of mutual wills is still in a somewhat confused state, regarded as a doctrine of general jurisprudence. It was doubtless because of this confused condition that the Legislature of our state relieved the subject of all uncertainty and confusion by the enactment of section 1279 of the Civil Code. We know of no other state which has a similar section. Whoever enters into a contract with another to execute a conjoint or mutual will does so with notice given by the statute itself that such a will is subject to revocation.

[5] In Woerner's American Law of Administration (3d Ed. § 37, p. 74) it is said:

"* * * The doctrine announced by Jarman in the later editions seems, therefore, incontrovertible on principle, and is sanctioned by the current of English and American decisions. It asserts the revocability of joint and mutual wills as testamentary dispositions of property, and therefore entitled to probate as such, to be consistent with their irrevocability as contracts, and therefore enforceable in equity if broken by the revocation of the testamentary disposition. Accordingly, if by two mutual wills, or in a joint will, two testators will their respective estates to the survivor of them without further testamentary disposition, the will of the one who first dies (which is the joint will) is entitled to probate, and the survivor may then dispose of the property devised at leisure, for the will has fully accomplished its office, and made the property his."

[6, 7] Joint dispositions of property under a testamentary instrument, as stated by the law text-writers and supported by many decisions, are, therefore, though irrevocable in equity as a compact, revocable as a will by either testator in the usual manner so far as relates to his own disposition. We have no doubt that the probate court made the only distribution of the property that the law would permit it to make. Every case to which we have been cited, or which has fallen under our observation in our examination of the subject, in which the relief here sought has been granted, has been a suit in equity. See, also, 40 Cyc. pp. 2116, 2117. Every will under our statute being subject to revocation by the testator, the remedy to enforce a contractual obligation or right such as here sought to be enforced must therefore be found in a court of equity. Whether or not the appellants ought to prevail in a suit in equity under the peculiar facts of the case before us, we express no opinion.

The order and decree appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SLISCOVICH. (Cr. 2613.)

Rehearing Denied June 6, 1924.)

1. Criminal law 🔑438—Admission of photograph of room where killing occurred, for illustrative purposes, held proper.

Admission in evidence of photograph of kitchen where the murder occurred, taken after homicide, for illustrative purposes, held proper, and it was not necessary that the room be reproduced with absolute fidelity so as to include unimportant objects.

2. Homicide 🔑179 — Truth of statements causing accused's alleged insanity immaterial.

Where, in murder prosecution, the defense was insanity, alleged to have been caused by statements told accused, the test of determining insanity, was whether he was in fact told the things which he claimed caused insanity, and what effect, if any, they had upon his mind, and it was immaterial whether or not the things disclosed actually happened.

3. Criminal law 🔑1170½(1)—Erroneous admission of evidence to refute plea of insanity held not prejudicial.

In murder prosecution, where defense was insanity, claimed by accused to have been caused by statements told him, his testimony having been corroborated, that deceased had drugged a certain plasterer and another man, and robbed the latter of money, erroneous admission, for state, of testimony of two witnesses, one a plasterer and another who had lost some money, that the former had not been drugged, and that the latter had been drugged but not robbed, held not prejudicial as materially impairing credibility of accused and his witness, where the state did not show its two witnesses were the men accused had in mind.

4. Homicide 🔑270—Whether claimed statements were made to accused and whether they caused insanity held for jury.

Where, in a murder prosecution, defense was insanity, claimed to have been caused by statements to accused concerning deceased, it was function of the jury, in addition to determining whether claimed statements were made, to determine whether such statements, if made, would cause insanity of accused.

5. Homicide 🔑338(1)—Erroneous admission of testimony refuting plea of insanity held not prejudicial, where verdict would have been the same.

Where, in a murder prosecution, defense was insanity, claimed to have been caused by statements told accused as to what deceased had done, erroneous admission of evidence, in behalf of state, to show that things claimed to have been related to accused did not in fact occur, held not prejudicial, where the verdict, if jury had believed the statements had been made, would have been the same.

6. Criminal law 🔑726—Remarks of prosecuting attorney with reference to other prominent murders held legitimate reply to argument of defense.

Where in a murder prosecution, counsel for accused in argument to jury stated, "Men are walking to-day on the streets of Sacramento who shot men down in cold blood, without provocation," reply of district attorney referring to certain cold-blooded murders of two prominent persons, and that the murderers had not been apprehended, held legitimate reply.

7. Criminal law 🔑726—Misconduct of prosecuting attorney invited by accused could not be assigned as error requiring reversal.

Alleged misconduct of district attorney could not be assigned as error and relied upon as reversal, where such argument was provoked and invited by counsel for accused.

8. Witnesses 🔑400(1)—When party is entitled to contradict his witness stated.

To entitle a party to contradict his witness, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, by showing statements elsewhere contrary to his testimony, it must appear, not only that the party was surprised by testimony, but that such testimony was prejudicial.

9. Homicide 🔑179—Witness' belief that indulgence in liquor might cause insanity of accused held not competent on issue of insanity.

Where, in a murder prosecution, defense was insanity, claimed to have been caused by statements told accused night before homicide as to certain acts of deceased, belief by accused's witness that indulgence by accused in liquor, which might be served by deceased, would make accused crazy, held not competent, or any evidence that accused was insane at time of killing.

10. Criminal law 🔑696(5)—Motion to strike evidence held properly granted.

Where objectionable testimony in behalf of defense came in before an opportunity was presented for an objection by the district attorney, the motion to strike it, assigning as reason therefor proper grounds, held properly granted.

11. Criminal law 🔑414—Relevant declaration admissible as independent evidence without necessity of laying foundation.

Relevant declaration by accused was admissible, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2, as an independent piece of evidence, and hence no necessity existed for laying foundation as in case of impeachment by declarations.

12. Homicide 🔑179—Testimony in rebuttal of evidence of insanity held admissible.

In a murder prosecution, in which defense was insanity, claimed to have been caused by statements told accused the night before the homicide as to certain acts of deceased, where accused, in aid of his defense, testified that on the night of the homicide "everything turned black" just before the killing, evidence in behalf of state that 10 days before the homicide accused was drunk, and threatened to kill somebody, held admissible, being in a measure rebuttal in character.

13. Witnesses 🔑240(2)—Leading questions ordinarily permissible only in discretion of trial court.

Leading questions are ordinarily permissible only in discretion of trial court.

14. Witnesses 🔑240(2)—Trial court's refusal to permit leading questions held not abuse of discretion.

Trial court's refusal to permit counsel for accused to propound leading questions, requested because of claimed difficulty in eliciting answers from witnesses, held not abuse of discretion, where the testimony sought to be adduced by such questions was subsequently elicited from the witnesses by the use of simple language.

15. Witnesses 🔑249—Trial court's refusal to permit witness to explain answers to questions held proper.

Where a witness had completely answered the questions put to him, trial court's refusal to permit him to explain his answers, on the ground that any explanation would be a volunteer statement, held proper.

On Petition for Rehearing.

16. Criminal law 🔑726—Misconduct of counsel for defense in any given case occurring at trial or during argument to jury does not justify similar misconduct of district attorney.

Misconduct of counsel for accused, in any given case, occurring at the trial, or during the argument to jury, as by his commenting upon facts and circumstances not appearing in evidence, will not suffice to justify similar misconduct of the district attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Chas. O. Busick, Judge.

Martin Sliscovich was convicted or murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Clifford A. Russell, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, J. The defendant in this case was charged with the crime of murder. He was found guilty of murder in the first degree, and was sentenced to suffer the penalty of death. The appeal is from the judgment. Succinctly stated, the facts of the case upon which the prosecution relied for a conviction are substantially these:

On the evening of November 22, 1922, between the hours of 7 and 8 o'clock, at the home of Marco Radman and his wife, Jennie Radman, located at 1618 O street in the city of Sacramento, Jennie Radman was shot and killed by the defendant, Martin Sliscovich. At 7 o'clock in the evening of that day a group of persons were gathered in the kitchen of Marco Radman's home. There were present Jennie Radman, John Sliscovich, Mrs. Lebedina, George Radal, Klapich, Hall, who was an automobile salesman, the defendant, Martin Sliscovich, who was a roomer at the home of Mrs. Radman, the three children of the deceased, and a little daughter of Mrs. Lebedina. Some time between 7:30 and 8 o'clock on the evening in question Radal, Klapich, Hall, and the defendant left the room. John Sliscovich, Mrs. Lebedina, Mrs. Radman, and the four children remained. The three adults were sitting in somewhat of a semicircle near the stove, and the children were back of them in the corner playing "school." Mrs. Lebedina was sitting near the stove; next to her was John Sliscovich, sitting between Mrs. Lebedina and Mrs. Radman; next to him was Mrs. Radman. Martin Sliscovich, the defendant, who had been drinking, returned to the room with his hat on his head and his hands in his overcoat pockets. The defendant, while walking slowly towards Mrs. Radman, who was facing him as he entered the room, fired three shots from an automatic pistol into her body. John Sliscovich was also at this time shot and killed by the defendant. The defendant then went upstairs to the room which he occupied threw the gun upon the bed, and then left the house. Search was immediately made for the defendant by the officers of the law, but he succeeded in eluding them, and on the day following the homicide he purchased a ticket for Los Angeles. He was arrested some several months later in San Diego. There is some evidence to the effect that the defendant, Martin Sliscovich, was in love with the deceased, and that John Sliscovich, who, so far as the record shows, was no relation to the defendant, also entertained an affection for the deceased. It will be noted that the defendant, although he killed two persons, was charged only with and tried for the murder of Jennie Radman.

It is conceded that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict and judgment. It is contended, however, in support of the appeal, that several rulings of the trial court were so prejudicially erroneous that, coupled with the claimed misconduct of the district attorney, the appellant was denied a fair and impartial trial.

[1] It is urged that the trial court abused its discretion in admitting in evidence certain photographs. The photographs had been taken several months after the homicide by a police officer of the city of Sacramento. These photographs portrayed the kitchen where the homicide occurred, and indicated the location of certain objects which were in the room at the time of the homicide. Among these objects were the three chairs which were occupied by Mrs. Lebedina, John Sliscovich, and Mrs. Radman. The chairs, for the purpose of the photographs, had been arranged by Mrs. Lebedina, an eyewitness to the shooting, in accord with her recollection of their position on the night of the homicide. Before the taking of the photographs Mrs. Lebedina seated herself in the chair which she had occupied at the time of the homicide. As a foundation for the introduction of the photographs Mrs. Lebedina testified that they were correct representations of the condition of the room on the night of the homicide. The photographs were admitted only for the purpose of illustration in order that the jury might follow the evidence of the different witnesses more clearly. As a diagram or illustration of the premises the photographs were admissible. People v. Crandall, 125 Cal. 129, 133, 57 Pac. 785; People v. Phelan, 123 Cal. 551, 56 Pac. 424; People v. Mahatch, 148 Cal. 200, 82 Pac. 779; People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 21, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193. It is true that a witness, Hall testified that there was another chair in the room, and also some boxes with which the children were playing. Mrs. Lebedina, being recalled to the stand, admitted that the last-mentioned articles had been omitted from the photographs. It does not appear, however, that these articles were essential to an illustration of the manner and the method of the killing, nor that, if they had been included in the photographs, the photographs would have been any more illuminating for the purpose of illustration. The purpose of the introduction of the photographs was to show the different doors leading into the kitchen, and also the relative position of the three persons seated in the room at the time of the shooting. This was adequately done by the photographs in question, and for illustrative purposes it was not necessary that the room should be reproduced with absolute fidelity so as to include unimportant objects. People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 592, 598, 91 Pac. 515.

[2-5] It is the contention of the appellant that certain evidence was erroneously admitted and was prejudicial to the defendant's case. The defense in the instant case was insanity. The defendant, as a witness in his own behalf, testified in effect that certain things had been told him which so affected his mind that at the time of committing the murder he was insane. In this behalf the defendant testified, and in this he was corroborated by another witness, Radal, that previous to the night of the murder he had been told by Radal and by one Kleest that a colored plasterer was drugged with whisky by the deceased, and that another man had been drugged and robbed of some $80 by the deceased at her home. Upon this phase of the case the prosecution called to the witness stand one A. J. Miller, who, it was claimed by the prosecution, was the colored plasterer referred to by the defendant. In response to the question propounded by the trial court, "I suppose you are the plasterer, are you?" the witness replied, "No, sir." Despite this answer and appropriate objections interposed by the defense the witness was permitted to testify, in response to questions by the district attorney, that he was acquainted with Mrs. Radman the deceased; that he had done some paper hanging and tinting for her; that while he was working for her he had drunk some wine with his meals, but that he had never been poisoned. Upon cross-examination it developed that the witness Miller was not the only colored man who had been working at the Radman house, but that there had been at least one other colored man working there. Another man, by the name of Mike Rubus, who had been living with Radal, and who had, in fact, lost $80, testified that he had not been drugged at the home of the deceased and that he had not been robbed of any money there. It was not, however shown in evidence that the witness Rubus was the man referred to by the defendant as having been drugged and robbed at the home of the deceased.

The test, of course, where the defense is insanity is not whether the facts claimed to have been told to the defendant and relied upon as a cause of the defendant's claimed insanity were true or false. The real test is whether the defendant was in fact told the things which he claimed caused his insanity, and what effect, if any, they had on his mind. The material thing in weighing the defendant's defense of insanity in the instant case was the communication of certain facts to the defendant, and it was entirely immaterial whether the things disclosed to him had or had not actually happened. Obviously, the fact that the things claimed to have been related to the defendant did not actually occur is not proof that the things were not related to the defendant. People v. Hurtado, 63 Cal. 288. Although inadmissible, the evidence complained of was not so prejudicial as to require a reversal. For after all is said and done, the testimony given by the two witnesses in question had but little tendency to impair the credibility of the defendant's testimony and that of his witness in corroboration of him. The witnesses introduced to prove that the incidents claimed to have been narrated to the defendant had not actually occurred were not identified by the prosecution as the persons the defendant had in mind. Not having shown that these were the men the defendant had in mind as having been respectively drugged and robbed, it cannot be said that the prosecution succeeded by the testimony of these witnesses in materially impairing the credibility of the defendant and the defendant's witness concerning the statements that had been made to him that two persons had been poisoned and robbed at the home of the deceased. Therefore the error complained of in this particular cannot be held so prejudicial to the defendant and his case as to require a reversal.

Moreover, it must be borne in mind that it was the function of the jury, in addition to determining whether the claimed statements were or were not in fact actually made to the defendant, to determine whether such statements, if they were made, did so affect the mind of the defendant as to render him insane. A review of the evidence upon the entire case, and particularly upon this phase of the case, shows sufficiently, we think, that, when the defendant was told that the deceased had poisoned or drugged and robbed two men with whom he was acquainted, the defendant did not have in mind "poisoning" or "drugging" in the ordinary sense, but had in mind that the deceased had poisoned or drugged these men by selling them what may be termed "moonshine whisky," and that one of these men had been robbed after indulging in such liquor given him by the deceased. The statements claimed to have been made to the defendant, i. e., that a colored plasterer had been poisoned by indulgence in whisky at the home of the deceased and that another man who had indulged in such liquor was robbed of some $80 are not statements of the nature that would ordinarily affect the mind of a man to the point of rendering him insane. And the jury may well have so found even though they had further found that the statements in question had in fact been made to the defendant. We are satisfied, upon a review of the evidence adduced upon the entire case, that the jury, even if they had believed that the statements had been actually made, would nevertheless have failed to give credence to the defendant's insanity claimed to have resulted from the statements made to him, and that the verdict would have been the same regardless of the evidence complained of.

[6, 7] Complaint is made of alleged misconduct on the part of the district attorney, which, it is claimed, was so flagrant in several instances as to prejudice the defendant in the eyes of the jury. During the course of his argument, and this is complained of, the district attorney made reference to the recent murder of Dr. Arbogast, a prominent physician of the city of Sacramento, and to the murder of Harry Brown, a prominent young attorney of the same city. Both men had been shot down in cold blood, and at the date of the trial their murderers had not been apprehended. It is argued by the defense that these crimes because of the prominence of the victims and the brutality of their killing, had created a deep impression on the public mind, and it is insisted that a reference to these crimes necessarily prejudiced the jury against the defendant. The record shows that this misconduct, if misconduct it was, was invited by the counsel for the defense, when, in his argument to the jury, he said, "Men are walking to-day on the streets of Sacramento who shot men down in cold blood, without provocation." The argument of the district attorney, made in reply to this statement, was well within the limits of legitimate reply. The argument of the district attorney having been provoked and invited by counsel for the defendant, it cannot now be assigned and relied upon as misconduct requiring a reversal of the case. People v. Bush, 68 Cal. 623, 10 Pac. 169; People v. Philbon, 138 Cal. 530, 71 Pac. 650.

With reference to other portions of the argument of the district attorney, wherein it is complained that he was guilty of misconduct in his comments upon the character and personality of a witness for the defense, we cannot say, as is contended, that the district attorney exceeded the bounds of legitimate argument.

[8] Complaint is made of the ruling of the court refusing counsel for the defense permission to cross-examine or ask leading questions of one Mike Brevl, an uncle of the defendant, who was called to the stand as a witness for the defendant. In response to interrogatories which were put to him, the witness denied that he had had certain conversations with the defendant concerning the deceased previous to the homicide. This was the sum and substance of his testimony. Counsel for the defendant thereupon announced that he was taken by surprise, in that the witness, a short time before taking the witness stand, had said that he had had certain conversations with the defendant concerning the deceased previous to the homicide. There was no error in this ruling of the trial court. While it is true that under the provisions of section 2049 of the Code of Civil Procedure a party producing a witness may show that the witness had made statements at other times inconsistent with the testimony as given upon the witness stand, still the privilege permitted by this section may not be invoked on every occasion. The purpose of the provisions of this section is to permit a party who has in good faith, produced a witness upon the stand in the belief that the witness will give certain testimony in support of the party calling him to show that prior to being called to the witness stand the witness made statements which, if admitted in evidence, would have been favorable to the party calling the witness. But to entitle a party to contradict his own witness by showing statements elsewhere made, and contrary to those made upon the witness stand, it must appear not only that the party was surprised by the testimony of the witness, but that such testimony was prejudicial to the case of the party calling the witness. Therefore, the mere failure of a witness to testify favorably for the party calling him, unaccompanied by any testimony which would tend to the prejudice of the case of the party calling the witness, will not entitle such party to show that the witness has elsewhere made contrary statements concerning the facts sought to be elicited from him. The witness in the instant case not having testified to anything that was prejudicial to the defendant and the defendant's case, the defendant was not privileged to invoke the provisions of the code section last above referred to. Zipperlen v. Southern Pacific Co., 7 Cal. App. 206, 216, 93 Pac. 1049; People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 529, 532, 75 Pac. 101; People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 345, 83 Pac. 43; People v. Spencer, 58 Cal. App. 197, 225, 208 Pac. 380.

[9, 10] The motion to strike out the testimony of the witness Radal to the effect that he had told the defendant that it was foolish for the defendant to go to the home of the deceased, and there spend his money, "and make him crazy with that liquor," was properly granted. The testimony of this witness evidently came in before an opportunity was presented for an objection by the district attorney, and the motion to strike out was granted upon the ground that the testimony in question had no tendency to prove any of the issues of the case, and tended to do no more than to show that the deceased was dealing in the illicit sale of liquor. Surely the belief of the witness that indulgence by the defendant in liquor that might be served by the deceased would make the defendant crazy was not competent or any evidence of the fact that the defendant was insane at the time of the killing. It may be noted that, even if such testimony were admissible, evidence to the same effect and standing uncontradicted in the record was given by the defendant in his own behalf.

[11, 12] The district attorney was permitted, over the objections of counsel for the defendant, to elicit from a witness who was called in rebuttal upon behalf of the people evidence to the effect that the defendant about ten days before the commission of the homicide was drunk, and said he was "going to kill somebody." It is not readily and clearly ascertainable from the record before us just what was the real purpose of the district attorney in offering this particular piece of evidence. But the sum and substance of the discussion by way of argument of the objection interposed by counsel for the defense would seem to indicate that the district attorney insisted that the testimony should be admitted by way of impeachment of the defendant and the defendant's witness Radal, and also that the testimony was admissible by way of rebuttal of defendant's testimony. It was insisted in the court below, and it is now insisted here by the defense, that no foundation was laid for impeachment purposes of either the defendant or the witness Radal, and that the testimony referred to was not in fact rebuttal. Relative to the point that no foundation had been laid for impeachment purposes in so far as the testimony of the defendant was concerned, it may be said that the testimony in question embodied a relevant declaration made by the defendant, and was therefore pursuant to the provisions of section 1870, subdivision 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure, admissible as an independent piece of evidence, and therefore there was no need for the laying of a foundation. In so far as the testimony of Radal is concerned we cannot see how the particular evidence in question had any tendency toward the impeachment of that witness. But, even though this be so, still the testimony in question was in a measure rebuttal in character, and therefore admissible. The defendant had testified in support of his defense of insanity that on the night of the homicide "everything turn black" just before the killing. The obvious purpose and tendency of the testimony complained of was to show that the defendant for at least ten days prior to the homicide was bent on murder.

[13, 14] A request was made by counsel for the defendant that an interpreter be appointed to translate the testimony of the defendant and the testimony of the defendant's witness Radal, upon the ground that they did not sufficiently understand the English language. The trial court, however, concluded, and so far as we are able to ascertain from the record, correctly, and there was no need for an interpreter. No complaint is made of the refusal of the trial court to appoint an interpreter. But, in view of the claimed difficulty in eliciting answers from the witnesses, it is insisted that the trial court erred in refusing to permit counsel for the defendant to propound leading questions. Leading questions are ordinarily permissible only in the discretion of the trial court. The record shows that, even though leading questions were not permitted, the testimony sought to be adduced by those questions was subsequently elicited from the witnesses by the use of simple language. Obviously, therefore, there was no abuse of the discretion of the trial court.

[15] We cannot take seriously the complaint that the trial court refused to permit the defendant, when testifying as a witness, to explain his answers. In the instances complained of the witness had fully and completely answered the questions put to him. The trial court rightfully refused to permit him to explain, upon the ground that he had already fully and completely answered the questions and upon the theory that any explanation would be no more nor less than a volunteer statement.

It is argued that the trial court by its frequent interruptions, of its own motion, of the counsel and of the witnesses for the defense, seriously impaired and impeached the defendant's case. After a perusal of the cold record before us, we cannot say that there is any merit in this contention.

We have considered all of the points made concerning the rulings of the trial court where the points have been argued in detail in the briefs and which we consider worthy of discussion. Complaint, however, is made that the trial court in numerous other instances erroneously permitted the prosecution to introduce immaterial matters for the purpose of attacking the credibility of the witnesses for the defense. No argument is made in support of this contention, other than a general reference to the transcript, and in one instance no reference is made to the transcript at all. We have nevertheless made an examination of the record, and do not find the points last referred to merit serious discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [16] The petition for a rehearing is denied. We deem it necessary, however, to say that the original opinion is not to be construed as holding that, where counsel for the defendant in his argument to the jury, departing from the record, comments upon facts and circumstances not appearing in evidence in the case, the district attorney will be justified in his reply argument in referring to matters and things which have no substantial basis in the evidence adduced upon the entire case. Manifestly, such misconduct of counsel for the defendant, in any given case, occurring at the trial, or during the argument to the jury, will not suffice to justify similar misconduct of the district attorney.

The argument complained of in the instant case was, in effect, a statement, prompted by a suggestion from counsel for the defendant, that crime, as a result of the lax administration of justice, was on the increase, and that juries should do their duty. Such an argument, it seems, would have been permissible, even if it had not been prompted by counsel for the defendant. People v. Molina, 126 Cal. 505, 508, 59 Pac. 34; People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 92, 102, 122 Pac. 435.

EISENBERG et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 11111.)

1. Courts 🔑487(1)—Supreme Court's order denying transfer of case approves decision, but not necessarily all reasoning.

Supreme Court's order, denying petition for transfer of a case to itself after decision in the district court of appeal, is approval of that court's conclusion but not necessarily all its reasoning.

2. Appeal and error 🔑436—Perfection of appeal divests superior court of jurisdiction only of matters embraced in judgment or order appealed from.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 946, perfection of an appeal divests superior court of jurisdiction of all matters embraced in the judgment or order appealed from, but not upon any other matter embraced in the action.

3. Appeal and error 🔑447—Order for injunction pending appeal held not an "order upon or embraced within order appealed from," within statute divesting court's jurisdiction after perfection of appeal.

An order for injunction, pending appeal from a judgment, or order denying injunction, is not an order upon or embraced in the order appealed from, within Code Civ. Proc. § 946, divesting the trial court of jurisdiction in such cases when appeal is perfected.

4. Appeal and error 🔑447—Right to dissolve injunction pending appeal, limited to one granted without notice.

The right to dissolve or modify an injunction, pending appeal, is limited to cases where it was granted without notice to other party.

5. Judgment 🔑294, 336—Motions 🔑58, 59(1)—Trial court may modify or vacate judgment or order only in statutory manner.

A judgment or order, once regularly entered, can be modified or vacated by the trial court only in manner prescribed by statute.

6. Appeal and error 🔑447—Judge granting without notice injunction pending appeal could vacate it.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 532, 937, an order granting temporary injunction pending appeal, without notice could be vacated or modified.

7. Courts 🔑107—Modification of Supreme Court opinion by striking words indicated merely that matter stricken was not involved.

Supreme Court's modification of its opinion by striking out statement that if injunction bond was insufficient, application should be made to the trial court for relief did not determine that no power remained in the trial court to grant such relief, but merely that the question was not involved.

8. Appeal and error 🔑447—When petitioner relied on restraining order, court could not annul it pending appeal.

The court, on principles analogous to estoppel, cannot annul or modify a restraining order pending appeal, where petitioner filed a bond, and incurred expenses and liability in reliance on it.

Application for writ of review by Ernest Eisenberg and another, directed to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and Frank J. Murasky, Judge thereof, to annul order vacating restraining order. Writ denied.

Gavin McNab and Nat Schmulowitz, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of review to annul an order of the respondent court vacating a restraining order theretofore granted by it for the purpose of preserving the status quo pending an appeal. The petitioners herein had commenced an action in the respondent court for an injunction, and upon the filing of their complaint made an application for an injunction pendente lite. An order to show cause was issued thereon, and, after a full hearing thereof, the court denied petitioners' application for an injunction pendente lite, and discharged the order to show cause. Desiring to appeal from the order denying their application for a temporary injunction, petitioners then applied to the trial judge for a restraining order to preserve the status quo pending such appeal. This application was made several days after the order denying the temporary injunction, and was made ex parte without any notice to the defendants in said action. The trial judge granted the application, and made an order for the issuance of a restraining order upon the filing and approval of a bond in the sum of $1,000. The bond was duly filed and approved, the restraining order pending the appeal issued, and thereupon petitioners perfected their appeal. Thereafter the defendants duly served and filed their notice of motion in the alternative, either to vacate the order for an injunction pending the appeal or that the bond upon such injunction be increased from $1,000 to $90,000. Upon the hearing thereof these petitioners objected to the jurisdiction of that court to hear and determine the motion on the ground that it was without jurisdiction so to do. The matter was argued and submitted, and the respondent court thereafter made an order vacating the injunction pending the appeal which had theretofore been issued. This last is the order which petitioners are here seeking to annul.

[1-3] Respondent takes the position that the trial court, having made its order denying the application for an injunction pendente lite, had no power to thereafter grant such an injunction to be effective pending the appeal; that its order granting the same was void, and that its subsequent order vacating the same (which is the one here under attack) was therefore properly made. In the case of City of Pasadena v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 781, 109 Pac. 620, the main question before this court was whether a superior court in an action brought to obtain an injunction may, in its judgment denying the right to such injunction, provide, nevertheless, for continuing in force pending a final determination of the action (on appeal) an injunction preliminarily issued. After an exhaustive consideration of the authorities, this court answered that question in the affirmative, resting its conclusion upon the constitutional grant vesting the superior court with "original jurisdiction in all cases in equity," and holding that the power to maintain the status quo by continuing an injunction pending an appeal is an inherent part of such equity jurisdiction. In Pierce v. City of Los Angeles, 159 Cal. 516, 114 Pac. 818, this court held that, after judgment has been rendered in favor of defendants, denying an injunction, and prior to an appeal being taken therefrom, the superior court has jurisdiction, under the Code of Civil Procedure, § 681, in the exercise of a wise discretion, and to preserve the status quo, to make an order restraining the defendants from performing the acts complained of pending the determination of a motion for new trial. In Mulvey v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. App. 514, 135 Pac. 53, a preliminary restraining order was issued and served. Thereafter, upon a hearing thereon, the court announced its decision sustaining a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend, dissolving the restraining order and directing a judgment of dismissal. Prior to the entry thereof the plaintiffs moved, upon notice to the defendants, for an order reviving the original restraining order, for the purpose of preserving the status quo pending the appeal, which motion, after a hearing thereon, was granted. Thereupon the appeal was perfected to this court, and thereafter, the superior court being about to grant a motion of defendants for a modification of such injunctional order, the District Court of Appeal issued its writ of prohibition restraining it from so doing. The District Court apparently rested its decision upon the conclusion that the order for an injunction pending the appeal was a matter embraced within the judgment, and that therefore when the appeal was perfected the effect thereof was to deprive the trial court of the power to proceed further. The order of this court denying a petition for a transfer to this court after said decision of the District Court of Appeal may be taken as an approval of the conclusion there reached, but not necessarily of all the reasoning contained in that opinion. It is clear that the perfection of an appeal divests the superior court of jurisdiction as to all matters embraced in the judgment or order appealed from. 2 Cal. Jur. 415, and cases cited. It is equally clear that the perfection of an appeal does not deprive the lower court of its jurisdiction to proceed upon any other matter embraced in the action, unless it is a proceeding "upon the judgment or order appealed from, or upon the matters embraced therein." Code Civ. Proc. § 946; 2 Cal. Jur. 418 et seq. An order for an injunction to preserve the status quo pending an appeal from a judgment or order denying an injunction is not an order upon or embraced in the order appealed from. While it is in a sense appurtenant to and concurrent therewith, it is nevertheless separate and separable therefrom. It may perhaps be said to be collateral to the order appealed from, but it is doubtful that it may be regarded as even incidental thereto, as costs may be said to be incidental to a judgment. The real reason why the trial court had no jurisdiction to vacate or modify the order which it had theretofore made for the issuance of an injunction pending the appeal is summed up in the following language in the opinion in Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 525, 78 Pac. 12:

> "The decision of the trial court having been once made after regular submission of the motion its power is exhausted—it is functus officio." (Italics added.)

[4] In the case of United Railroads v. Superior Court, 170 Cal. 755, 151 Pac. 129, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 199, the obverse of this question was presented. There the trial court, after a full hearing upon notice of the application for an injunction pendente lite, had granted the same. Thereupon the defendants, desiring to appeal from that order, made application to the trial court for an order suspending and staying the operation of the preliminary injunction pending the appeal therefrom. The trial judge having announced his intention of granting that application, this court issued its writ of prohibition restraining him from so doing. The court in its opinion reviewed a long line of decisions of the courts of this state showing that for a period of more than 50 years the rule has been firmly established that the superior court may not revoke, modify, or otherwise disturb its judgments and orders regularly made, except in the manner prescribed by statute. It showed the specific application of this rule to provisional injunctions, resulting uniformly in the holding that the right to move for dissolution or modification of such an injunction is limited to cases where the injunction was granted without notice. Natoma Water & Mining Co. v. Clarkin, 14 Cal. 544, 551; Hicks v. Michael, 15 Cal. 107, 117; Natoma Water & Mining Co. v. Parker, 16 Cal. 83; Curtis v. Sutter, 15 Cal. 265; Ots v. Superior Court, 10 Cal. App. 168, 101 Pac. 431;

2 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 191. The conclusion thus arrived at is summed up in the quotation above made from Holtum v. Greif, supra, in the statement that "the decision of the trial court having been once made after regular submission of the motion its power is exhausted—it is functus officio." The court there recognized the rule, that, when the trial court has denied the provisional injunction or permanent injunction prayed for, it may nevertheless, in contemplation of an appeal, grant such injunction pending the appeal in order to preserve the subject of the litigation until the final determination thereof, so that such determination when made shall not be rendered nugatory. It pointed out that this rule could not be invoked to support the modification of the provisional injunction there proposed, for the reason that its effect would be precisely the opposite. Instead of preserving the status quo, it would lead to the destruction thereof. The provisions of sections 525 to 533 of the Code of Civil Procedure were there considered and held to be reasonable and valid regulations lawfully imposed by the Legislature upon the mode and manner of the exercise by the courts of their constitutional jurisdiction in equity.

Respondent insists that the rule of the Pasadena and Pierce Cases, supra, is applicable only to a case wherein the action has proceeded in the trial court to judgment, and an appeal is to be taken therefrom, and that it is not applicable to a case such as the one at bar wherein the appeal is to be taken from an order denying the provisional injunction prior to trial and judgment. This question has not been directly decided in this state so far as we are advised. The case of American Trading Co. v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 222 Pac. 142, presented a case which was similar in this respect to the case at bar. There, also, the trial court denied an application for an injunction pendente lite, and granted a restraining order pending the appeal therefrom, but the question here raised was not there decided, for the reason that the parties thereto expressly conceded the validity of the restraining order so made. We do not find it necessary to decide that question here. We shall assume for the purposes hereof that the restraining order granted herein pending the appeal from the order denying the provisional injunction was valid when made.

[5-7] As was pointed out above, the rule is well settled that a judgment or order once regularly entered can be modified or vacated by the court which entered it only in the manner prescribed by statute, and it remains to consider whether or not the statute prescribes any method by which the restraining order pending appeal herein might be vacated or modified by the court which granted it. The order here under consideration was made ex parte and without notice to the adverse party. Section 937, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that "an order made out of court, without notice to the adverse party, may be vacated or modified, without notice, by the judge who made it; or may be vacated or modified on notice, in the manner in which other motions are made." If there be any room for doubt as to the applicability of this general rule to provisional injunctions which have been granted ex parte, we turn to section 532, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that: "If an injunction is granted without notice to the person enjoined, he may apply upon reasonable notice to the judge who granted the injunction, or to the court in which the action was brought, to dissolve or modify the same," and prescribes the method to be followed in making such application, which was followed herein. This provision plainly reserved to the respondent court the jurisdiction and power to vacate or modify the restraining order granted by it without notice to the defendants. Petitioners do not seriously contend that the perfection of the appeal herein had the effect of divesting that court of such jurisdiction, but they do contend that the American Trading Company Case, supra, is authority directly to the contrary of the conclusion here reached. In that case, as in the one at bar, plaintiff appealed from an order denying the temporary injunction and secured a restraining order pending the appeal. No separate or express notice was given to the defendants in that case of the application for the restraining order. It was urged before this court upon a review thereof that the restraining order was void, because no notice of the application therefor was given to the defendants. It appeared from the record therein that the restraining order pending appeal was granted on the same day that the court directed the entry of an order denying the application for an injunction pendente lite and before the entry thereof. The court in its opinion did not expressly refer to this fact, but said that the jurisdiction of the trial court to make the restraining order could be sustained only "on the theory that the order granting the injunction pending the appeal is a portion of the order denying the injunction pendente lite," and "is necessarily based upon the notice and hearing for the injunction pendente lite, consequently no other notice is necessary." The question whether the trial court, having granted the restraining order, retained any jurisdiction to vacate or modify the same, was not there involved. The opinion as originally filed therein contained the statement that, "if in the judgment of the petitioner the bond given by the appellant was insufficient to protect it, application should be made to the trial court for relief in the premises." Thereafter the opinion was modified by striking this sentence therefrom. This modification is not to be regarded as a determination or indication on the part of this court that no power remained in the trial court to grant such relief, but merely that this question was not involved in that case.

[8] Petitioners contend that, inasmuch as they have, in reliance upon the order of the respondent court, filed a bond herein and thus incurred expense and subjected themselves to liability, and thus procured the restraining order here in question, the respondent court should be held to be precluded from either vacating or modifying the restraining order, upon principles analogous to estoppel. They cite as authority for this contention the cases of Lee Chuck v. Quan Wo Chong Co., 81 Cal. 222, 227, 22 Pac. 594, 15 Am. St. Rep. 50; Hubbard v. University Bank, 120 Cal. 632, 52 Pac. 1070, and Jameson v. Chanslor-Canfield, etc., Oil Co., 173 Cal. 612, 160 Pac. 1066. These cases do not so hold, as we read them. They hold that merely when a stay bond upon appeal has been filed pursuant to the requirements of sections 941 to 946, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in full compliance with the requirements thereof, the appeal is perfected, and all further proceedings in the court below are thereby stayed, and it has no power thereafter to require a bond to be given in a larger amount, and that this is so, even though the amount of the bond so given was fixed by the court upon an ex parte application. This conclusion was arrived at, however, not by an application of the rules of estoppel or of principles analogous thereto, but upon consideration of the fact that the Code sections above cited grant to an appellant a clear right to procure a stay of proceedings by a compliance with the requirements thereof. When an appellant has so complied with these requirements, further proceedings in the court below are stayed, not by virtue of the action of the trial court in fixing the amount of the bond, but ipso facto by virtue of the provisions of the statute. In the Lee Chuck Case the appellant had no such absolute right to a stay, unless the trial court so directed, and the court there held that, when such direction was given, the Code sections last cited at once became operative, and upon compliance with the requirements thereof further proceedings upon the judgment were stayed thereby precisely as in other cases, under the express terms of section 946. We are of the opinion that the respondent court in vacating the restraining order here in question was acting in the exercise of the jurisdiction so to do reserved in it by the provisions of sections 937 and 532 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is therefore ordered that the petition for a writ of review be denied, and the order to show cause discharged.

MAHONY v. HAINES. (Civ. 4507.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 8, 1924. Rehearing Denied May 8, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 5, 1924.)

1. Attorney and client ⚿166(4) — Showing necessary for attorney to recover on contract for conducting action, stated.

For attorney to recover on contract for services in conduct of action he must show termination of litigation, or excuse for nonperformance of contract.

2. Fraud ⚿31—Contract induced by fraud may be affirmed and damages recovered.

For fraud of broker instructed to purchase stock at market price, and reporting purchase at price discovered by principal, after part payment, to be above market price, principal need not rescind and sue for money paid, but can affirm contract, as he does by demanding stock and return of overcharge, and likewise by subsequent payment, to prevent threatened resale, of balance claimed by broker to be due him, and then sue for damages for fraud; affirmance of contract not being affirmance or waiver of fraud.

3. Appeal and error ⚿1172(3)—Reversal in toto necessary where recoveries not segregated and one of two causes not maintainable.

Judgment for plaintiff in action on two quantum meruit claims, one not maintainable, must be reversed in toto, recoveries not being segregated, and record furnishing no means for division.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by W. H. Mahony against Byron W. Haines. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Charles F. O'Callaghan and Fred C. Peterson, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. H. Mahony, of Larkspur, pro se.

TYLER, P. J. This action was one brought by plaintiff, an attorney and counselor at law, to recover the sum of $650, alleged to be the reasonable value of certain legal services rendered by him to defendant. Judgment went in his favor for the sum of $250. Motion for a new trial was made and denied, and defendant appeals.

It is claimed that the evidence is insufficient as a matter of law to warrant the finding of the trial court that plaintiff rendered and performed for and on behalf of the defendant professional services of the value for which judgment was given.

The facts leading up to the controversy may be briefly stated as follows: Defendant had purchased through a brokerage firm known as Andrews & Co., of which one H. B. Blackstone was manager, certain shares of stock in a corporation. Defendant was induced to make the purchase by Blackstone upon representations that the stock was a safe and profitable investment. Blackstone was instructed to purchase fifty shares of the stock at the market price. The stock was not listed, but was dealt in as a curb stock on the New York Curb Exchange. Defendant was ignorant of its value, and he relied entirely on the statements of Blackstone with reference thereto. Blackstone reported to defendant that he had made the purchase and had paid $100 per share for the stock. Defendant from time to time made payments upon the purchase price, aggregating $4,000, and he was credited with the further sum of $200, representing dividends upon said shares of stock received by said brokerage firm, leaving a balance due of the sum of $800. Defendant subsequently learned that the stock at the time of its purchase was quoted at about $51 a share, and could have been bought around that figure. Upon ascertaining this fact he consulted plaintiff as to his rights in the matter, and was advised by him that the amount of the overcharge could be recovered. Plaintiff and defendant thereupon entered into a contract, by the terms of which defendant agreed to pay plaintiff 25 per cent. of all sums he might recover from said brokers. Blackstone had been demanding immediate payment of the balance due upon the transaction, and had threatened defendant that unless immediate payment was made the stock would be sold. According to the testimony of defendant, he had informed plaintiff that if he was compelled to make the payment in order to prevent a sale he would do so, as he wanted the stock. Plaintiff advised defendant that if he made the payment he would be precluded from recovering the amount of the overcharge. The brokerage firm continued to request payment of said alleged balance, and plaintiff thereupon, in a formal communication to Andrews & Co., informed them that an overcharge had been made, and demanded that the stock be delivered to defendant and the excess payment returned. The firm refused to comply with this demand. Plaintiff then interviewed its members, and from such interview and certain investigations on his part concluded that his client had been swindled, and he reported the matter to the district attorney of San Francisco. He also filed charges with the corporation commissioner with the object in view of procuring a revocation of the brokerage licenses of Andrews & Co. and Blackstone, in the hope that such action would bring about restitution of the overcharge. Notwithstanding these proceedings Blackstone persisted in his demand upon defendant that he pay the balance claimed to be due, accompanied by the threat that in default of payment the stock would be sold in satisfaction of the claim, and, in order to protect his stock, defendant, contrary to the advice of plaintiff, complied with the demand, and the stock was delivered to him. Plaintiff thereupon advised defendant that he had by this act ratified the transaction and destroyed his right to maintain an action to recover the money out of which he had been defrauded, and that he could therefore no longer conduct defendant's case. Thereafter this action was brought by him to recover the reasonable value of the services he had rendered.

It was his claim below, and is here, that, where an attorney contracts with a client to perform services upon a contingent basis, and his client settles the matter in controversy without the attorney's knowledge or consent, thereby preventing the attorney from fully performing the services agreed, the attorney may recover upon a quantum meruit the reasonable value of services actually performed. The appellant, while not disputing the accuracy of this statement of law, contends that in the case at bar the payment by him of the $800 to Andrews & Co. for the purpose of protecting his stock from the threatened sale did not constitute prevention of performance nor furnish any adequate excuse for plaintiff's failure to fully carry out his contract.

[1, 2] In order for an attorney to recover upon a contract for services in the conduct of an action it is necessary for him to show an actual termination of the litigation in which he is employed unless he can show an excuse for lack of performance of his contract. In seeking relief for the fraud practiced upon his client plaintiff could on his behalf have pursued different remedies. He could have rescinded the contract and sued to recover the money paid thereon, or he could have insisted upon performance of the contract and brought an action in deceit for damages. It is clearly shown by the evidence that the plaintiff himself was not in favor of rescinding the contract, knowing that his client wanted the stock; and, indeed, the transaction was ratified by the formal notice to the brokerage firm above mentioned, demanding the stock and the return of the overcharge, as well as by the subsequent payment by defendant of the balance demanded, after full knowledge of the fraud perpetrated upon him.

But these acts did not constitute a waiver of the defendant's right to recover damages for the fraud based upon the fact that the benefit he received was not that which under the representations of the broker he was entitled to receive. The affirmance of the contract was not an affirmance or waiver of the fraud. Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 Pac. 729. Defendant's act amounted to no more than consent to be bound by the agreement, and was not a release or waiver of his claim for damages arising from the fraud practiced upon him. True, there was no legal obligation on defendant's part to complete the excessive payment, as he could in an action for damages have paid the money into court and restrained the brokers from selling his stock until the question of fraud should be determined; but his failure to exercise this right in no manner prevented him from pursuing his remedy for restitution of the overcharge. This being so, defendant's act in making the payment did not, as claimed, prevent any possible recovery against the brokerage firm or entitle plaintiff to abandon the performance of his contract. He was not, therefore, entitled to recover compensation from the defendant for his uncompleted services.

[3] During the time that plaintiff was engaged in taking steps for the protection of the defendant's interests in the stock purchase above referred to he was consulted by defendant in regard to another stock transaction with the same brokerage firm. The plaintiff made some investigation into the matter, and furnished to the defendant his opinion as to the latter's legal rights with reference thereto, and in the present suit compensation is also sought for the service thus rendered, and which, it is apparent from the record, was not covered by the existing agreement between the parties. Testimony was introduced as to the value of these services, and the judgment given in plaintiff's favor includes some allowance for them, which, however, is not segregated from the allowance for the remainder of plaintiff's services, and the record furnishes no means for dividing the amount of the judgment between the two matters in which the plaintiff was employed.

It follows from what we have said that the appellant's contention that the judgment is not supported by the evidence in the case must be sustained, with the consequent reversal of the judgment.

Judgment reversed.

We concur: KNIGHT, J.; ST. SURE, J.

PEOPLE v. MULLINS. (Cr. 1167.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 9, 1924.)

1. Highways 🔑186—Evidence held to sustain conviction for driving automobile while intoxicated.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for driving automobile while intoxicated.

2. Criminal law 🔑465—Testimony of qualified witnesses that automobile driver intoxicated held admissible.

In prosecution for driving automobile while intoxicated, witnesses who stated symptoms on which they based their opinions as to whether defendant was intoxicated were properly permitted to give opinions.

3. Criminal law 🔑811(2)—Refusal of instruction as to effect of particular circumstance as indication of intoxication held not error.

In prosecution for driving automobile while intoxicated, in which none of the witnesses who testified to intoxication based testimony on any one circumstance, refusal to instruct as to effect of particular circumstance as indication of intoxication held proper.

4. Criminal law 🔑814(10)—Refusal of instruction defining "intoxication" in certain way held proper, in view of testimony.

In prosecution for driving automobile while intoxicated, in which evidence showed that defendant, when intoxicated, became dull, sleepy, and sodden, refusal of instruction finding "intoxication" as a high excitement of mind and elation arising sometimes to frenzy and delerium held proper.

5. Criminal law 🔑304(3)—Matter of common knowledge that intoxication makes some persons dull, sleepy, and sodden.

In prosecution for driving automobile while intoxicated, held, that it is a matter of common knowledge that some persons react to influence of intoxicating liquors by becoming dull, rather than by becoming frenzied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

James T. Mullins was convicted of driving automobile while intoxicated, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. O. Traber, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered upon a verdict of a jury finding him guilty of driving an automobile upon the public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor.

[1] Appellant contends that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence. We have read the entire transcript of the evidence, and it contains ample testimony from which the jury was justified in finding the defendant guilty as charged. The fact that the defendant and his nephew testified that defendant was not intoxicated merely raised a conflict in the evidence, as did also the fact, urged by the appellant, that the symptoms shown by the defendant at the time of his arrest and narrated by the witnesses are compatible with the statement of defendant that he was merely tired and sleepy on the afternoon when he was arrested, and was leaning out over the side of his automobile because it was his habit to do so when driving rather than to look through the windshield; that he was following this habit when he was arrested because the windshield was dirty, although it could be seen through. The justice of the peace before whom the defendant was brought immediately after his arrest, the constable and traffic officer who made the arrest, all testified that they had seen many intoxicated persons, and recognized that condition when they saw it, and that the defendant was intoxicated at the time of his arrest, and they based their opinions upon the facts which they enumerated, i. e., that defendant was swerving in his automobile from one side of the road to the other, frequently going off the roadway into the dirt on his right-hand side, and driving automobiles coming from the opposite direction off of the highway into the dirt on his left-hand side; that he was hanging out over the side of the automobile, and that his entire appearance indicated intoxication, and his breath was redolent of alcoholic liquor when he was arrested. Defendant admitted drinking some wine on the day of his arrest. There is no merit, therefore, in the contention that the evidence does not warrant the verdict.

[2] Appellant objects to the action of the trial court in overruling his objection to the testimony of the arresting officers and of the justice of the peace relative to the condition of defendant at the time of his arrest. This objection was made upon the ground that these witnesses were not qualified to give opinions on the subject. Each of these witnesses stated the symptoms upon which he based his opinion, and we think the objections were properly overruled. "Whether a person was intoxicated is one of the most familiar subjects of nonexpert opinion evidence." 11 R. C. L. 608, § 31.

[3] It is also urged that error was committed by the court in refusing to give three instructions offered by defendant. One of these instructions was to the effect that weariness was not of itself an indication of intoxication, but was only a circumstance, which, taken with other circumstances, might lead to the conclusion that the person was intoxicated, and another instruction was to the effect that the odor of intoxicating liquor upon the breath of a person would not, of itself, indicate intoxication, but was only a circumstance which, taken with other circumstances, might lead to the conclusion that the person was intoxicated. A failure to give these instructions does not warrant a reversal of the judgment. None of the witnesses who testified to the intoxication of the defendant based his testimony upon any one circumstance alone, but upon a combination of circumstances, and it was these opinions which were before the jury upon the question of intoxication. If the jury believed the testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution—and they must have done so to have brought in a verdict against the defendant—they could not have believed that either of the circumstances mentioned in the requested instructions stood alone and by itself as evidence against the defendant.

[4, 5] The only other instruction complained of is the instruction to the effect that "intoxication is a high excitement of mind and elation or condition of mind that arises to enthusiasm sometimes to frenzy and sometimes to delirium, and that intoxicating liquors are such liquors which taken create this high excitement of mind, enthusiasm or elation, frenzy or delirium, and, unless you find from the testimony that the mind of the defendant at the time he is charged with committing the offense was in a high state of excitement, or was elated or had arisen to enthusiasm or frenzy, that the defendant was not guilty of being under the influence of intoxicating liquor." We think the instruction was properly refused. It is a matter of common knowledge that some persons react to the influence of intoxicating liquors by becoming dull, sleepy, and sodden rather than delirious or frenzied, and from the testimony in the record, the defendant was of this type.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

ST. CLAIR v. JOOS. (Civ. 4691.)

1. Courts 🔑114—Court not authorized to enter stay of execution nunc pro tunc except to correct record.

In entering nunc pro tunc order staying proceedings pending appeal, the court is not authorized to do more than to make its records correspond with the actual facts, and cannot under the form of an amendment make a record or judgment that was never in fact made.

2. Forcible entry and detainer 🔑45—Stay of execution held not to result from acts of judges other than trial judge.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1176, providing an appeal taken by defendant in unlawful detainer suit shall not stay proceedings on judgment unless the trial judge so directs, a stay of execution held not to result from the acts of various other judges taking part in subsequent proceedings for approval of undertaking.

3. Forcible entry and detainer 🔑45—Mere filing of undertaking held not to effectuate stay of execution.

The mere filing of an undertaking would not effectuate a stay of execution in unlawful detainer under Code Civ. Proc. § 1176.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by Martha J. St. Clair against Rachel E. Joos. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. On application for writ of supersedeas. Writ denied.

F. E. Davis, of Los Angeles, and L. E. Dadmun, of San Diego, for appellant.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles (Joseph Musgrove, W. W. Wallace, and Harold J. Cashin, all of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Judgment having been given for the plaintiff and respondent in a suit in unlawful detainer, the defendant appealed and furnished undertaking for an attempted stay of execution, and the sureties thereon justified pursuant to notice. About six months later respondent moved the court for an order to require a new bond upon the ground that the sureties had become insufficient, and such order being granted, new sureties were furnished; but after several continuances of the hearing failed to qualify.

Appellant contends that execution was stayed, and here seeks a supersedeas, contending: (1) That the sureties tendered on the new undertaking should have been accepted upon the showing made in the court below, and that this court ought to approve such undertaking; or (2) that appellant having shown good faith, she is entitled to have execution stayed upon furnishing another undertaking, and that if it afforded the opportunity to do so, she can obtain bondsmen capable of justifying in the amount required.

The issues were tried and judgment entered thereon March 28, 1923, by Hon. F. M. Jamison of Modoc county, and on May 25th Hon. L. H. Valentine of Los Angeles county made an order reciting that—

> "Upon the hearing in the above-entitled action this day held, at which both parties were represented by respective counsel, the amount of the undertaking on appeal in the above-entitled action is hereby fixed at the sum of $3,000."

Previously, and on the 18th of April, 1923, an undertaking in the sum of $1,500 was filed, and pursuant to notice of exception to sureties served May 8th, they appeared and justified. On June 16th counsel for appellant wired Judge Jamison at Alturas:

> "Presiding judge here made orders fixing amount of undertakings on appeals, examined the sureties thereon, approved the undertakings, and same are filed. It may be necessary however under section eleven seventy-six C. C. P. for you as trial judge to grant order staying execution. Will you kindly do so and mail such order to me at once wiring me to that effect at my expense."

On June 19th Judge Jamison replied by wire as follows:

> "Will make orders staying execution in two cases of Sinclair against Joos. Have not data at hand to prepare orders. Prepare them and send them to me and I will sign and send clerk for filing."

It is stipulated that the predecessor of the present counsel for appellant would testify that to the best of his recollection he prepared such order, and that he was under the impression that the same was signed. However, it is further stipulated that—

> "There is not on file among the papers in the case of St. Clair v. Joos, No. 111662, any written order signed by Hon. F. M. Jamison staying the execution of the judgment rendered in said case, and that the register of actions in said case does not show that any such order was made."

On November 17th respondent served upon appellant a notice of motion for a new bond upon the ground that the sureties on the undertaking theretofore filed by appellant had become insufficient, and on December 17th Hon. Victor R. McLucas signed an order reciting that, it appearing from an examination of said sureties that since the giving of said undertaking they had become insufficient, appellant should give a new undertaking in the sum of $3,000, and that the time therefor be extended to January 3, 1924. An undertaking was filed by appellant on the 2d day of January, 1924, and objection to their sufficiency having been made by respondent, the sureties appeared before Hon. John M. York on January 18th and testified. The court then suggested that said sureties sign a new bond, and on January 30th another undertaking was filed, the matter having been continued from time to time, and on February 1st, upon objection by respondent, the court refused to accept said sureties, and declined to grant further time requested by appellant for the production of additional sureties. Appellant was served on February 2d with a notice to vacate the premises in suit.

On February 19, 1924, Judge Jamison signed, and thereafter there was placed on file, the following order:

> "Good cause appearing therefor, and by virtue of the power and authority vested in me by the provisions of section 1176 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California, as the judge who tried the above-entitled action, it is hereby ordered, and this does hereby order and direct that the proceedings upon the judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff in the above-entitled action against the above-named defendant are hereby stayed, and that the defendant is hereby required to give a bond and undertaking staying execution of the judgment rendered in the above-entitled action, the amount of said undertaking to be fixed by any judge of the above-entitled court. Dated this 23d day of June, 1923. Witness my hand this February 19th, 1924, as of the date of June 23d, 1923. F. M. Jamison, Judge of Said Superior Court and Judge Who Tried Said Cause."

From the foregoing it appears that neither the files nor the register of actions reveals any order staying execution made by Judge Jamison, who tried the case, except that of February 19, 1924, which was dated back nearly eight months; also, that the only bond which was ever approved was filed a month and 21 days after the date of the judgment.

This petition for supersedeas must be denied for several reasons.

[1] Whether or not the judge who is required by statute to decide whether execution shall be stayed pending appeal may delegate the power to fix the amount of bond, no order conferring such authority was in existence when the amount was fixed at $3,000, or when the sureties were accepted; but assuming that Judge Jamison's order of February 19, 1924, apparently intended as one nunc pro tunc, could have been made and filed to supply a discrepancy in the record of the case concerning acts which had in fact taken place, there is no record of a stay having actually been granted prior to that order, nor does the order recite that such was the fact. In the Estate of Skerrett, 80 Cal. 62, 63, 22 Pac. 85, the Supreme Court said of such an order:

> "Where all the conditions upon which the entry of a judgment or order depends exist, and the making or entry of the order is a mere ministerial duty or matter of course, and the performance of the duty is neglected or delayed, or where an order has actually been made and its entry omitted, we suppose it may be subsequently entered, and if justice requires, may be made to take effect nunc pro tunc, as of the date when it was actually made, or at any time when existing conditions imposed upon the court or its officer the duty of entering it. But here the making of the order in question rested entirely in the discretion of the superior judge, and was never a matter of course. Therefore, it could never have an existence until his discretion was exercised. And if it was actually made prior to February 5th, and its entry omitted, the fact that it was so made at the proper time should be shown by the record of the superior court."

In Hegeler v. Henckell, 27 Cal. 491, it was held that corrections may be made nunc pro tunc, but that the record itself must show the error. And in Kaufman v. Shain, 111 Cal. 16, 19, 43 Pac. 393, 394 (52 Am. St. Rep. 139), it was said:

> "In the exercise of this power the court is not, however, authorized to do more than to make its records correspond with the actual facts, and cannot, under the form of an amendment of its records, correct a judicial error, or make of record an order or judgment that was never in fact given."

[2] Section 1176 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that—

> "An appeal taken by the defendant shall not stay proceedings upon the judgment unless the judge or justice before whom the same was rendered so directs."

Any assertion, therefore, of a stay of execution resulting from the acts of the various judges who took part in the subsequent proceedings, would be ineffectual. Petitioner herein seeks to rely upon the ruling in Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 493, and the line of cases following it; but in McDonald v. Hanlon, 71 Cal. 535, 12 Pac. 515, it was said, as to an action in unlawful detainer:

> "This was an amendment to the Code of March 9, 1880, and it is claimed that the power of accepting an undertaking and directing a stay of proceedings is vested thereby in the court that tried the case exclusively. Such seems to have been the understanding of the statute, for, as has been remarked, application for a stay was first made to the court that tried the case. In this interpretation of the statue we agree, * * *"

And Cluness v. Bowen, 135 Cal. 660, 662, 67 Pac. 1048, 1049, held:

> "The restriction of that section takes the case at bar out of the rule declared in Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 493, as applicable to ordinary civil cases with respect to which there is no such restriction. It was so expressly held by this court in McDonald v. Hanlon, 71 Cal. 535, and by Chief Justice Searls in Gross v. Kelleher, 73 Cal. 639."

Section 681a, Code of Civil Procedure, also provides:

> "The court or the judge thereof shall not have the power, without the consent of the adverse party, to stay, for a longer period than thirty days, the execution of any judgment or order the execution whereof would be stayed on appeal only by the execution of a stay bond."

[3] The mere filing of an undertaking would not effectuate a stay of execution in a case of this nature, and on February 4, 1924, when the petition for supersedeas was filed in this court, the attempted nunc pro tunc order was not in existence. That order and the records being silent as to a stay having been in fact granted, but not entered, the order was ineffectual to create a stay of proceedings as of June 23, 1923, and it cannot be given such effect as of the date it was signed, February 19, 1924; furthermore, the court expressly directs that it be dated, and it obviously was the intention that it be entered as of June 23d. The failure of sureties to justify on the new undertaking, after the original bond had been declared insufficient, would have operated to void any stay of execution, had such previously been granted. Wittram v. Crommelin, 72 Cal. 89, 13 Pac. 160; Swasey v. Adair, 83 Cal. 136, 23 Pac. 284; Duncan v. Times-Mirror Co., 109 Cal. 602, 42 Pac. 147.

> "By virtue of section 1176, the power to stay proceedings upon a judgment in unlawful detainer is vested in the trial judge, and in the absence of such direction this court has no power to order a supersedeas. (Bateman v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 140, 72 Pac. 922.)"

Plummer v. Agoure, 20 Cal. App. 319, 323, 128

Pac. 1014, 1016. See, also, Sarthou v. Reese, 151 Cal. 96, 97, 90 Pac. 187.

The petition for supersedeas is denied.

SMITH et al. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. (Civ. 4205.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 10, 1924.)

1. Railroads 🔑327(3)—Pedestrian not relieved of contributory negligence by condition of headlight.

Where headlight would have been plainly discernible, had deceased pedestrian, before attempting to cross tracks, looked in direction of approaching motor, he was not relieved of contributory negligence, because the direct rays were not thrown on, but above, track.

2. Evidence 🔑8—Judicial notice taken of noise made by speeding electric freight motor.

Court is bound to know that electric motor for hauling freight cars could not, at speed of 25 to 30 miles per hour, have approached pedestrian of ordinary hearing about to cross track, without causing such vibration or rumble of track as would warn him, were he alert and attentive to his duty.

3. Railroads 🔑330(3)—Nonsuit for contributory negligence of pedestrian crossing track held proper.

Nonsuit on ground of contributory negligence of pedestrian, killed while crossing railroad by electric freight motor, held proper, in view of evidence as to headlight of motor and wigwag at nearby crossing, set in motion, with red light and ringing bell, when motor was near track, and judicial notice of noise from motor.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1047(1)—Any error in limiting proof of wigwag at crossing having been out of order to 10 days before accident harmless.

Any error, in action for killing, by electric freight motor, person living at corner of crossing, while recrossing track, in limiting, to 10 days before accident, proof of wigwag at crossing having been out of order, at intervals, so that it would not stop after trains passed, held harmless; there being no evidence or claim that it had not worked properly during that period.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Annie N. Smith and others, as heirs of Archie Smith, deceased, against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

D. A. Stuart, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and W. R. Millar, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action was brought for the recovery of damages caused to plaintiffs by the death of Archie Smith, who was killed upon the railroad tracks of defendant by one of its electric freight motors. Plaintiffs sued as the heirs of deceased. At the conclusion of the evidence offered by plaintiffs the trial court granted a motion for nonsuit on the ground that the evidence showed that deceased lost his life because of his contributory negligence, and judgment went for defendant accordingly. Plaintiffs appeal.

It is contended that the court erred in granting the motion for nonsuit. At the time of his death deceased was of the age of 56 years, well, vigorous, and in the full possession of all his faculties. He resided at one of the four corners formed by the intersection at right angles of respondent's right of way with a certain highway. On another of these corners, directly across respondent's double electric railway tracks from the residence of deceased, was situated a store. At a distance 72 feet from the highway property line a path crossed the tracks in a slightly diagonal direction from a point at or near the residence of deceased to a point at or near the store. Deceased had lived in the same place for a period of about 4 years, and during that time he and other residents in his neighborhood had used the path as a means of going to and returning from the store. The catastrophe which cost deceased his life occurred in the early evening, but after complete nightfall. He had been to the store and had made some purchases there. On returning toward his home along the path which has been mentioned he progressed to the point at which it intersected one of respondent's tracks, and was there run down and instantly killed.

[1] The track along which the motor was proceeding immediately before the accident is straight for a distance of several hundred feet from the point at which deceased was struck. The motor was moving along the right-hand track; that is, it was coming from the direction toward which a person, traveling as was deceased, must have looked to ascertain whether it was dangerous to cross at the moment. The motor was equipped with a headlight which was lighted. The reflection of this light was so placed at the time, however, that its direct rays were not thrown upon the track along which the motor proceeded, but into the air above the track. One witness testified that these rays at a distance of 200 feet in front of the motor were 40 or 50 feet above the ground. Appellants would make much of this condition of affairs, but it cannot avail them. It in no way tends to relieve deceased from the charge of contributory negligence.

While the approaching headlight was not as dazzling as it would have been if its direct rays had been projected along the track, it would have been plainly discernible to deceased if he had looked in the direction of the approaching motor before he attempted to cross, as it was his duty to do. The headlight was actually seen at a distance of 200 feet by persons in an automobile as the freight motor came toward the intersection, and they stopped in order to allow the motor to pass in front of them.

Near respondent's tracks and upon the line of the highway nearest the path already mentioned, being distant from the latter about 72 feet, as already indicated, was located what is known as a wigwag or automatic flagman. This device was maintained by respondent for the purpose of giving warning of the approach of cars or trains toward the intersection. It was excited to action upon the approach of a train to a distance of 600 feet from it and continued its action until the train had passed 300 feet beyond it. When in operation the wigwag oscillated back and forth perceptibly. When it started to operate, and as an accompaniment to its oscillation, a red electric light shone and a bell rang from it. The device was located between the point at which the path crossed the tracks and the direction from which the freight motor came. Before the motor reached the point from which the action of the wigwag was customarily excited, the device was dark, silent, and stationary. At that point the motor set it to work and it operated until after deceased was run down.

[2] Because a witness who was in the automobile above mentioned testified that he heard no noise from the approaching motor, appellants insist that deceased had no warning of its approach from any such source. This argument does not follow from the testimony of the witness, and it runs counter to sense and experience. The standing automobile in which the witness was seated was not itself quiet. Its engine was "running idle," according to the witness, and it did not "make a great deal of noise." This noise must have been sufficient, however, to prevent the witness from hearing the approaching motor, or he must have failed to hear it for some reason other than that it made no sound. The evidence shows that the motor was running at a rate of from 25 to 30 miles per hour at the time of the accident. It was a freight motor; that is, it was used for the purpose of drawing freight cars. We are pointed to no evidence as to its size, but, if we assume that it was a motor of the smallest kind employed in hauling freight trains, or of drawing even a single car, we are bound to know, as was the trial court, that it could not have approached deceased at the rate of speed attributed to it without causing such a vibration or rumble of the track as would have conveyed a vivid warning to him, a person possessed of at least ordinary hearing, as he was, if he were alert and attentive to his duty to himself and to respondent under the law.

[3] Appellants also contend that the motor was traveling at an excessive rate of speed. Also there was evidence that the persons in the automobile at the crossing heard no sound of whistle or bell from it as it approached, and appellants base their argument for a reversal somewhat on that ground. These two claims, as we conceive, cannot, under all the circumstances, have any bearing upon the question of the contributory negligence of deceased. The trial court, from the evidence as to the headlight and the wigwag, and from the judicial knowledge which it had as to the noise made on the tracks by the motor, was bound to draw the inference that deceased, in a moment of abstraction, preoccupation, or aberration, walked negligently into his death. In fact, the evidence as to the headlight and the wigwag, without the other circumstance, must have impelled the court irresistibly to that inference. The motion for nonsuit was properly granted.

[4] Appellants offered to prove that for more than a year preceding the accident the wigwag had not worked properly, or rather had been out of order at intervals. They expected to show that at such times it kept in operation for hours without intermission, not being stopped in its work by trains after they had passed the intersection. They argued, and argue now, that the long residence of deceased at the crossing made him familiar with the shortcomings of the wigwag, and that, under the conditions which they sought to establish by the offered evidence, he would have been relieved of all duty to note the actions of the discredited mechanism. Bearing in mind that the wigwag was inactive just preceding the catastrophe to deceased, and that it sprang into light, sound, and motion upon the approach of the motor, it is to be observed that there was no offer to prove that at any time it ever failed to operate upon the approach of a train when it had been inactive immediately preceding such approach. For this reason it is possible that the offered evidence was entirely immaterial, although as to that point we express no opinion. The trial court refused to admit the evidence as offered, and limited the proof of appellants upon the point to the period of 10 days preceding the accident. It is claimed that the court committed error in so limiting the evidence, but we need not determine that question. There is nothing in the record to show that the wigwag did not act perfectly in all respects during the 10 days, and no claim is made that it did not work perfectly during that time. If the court did err, which we do not decide, the error was therefore harmless. Deceased's familiarity with conditions at the intersection was such that he could not but have known that the wigwag had been working well for 10 days. He had the opportunity during that time to observe its behavior, and especially he had that opportunity when he went to the store to make his purchases. If the conditions as to the mechanism had been different during the 10 days, if it had been in order but part of the time, there would be present some reason for a consideration of the point which appellant makes, although we are not prepared to say that, even in such a situation, the error of the trial court, if for the sake of argument it be conceded that there was one, would have been harmful. It is possible that under the law it would have been incumbent upon deceased, under such a condition, to exercise a higher degree of prudence as to other avenues of protection to himself, by the more narrowly looking for a headlight and noting the vibration of the rails. In practice, the ordinarily prudent man, familiar with conditions at such a crossing, as was deceased by his long residence at the intersection, naturally would be impelled to the exercise of his every power of observation, if he knew that the wigwag was erratic in its action.

Judgment affirmed.

TOON v. PICKWICK STAGES, NORTHERN DIVISION, Inc. (Civ. 4204.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District. Division 2, California. April 7, 1924.)

1. Judgment ⚿139—Trial court must exercise sound discretion in passing upon motion to set aside default.

In considering motions to set aside defaults, trial court must exercise a sound and legal discretion in such a manner as to serve and not defeat or impede ends of substantial justice.

2. Judgment ⚿138(3)—Refusal to set aside default judgment held an abuse of discretion.

Trial court's refusal to set aside a default judgment held to constitute an abuse of discretion, where defendant mailed summons and complaint, in an action for injuries, to his insurance carrier's attorney who had already been apprised of the accident, but who had no knowledge of service of summons and complaint until after default was entered, due to act of an inexperienced clerk, and who, on acquiring such knowledge, moved diligently to set it aside, and whose affidavits disclosed meritorious defense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Louis R. Toon against the Pickwick Stages, Northern Division, Inc., a corporation. From an order denying its motion to vacate a default judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed.

B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles (W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Thompson & Robertson, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion to vacate a default judgment.

The action is one having for its purpose the recovery of damages for injuries suffered by plaintiff in an automobile accident alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Defendant, a California corporation, having its principal place of business in the city of Los Angeles, is a common carrier of passengers by automobile stage. The complaint, which was filed in the superior court for Santa Barbara county on October 21, 1921, alleges that on March 14th of that year, in the city of Santa Barbara, the driver of one of defendant's auto stages so negligently operated his vehicle that it ran into the automobile which plaintiff was driving, thereby injuring the latter.

On October 26, 1921, in the city of Los Angeles, the summons and a copy of the complaint were served upon defendant's secretary. On November 29, 1921, no appearance having been made by defendant within the time allowed by law therefor, plaintiff caused defendant's default to be entered, and on December 30, 1921, after an ex parte hearing of evidence presented by plaintiff, the lower court entered a judgment in plaintiff's favor. Defendant moved expeditiously to set aside the default and the judgment entered thereon by serving and filing on January 7, 1922, its notice of motion under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The showing made by defendant in support of its motion was not contradicted by any evidence on the part of plaintiff. The only question, therefore, is whether the facts set forth in the affidavits filed on behalf of defendant are sufficient to show that it would be an abuse of discretion to deny the motion to open the default.

The affidavits disclose the following: At the time of the accident defendant was insured against loss by the California Highway Indemnity Exchange, a mutual interinsurance association, having an office in the city of Los Angeles, and hereafter referred to as the insurance carrier. The policy of insurance requires the insurance carrier to assume charge and control of all suits and of all litigation arising out of accidents wherein the insured is involved. The insurance carrier employs a "claims attorney," who in this instance acted as counsel for defendant, and to whom, therefore, we shall refer indiscriminately as defendant's attorney and the insurance carrier's claims attorney.

Upon being served with the summons and complaint on October 26, 1921, defendant's secretary caused the documents to be placed in an envelope and mailed to the insurance carrier, whose office, as we have stated, is in the city of Los Angeles. That the papers were received by the insurance carrier in due course is evident from the fact that later when search was made they were found among the files in the office of its claims attorney. No letter of instructions was inclosed with the summons and complaint, and no instructions were given to the officers or agents of the insurance carrier. None of defendant's officers or employees had any knowledge that defendant's default had been entered until notified thereof by defendant's attorney.

Prior to the commencement of this action, and covering a period of some weeks, a correspondence was carried on between attorneys of the Automobile Club of Southern California and defendant's attorney, the purpose of which was to effect a compromise settlement of plaintiff's claim for damages. No satisfactory settlement having been arrived at, plaintiff took his claim out of the hands of the automobile club's attorneys and thereafter caused this action to be commenced by his present counsel.

Not until December 20, 1921, did defendant's attorney have any notice or knowledge that this action had been commenced. On that day, happening to be in the courtroom of the superior court for Santa Barbara county for the purpose of representing this defendant in the trial of another action, he overheard a chance remark which led him to examine the files in the office of the clerk of that court. This examination led to the discovery that summons and complaint had been served upon defendant's secretary and that defendant's default had been entered.

Returning to Los Angeles, defendant's attorney, who, it will be recalled, is the insurance carrier's claims attorney, made an examination of the files in his office. His office, it would seem, is one of a suite of offices rented by his principal, the insurance carrier. The examination disclosed that the summons and complaint had been received in the office. Both documents, together with the envelope in which they had been placed, were "inadvertently filed away by the employees" of the claims attorney in the latter's office, "without calling the matter to [the attorney's] attention." During a period of several months, including the time when the claims attorney was carrying on the correspondence with the attorneys of the automobile club relative to plaintiff's claim and up to the time when the summons and complaint were served, the claims attorney "had several changes in the personnel of his office force, including several new stenographers, whose duty involved the handling and filing of all papers in connection with claims made upon said California Highway Indemnity Exchange." In the affidavit which was made by defendant's attorney and presented to the lower court on the motion to set aside the default it is stated:

> "Through inadvertence and mistake, which ordinary care and diligence on the part of affiant could not have guarded against or overcome, the summons and complaint in this action became filed away in the files in the office of affiant, and were not called directly to his attention for consideration and action thereon."

None of defendant's officers has any personal knowledge of the facts involved in the accident. An investigation of the facts relating to the accident was made by defendant's attorney, who prosecuted inquiries and conducted an examination of the scene of the collision, and, according to his affidavit, "has personal knowledge of the locality, facts and circumstances under which the accident is alleged to have occurred." For this reason he made the affidavit of merits, and sets forth therein facts which, if true, show that defendant has a good and meritorious defense to the action.

[1] The legal principles by which courts are guided in considering motions to set aside defaults are well established and are comparatively simple. The trial court is to exercise a sound and legal discretion in passing upon the application. This discretion is not capricious or arbitrary, but it is an impartial discretion, and is to be exercised in such a manner as to conform with the spirit of the law by subserving and not impeding or defeating the ends of substantial justice. Waite v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 221 Pac. 204. "Section 473," says the court in Nicoll v. Weldon, 130 Cal. 667, 63 Pac. 64, "is a remedial provision, and is to be liberally construed so as to dispose of cases upon their substantial merits, and to give to the party claiming in good faith to have a substantial defense to the action an opportunity to present it. * * * It is for this reason that we more readily listen to an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a default, than where the motion has been granted, since in such case the defendant may be deprived of a substantial right, whereas it may be assumed, if nothing to the contrary is shown, that the plaintiff will be able at any time to establish his cause of action. If, for any reason, he will be unable to do so, that fact should be made to appear; but if he is merely subjected to delay or inconvenience by having the default set aside, he can be compensated therefor by the terms which the court may impose as the condition of granting the motion." See, also, Brasher v. White, 53 Cal. App. 545, 200 Pac. 657.

[2] Tested by these principles we believe that the learned trial court went beyond the limits of a sound judicial discretion in refusing defendant's application to be relieved from the judgment taken against it by default. No negligence or culpability can be predicated of the conduct of defendant's secretary. When that officer was served with the summons and complaint he "thereupon," i. e., immediately, mailed them to his company's insurance carrier, by whom, it seems, they were received in due course of the mail. Under the circumstances of this case it was not incumbent upon defendant's secretary to do more than simply to mail the summons and complaint to the insurance carrier, whose duty it was, under its contract of insurance, to assume charge and control of the action. The facts of the case and the nature of defendant's defense were already known to the insurance carrier's claims attorney, who previously had carried on negotiations with the attorneys of the automobile club for a compromise settlement of plaintiff's claim. Indeed, he knew more about the facts and the merits of the cause than did any of defendant's officers. Obviously such a situation is not at all analogous to that of a defendant who, upon being served with summons, can protect his interests only by seeking some attorney whom he can employ and to whom he must communicate the facts of his case and the nature of his defense. Here, under the terms of defendant's contract with its insurance carrier, an attorney whose duty it was to defend the action was already provided for, and that attorney knew all that the client knew about the case and more.

Nor was there any personal neglect or culpable fault on the part of defendant's attorney. He had no personal knowledge or notice of the service of the summons and complaint until after the default had been entered. As soon as possible after hearing the chance remark which put him upon inquiry he made an investigation, and then with all diligence presented the motion to set aside the default.

The person who was responsible and solely responsible for defendant's failure to appear in the action within the time provided by law is none other than that unidentified, inexperienced employee in the office of the claims attorney who filed the documents in his employer's office files and then failed to call the latter's attention to them. But such thoughtlessness on the part of a new employee inconversant with the office routine was pardonable, and, in so far at least as it affected defendant's rights, his neglect was excusable. What was said by the Supreme Court in Downing v. Klondike Min., etc., Co., 165 Cal. 786, 134 Pac. 970, when considering a somewhat analogous situation, is apposite:

> "Our knowledge of the methods in vogue in law offices convinces us that such a mistake as the one detailed in the affidavits herein might be easily made, and the consequent default might take place without any culpable carelessness on the part of the attorneys of record."

There is nothing to indicate that plaintiff will be prejudiced in any way by a trial upon the merits, especially in view of the fact that it is within the power of the superior court to impose terms in granting the motion; and, since the affidavits disclose a meritorious defense, defendant should be given an opportunity to present that defense.

The order refusing to set aside the judgment by default is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the superior court, with directions to permit the defendant to file an answer to plaintiff's complaint within such time and upon such terms as that court may deem just and proper.

KELSEY v. MILLER et al. (Civ. 4009.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 28, 1924.)

1. Injunction 🔑145—Not issued upon affidavits stated on information and belief.

Generally injunctions may not issue on affidavits contents of which are stated on information and belief.

2. Injunction 🔑144—Allegations held to warrant granting of preliminary injunction though some on information and belief.

A preliminary injunction held warranted on allegations that defendant was about to embezzle property of an estate in his hands, and had conspired with another defendant to defraud the estate, where allegations made upon information and belief pertained to matters peculiarly within knowledge of defendants, and several important allegations were not so made, and all allegations were undenied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Suit by Frank M. Kelsey, special administrator of the Estate of Mary Moore Miller, deceased, against Jared H. Miller, Cecil A. Sheward Miller, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Kimball Fletcher and McDonald & Thompson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant Jared A. Miller.

A. P. Thomson, of Los Angeles, for appellant Cecil A. Sheward Miller.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from an order granting a preliminary injunction. The order was made upon the verified complaint, there having been no showing in the cause contrary to the one made by that pleading. The allegations of the complaint are set forth, in part, in the opinion of this court in Miller v. Superior Court, 59 Cal. App. 334, 210 Pac. 832.

It is contended by appellants that the trial court, sitting as it was in the exercise of its ordinary powers as a court of equity, was without jurisdiction to grant the preliminary injunction. This point is made upon the ground that the relief asked for in the complaint was grantable only by the superior court in the exercise of its probate jurisdiction in the matter of the estate of Mary Moore Miller, deceased. This point, however, is no longer open, as it was settled adversely to the contention of appellants in Miller v. Superior Court, supra.

Appellants' next contention is that the complaint fails to allege facts warranting the issuance of the preliminary injunction, which, to state its effect in general terms, restrained appellants from dealing with and from removing from defendant banks or from the state any of the moneys or properties averred in the complaint to belong to the estate of Mary Moore Miller, deceased. In passing upon this contention it becomes pertinent to state allegations of respondent's pleading which were omitted from the opinion in Miller v. Superior Court, supra, as unnecessary to a decision of the points there considered, in addition to the averments there set forth. It is alleged that, upon information and belief, Jared was never the husband of Mary, but that for the purpose of cheating and defrauding Mary and her estate, and in connivance with his present wife, appellant Cecil, formerly known as Cecil A. Sheward, he falsely and fraudulently induced Mary to believe and she did believe during her lifetime that she was his lawful wife; that on or before August 15, 1915, and for a number of years theretofore, Jared was the legal husband of one Irene E. Miller; that on August 15, 1915, an action for divorce was commenced by Irene against Jared in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Alameda; that on August 30, 1915, he filed his answer to the complaint in that action; that on September 28, 1915, an interlocutory decree of divorce was rendered in favor of the plaintiff in that action; that prior to October 13, 1915, at Memphis, Tenn., and prior to the making or entry of any final decree in the divorce action, Jared went through a purported marriage ceremony with Mary; that Cecil A. Sheward loaned or supplied to Jared the funds necessary to enable him to proceed from California to Memphis for the performance of that ceremony, and also the funds with which he paid the expenses of a trip with Mary following the ceremony; that Cecil A. Sheward was one of the witnesses to the will of Mary; that Jared alleged in his petition for letters testamentary in the matter of the estate of Mary Moore Miller, deceased, that the property of the estate in Los Angeles county, where he and Mary had resided since their purported marriage, did not exceed in value the sum of $1,350, and that there was other personal property of the estate in Michigan of the value of $7,500; that this allegation was false and fraudulent, and that, upon information and belief, there was then personal property of the estate under the control of Jared of the value of more than $200,000, and that the estate was then also the owner of real property of large value; that unless restrained by the court Jared will, as plaintiff is informed and believes, embezzle the property of the estate in his hands and remove the same from the state; that, upon information and belief, Jared and Cecil have conspired together and are conspiring together for the purpose of defrauding the estate of Mary of the money and properties of the estate held by Jared, and that the latter will, unless restrained, transfer the same to Cecil for further concealment and for the purpose of having said moneys and properties taken out of the state; that, upon information and belief, Jared and Cecil, unless restrained, will remove the said moneys and properties from the state; and that, upon information and belief, a large portion of said moneys and properties are kept by Jared and Cecil in safe deposit boxes of the banking corporations defendant.

[1, 2] In support of their contention that the complaint, considered as an affidavit, does not show evidence sufficient to warrant the issuance of the preliminary injunction ordered by the trial court, appellants rely upon Davitt v. American Bakers' Union, 124 Cal. 99, 56 Pac. 775, Bishop v. Owens, 5 Cal. App. 83, 89 Pac. 844, Willis v. Lauridson, 161 Cal. 106, 118 Pac. 530, and Martin v. Danziger, 21 Cal. App. 563, 132 Pac. 284. None of these cases has an application to the present controversy. We have not here a pleading containing the generalities and conclusions which were the subject of attention in each of the cases cited. The complaint before us is illuminatingly specific. The only difficulty lies in the fact that many of its averments are made upon information and belief, and we say this for the reason that the general rule is that injunctions may not issue upon affidavits the contents of which are stated upon information and belief. Doubtless appellants intend to rely upon this point, although they do not argue it, as it is hinted at in one of their briefs. For the purpose of considering it we have been careful, in stating the allegations of the complaint, to designate those which are made upon information and belief, leaving it to be understood that those not so designated are made positively. It is to be observed, then, in considering the applicability here of the rule of law last mentioned, that: (1) Several important allegations of the complaint are not made upon information and belief. (2) Those which are so made pertain to matters which were peculiarly within the knowledge of appellants. (3) Although the preliminary injunction was issued after hearing pursuant to an order to show cause, no counter affidavits were filed, nor was an answer interposed, every averment of the complaint thus passing undenied. (4) If the allegations of the complaint, both those positively made and those made upon information and belife, are true, those allegations showed the most imperative demand for the granting of preliminary injunctive relief. Under such circumstances we are bound to say, not merely that the trial court was guilty of no abuse of discretion in making its order, but that the order was most proper. In a case in which a preliminary injunction had been granted upon the complaint and in which the defendant filed an answer and moved to dissolve the injunction, the Supreme Court said:

> "Some of the averments of the complaint, 'upon information and belief,' are not denied by the answer; others were sustained by positive affidavits at the hearing. Assuming the allegations which are not denied by the answer, those which are themselves positive, and those sustained by positive averments in affidavits to be true, we cannot say the court below abused its discretion in refusing to dissolve the injunction." Hiller v. Collins, 63 Cal. 235.

Suggestion has been made to us, since the foregoing was written, that the action has been dismissed as to appellant Cecil A. Sheward Miller. The order from which the present appeal is prosecuted therefore no longer stands as to that appellant.

Order affirmed.

CHANCE v. KOBSTED. (Civ. 4733.)

1. Husband and wife ⟹272(1)—Divorce proceedings in themselves do not interrupt husband's powers in community property.

Divorce proceedings in themselves do not interrupt the husband's powers with respect to management and control of community property, such proceedings not taking property into custody of court.

2. Husband and wife ⟹270(1)—Wife cannot maintain action to quiet title to community property until dissolution of community.

A wife granted separate maintenance could not maintain an action to quiet title to the community property sold to defendant by husband's paramour without authority from the husband; her interest therein being inchoate until a dissolution of the community, and her remedy, if the husband could not be found, being under Code Civ. Proc. § 1822 et seq.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Bessie B. Chance against Soronus Kobsted. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. Lyders, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George L. Stewart, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $200 in an action which the plaintiff brought against him involving the title to certain personal property alleged to have been the community property of herself and her husband, Charles T. Chance. She alleged that at the time of the filing of the complaint she was the lawful wife of Charles T. Chance; that in October, 1921, he deserted her to consort with one Midge Bowers; that thereafter, on November 5, 1921, he purchased certain furniture with community funds, and on December 21, 1921, commenced an action for divorce against plaintiff; that plaintiff, on cross-pleadings, obtained judgment in said action for separate maintenance, and on May 27, 1922, Midge Bowers sold said furniture to defendant. Plaintiff alleged that counsel fees and money for her separate maintenance allowed to her by the court in the divorce proceedings remain unpaid, and that an execution was issued to enforce payment of the same, and that the sheriff levied upon this personal property in the hands of the defendant as property of the community. There are additional allegations to the effect that Charles T. Chance has departed from the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., and cannot be found; that a warrant for his arrest has been issued under the provisions of section 270a, Penal Code; that the defendant claims some interest in the property adverse to plaintiff. The prayer is that the defendant be required to set forth the nature of his interest and that the court declare that the defendant has no interest in the property and that the title thereto is in plaintiff.

A demurrer, general and special, was filed to the complaint and overruled, and the defendant answered, stating that he purchased the furniture from the said Midge Bowers, acting for herself and for Charles T. Chance; that the household furniture so purchased by defendant had been openly and notoriously possessed by the said Midge Bowers for a period of six months or more preceding the said purchase by the defendant; that the sale was open and free from fraud; and that the defendant paid the reasonable value of said furniture for the same.

The appeal is upon the judgment roll, and the findings recite that at all times mentioned in the complaint the plaintiff was the wife of Charles T. Chance, who had deserted and abandoned her on or about the month of October, 1921, to live with said Midge Bowers; that on November 5, 1921, Charles T. Chance, with community funds of himself and the plaintiff, purchased the household furniture involved here. The facts with reference to the divorce action instituted by Chance and the decree awarding separate maintenance to his wife, all as pleaded by plaintiff, are then found. It is further found that on May 27, 1922, the said Midge Bowers, with intent to deceive and defraud this plaintiff, and to deprive her of her rights in and to the said community property, sold and transferred the same to the defendant for the sum of $185; that on June 9, 1922, an execution was issued upon the judgment for counsel fees, maintenance, etc., in the divorce action, and all the right, title, and interest of said judgment debtor, Charles T. Chance, in and to the said furniture, was garnished by plaintiff under and by virtue of said writ; that said defendant, on June 14, 1922, was restrained by order of court from disposing of said furniture pending the termination of this action, which was commenced by plaintiff in pursuance of the further order of said court; and that said restraining order was dissolved on August 25, 1922. It is further found that Charles T. Chance has deserted and abandoned plaintiff and is absent from the state, and that the defendant has sold portions of said furniture and converted other portions to his own use, and that the value of all of the furniture is $400.

From the foregoing facts the court concluded that the plaintiff had an equitable interest in the whole of said furniture to the extent of $200, and it was adjudged that the defendant should pay said sum to the plaintiff.

Appellant attacks the judgment upon the following grounds: That the respondent's husband is a necessary party to an action to quiet title to community personal property; that respondent has no title to the same; that the action being one to quiet title, the court was without power to give a money judgment therein; and that the judgment rendered does not dispose of the controversy between the parties because it does not provide that the appellant is entitled to the property upon the payment of $200 to respondent, and could not so provide because the rights of the husband therein are undetermined, and he may bring an action against this appellant for the value of the entire property.

[1] It is necessary to consider only the first objection. The plaintiff's interest in the community property involved here was a mere expectancy and not a title or interest. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170; Roberts v. Wehmeyer (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 22. Her husband had complete control over the same, with the exceptions noted in section 172, Civil Code. It was not found, however, that he exercised his right to sell the property to the defendant; but it was found that a stranger to the community, without authority from him, so far as the findings show, attempted to sell the property. Any action upon the part of such stranger would be unavailing, of course, and would not change the rights of the members of the community in the same. The wife's interest in the community property could only become vested and severable upon a dissolution of the community, and there was no dissolution of the community between the husband and wife in this case, and no order of the court in the divorce proceedings dividing the community property, so far as the record shows. Until such dissolution, either by divorce or the death of one spouse, the wife's interest was an inchoate one and not such as to form the basis for an action to quiet title to the property. Even divorce proceedings pending do not, in themselves, interrupt the husband's powers with respect to the management and control of community property, as the effect of such proceedings is not to take the property into the custody of the court. The husband continues to have control of it and full power to dispose of it. Lord v. Hough, 43 Cal. 581, 585.

[2] Therefore, in an action to quiet title to this community property the plaintiff must fail, and the demurrer was improperly overruled as it was directed toward the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action. "The subject of the action was community property. * * * Therefore the husband was the proper plaintiff."

See Chester v. Hill, 66 Cal. 480, 6 Pac. 132. See, also, Smith v. Furnish, 70 Cal. 424, 12 Pac. 392; McFadden v. Santa Ana Ry. Co., 87 Cal. 464, 25 Pac. 681, 11 L. R. A. 252; Neale v. Depot Ry. Co., 94 Cal. 425, 29 Pac. 954; Lamb v. Harbaugh, 105 Cal. 680, 39 Pac. 56; Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170. As to personalty, the above rule remains unchanged by recent amendments to the codes.

If the husband of plaintiff was missing from the state and his whereabouts were unknown, as plaintiff alleges in her complaint, and he was entitled to the possession of any personal property situated in the state, his wife had her course of procedure outlined by sections 1822 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure in such cases made and provided; but the method pursued in the present action finds no sanction in any provisions of our Codes or any decisions of this state which have been called to our attention.

The question of plaintiff's right to subject community property, or the proceeds thereof, to the payment of the judgment against her husband in a proper proceeding, is not before this court upon this appeal, as plaintiff did not pursue that remedy, but sought to enforce an indeterminate equitable interest against the property.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. JOHANSEN et al.

(Cr. 741, 2689.)

1. Criminal law 🔑112(3)—Jurisdiction of conspiracy is in county where conspiracy executed or overt act committed.

Under Pen. Code, § 777, jurisdiction of criminal conspiracy is in county where conspiracy agreement is entered into or in any county in which overt act in furtherance thereof is committed.

2. Criminal law 🔑198—Prior acquittal or conviction no bar to prosecution for subsequent continuance of offense.

Prior acquittal or conviction for membership in unlawful organization is no bar to prosecution for subsequent continuance of same offense.

3. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Literature of organization, published and circulated after arrest for membership therein, held admissible to prove character of organization.

In prosecution for being members of I. W. W., literature published and circulated by such organization after accused's arrest is admissible to show character of organization.

4. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Admission of evidence relating to forbidden organization's attitude toward churches and religion, though error, held harmless.

In prosecution for being members of I. W. W., evidence relating to organization's attitude toward churches and religion, was erroneously admitted, but harmless when in quantity and character of little importance.

5. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Court's addition to accused's requested instruction relating to legality of general strike held not incorrect.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism, where court gave requested charge that general strike for industrial and political ends and to secure change in control, if unaccompanied by illegal acts, would not be illegal, court's addition that, if such strike should be so conducted as to amount to unlawful terrorism, it would be illegal, held not erroneous.

6. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Charge as to knowledge as essential element of crime of being member of forbidden organization held sufficient.

Though court should have specifically instructed that knowledge of character of forbidden organization is element of crime of membership therein, its charge that to sustain conviction accused must willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and knowingly be member thereof was sufficient, where defendants had previously been tried on similar charges or had been members for a long time.

On Petition for Hearing in Supreme Court.

7. Criminal law 🔑108(1)—Persons subpœnaed as witnesses cannot be heard to say they came into county involuntarily when prosecuted for criminal syndicalism.

Persons subpœnaed as witnesses in county in which they had never been before, and indicted therein for criminal syndicalism, could not be heard to say that offense was not voluntarily committed by them within such county, where they had had ample opportunity to sever their connection with forbidden organization before coming into county.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

B. Johansen and others were convicted of criminal syndicalism, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Austin Lewis and R. W. Henderson, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants were convicted of violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act. Stats. 1919, p. 281. They have appealed from the judgments of conviction and the orders denying their motions for new trials.

In the month of June, 1923, the criminal syndicalism case of People v. Stewart and others was on trial in the superior court of Sacramento county. The defendant Wood was then a resident of Alameda county, and the other defendants herein were residents of Los Angeles county. It does not appear that any of them had ever been in Sacramento county. In obedience to subpœnas regularly issued and served upon them, they all appeared as witnesses for defendants in the Stewart Case and testified, among other things, that they were members of the I. W. W. Immediately after leaving the witness stand, though not in the courtroom or in the presence of the jury, the defendants were arrested and thrown into jail and the indictment herein was thereafter found against them.

[1] It is urged that, since the defendants were in Sacramento county under compulsion, and not voluntarily, they were not willfully and intentionally members of the organization in that county, and that, therefore, the superior court of such county was without jurisdiction of the offense charged. It may be observed at the outset that the words "willfully and intentionally" in an indictment relate to the mental attitude of the offender rather than to the place of the offense. Section 777 of the Penal Code provides that—

> "Except as herein otherwise provided, the jurisdiction of every public offense is in the county wherein it is committed."

Jurisdiction of a criminal conspiracy is in the county where the agreement of conspiracy is entered into or in any county in which an overt act is committed in furtherance thereof. Hyde v. United States, 225 U. S. 347, 32 Sup. Ct. 793, 56 L. Ed. 1114, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 632. Since membership in a forbidden organization, without the commission of an overt act, is made punishable by the statute, it follows logically that jurisdiction of the crime of being a member thereof is in any county into which such a member may go during the continuance of his membership. The question then is whether, in a case where jurisdiction depends upon the presence of the accused in a county, the superior court thereof can acquire such jurisdiction by compelling the accused to attend as a witness in another action, or by otherwise compelling his presence in such county. The case of People v. Martin, 188 Cal. 281, 205 Pac. 121, 21 A. L. R. 1399, is decisive of the question. In that case, as in this, jurisdiction of the offense depended upon the presence of the defendant in the county, and he was taken into the county under process of the court on a different charge from that of which he was finally convicted. He was extradited from the state of New Mexico to the county of San Diego on a charge of embezzlement. While held as a prisoner in that county he was charged with the crime of bigamy alleged to have been committed in Orange county prior to his extradition from New Mexico. Section 785 of the Penal Code provides:

> "When the offense, either of bigamy or incest, is committed in one county and the defendant is apprehended in another, the jurisdiction is in either county."

The defendant contended that the superior court of San Diego county was without jurisdiction and offered to prove at the trial that—

> "after the alleged marriage in Orange county he never returned to San Diego county until extradited."

The court refused to admit such proof. On appeal it was held that the offered evidence was immaterial and that the superior court of San Diego county had jurisdiction of the offense of the alleged bigamy committed in Orange county, notwithstanding the defendant had not voluntarily entered San Diego county after the commission of the offense.

[2] On the 1st day of November, 1922, in the county of Los Angeles, the defendants Ross, Johansen, and Bratland were indicted on a charge of being members of the I. W. W. on the 25th day of October, 1922. They were duly tried and were acquitted on the 11th day of May, 1923. On their arraignment herein they pleaded such acquittal as a bar. In support of their contention that such acquittal was a bar, appellants quote from 12 Cyc. 281, as follows:

> "An acquittal or conviction is no bar to a subsequent indictment for the same offense or the same species of crime, where the latter is alleged to have been committed at a different date from that previously tried, unless the offense is continuous."

The statement as to continuing offenses has relation, of course, to the continuance thereof up to the time of the charge and not to its continuance thereafter. If an acquittal or a conviction were a bar to prosecution for the subsequent continuance of the offense, then such acquittal or conviction would constitute, in effect, a license to so continue the offense. The jury in the Los Angeles case may have acquitted the defendants on the ground that they were without guilty knowledge of the character of the organization. Such acquittal would afford no protection to the defendants in the continuance of their membership after acquiring such knowledge. The conspiracy is a continuing one and its illegality is not alone in the act of engaging therein as a member, but in the continuance of such membership. People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 376, 203 Pac. 78. A prior acquittal or conviction is not a bar to a subsequent continuance in the conspiracy. United States v. Swift (D. C.) 186 Fed. 1002.

[3] Complaint is made of the admission in evidence of certain literature published and circulated after the arrest of defendants. The court instructed the jury that this evidence was admitted for the sole purpose of showing the character of the organization. Its admission for the limited purpose stated was not error. The character of the organization at a particular time must be determined by inferences to be drawn from proof of its acts and conduct within reasonable limits before and after the time in question. The question is not unlike that of proof of mental capacity at a particular time, in which case it has always been held proper to admit proof of acts and conduct both before and after the time in dispute.

[4] Evidence relative to the attitude of the organization towards churches and religion was erroneously admitted. People v. Flanagan (Cal. App.) 223 Pac. 1014. Both in quantity and in character, however, this evidence was of less importance than in the Flanagan Case, and it is not believed that its admission resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

[5] At the request of defendants the court instructed the jury as follows:

> "Evidence has been introduced to show and purporting to show that the Industrial Workers of the World advocate the general strike as a means of accomplishing industrial and political ends, and changes of control. The adoption of such a strike for such purposes if unaccompanied by illegal acts would not be violative of law."

The court added to the instruction a statement to the effect that if such general strike be conducted in such a manner "as to amount to unlawful methods of terrorism for the purpose of bringing about a change in industrial ownership or control, or affecting any political change, then the use of the general strike under such conditions is a violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act." While the addition to the instruction may not add anything to its clarity, it does not contain any incorrect statement of the law.

[6] The instructions given and refused upon the question of intent and guilty knowledge are unlike those of the Flanagan Case, and are substantially the same as in People v. Bailey (Cal. App.) 225 Pac. 752, wherein the judgment was affirmed. A specific instruction to the effect that knowledge of the character of the organization is an element of the crime charged should have been given. People v. Flanagan, supra. See, also, United States v. Tod, 44 Sup. Ct. 260, 68 L. Ed. ——. The court, however, instructed the jury that in order to convict a defendant it was necessary to find that he was "willfully, unlawfully, feloniously and knowingly a member of an organization, society, group and assemblage of persons * * * organized and assembled to advocate, teach and aid and abet criminal syndicalism." Other instructions used the word "knowingly" in a similar connection. The jury must have understood from these instructions that knowledge of the character of the organization on the part of the defendants was essential to a conviction. Johansen, Ross, and Bratland had been members of the organization for periods of time ranging from about 18 months to 4 years. They had been tried on a similar charge prior to their arrest and must have heard the evidence given at such trial to prove the character of the organization. Pederson and Wood had been active members for more than 10 years. In view of the foregoing facts, it is highly improbable that any one of the defendants was ignorant of the criminal character of the organization.

The further contentions of appellants which would merit discussion if presented for the first time are fully considered and overruled in one or more of the following cases: People v. Steelik, supra; People v. Taylor, 187 Cal. 378, 203 Pac. 85; People v. Roe, 58 Cal. App. 690, 209 Pac. 381; People v. La Rue (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 627; People v. Flanagan, supra; and People v. Bailey, supra. No useful purpose would be served by renewing the discussion of questions which may be considered as settled. From an examination of the whole case, it cannot be said that the errors committed in the trial of the case have resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgments and the orders are affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [7] The petition for a hearing by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal is denied. We do not approve the following statement contained in the opinion of that court:

> "The case of People v. Martin, 188 Cal. 281, 205 Pac. 121, 21 A. L. R. 1399, is decisive of the question."

We are satisfied with the conclusion of that court that the evidence was sufficient to justify the implied finding of the jury to the effect that the offense charged against these petitioners was voluntarily committed by them within the county of Sacramento. While it is true that petitioners came into that county involuntarily, it is also true that they had ample opportunity to sever their connection with the unlawful organization of which they were members before coming into that county. Having elected not to do this, they cannot be heard to say that the offense of which they stand convicted was not voluntarily committed by them within the county of Sacramento.

All concur.

(66 Cal. App. 307)

PEOPLE v. ERICKSON. (Cr. 731.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 22, 1924.)

1. Insurrection and sedition ⚷2—Mere membership in I. W. W. does not support conviction.

As the Syndicalism Law does not condemn the I. W. W. as an illegal organization per se, mere membership in such organization does not of itself warrant the conclusion of belonging to an organization seeking to accomplish an industrial change by unlawful means.

2. Criminal law ⚷419, 420(1), 448(2), 1186(4)—Admission of hearsay and conclusion held erroneous and prejudicial.

Where there was nothing in the literature introduced in a prosecution for belonging to the I. W. W. expressly advocating violence or unlawful action, hearsay testimony that the organization still taught sabotage, was but a recital of past transactions and conclusion of the person with whom the witness was talking, and was error, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1845, which was not cured by Const. art. 6, § 4½, since without such testimony a conviction could not have been had.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Alfred Erickson was convicted of criminal syndicalism, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

R. W. Henderson, of San Francisco, and T. F. Allen, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. On the 22d day of May, 1923, the defendant Alfred Erickson, while going through the town of Marysville on his way to Feather river canyon, was taken from the tender of a passenger train on the Western Pacific Railroad by a night watchman, searched, found to be carrying an I. W. W. membership card, and was thereupon arrested under the Syndicalism Law of this state (St. 1919, p. 281), and on the 29th day of May, 1923, an information was filed against him by the district attorney of the county of Yuba, by which information the defendant was charged with "then and there being, did then and there willfully and unlawfully and feloniously and knowingly did become and was a member of an organization, society, club and assemblage of persons known and designated as the 'Industrial Workers of the World,' and sometimes known and referred to as the 'I. W. W.,' which said organization, society, club, and assemblage of persons was then and there organized and assembled to advocate, teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control and affecting political changes," etc. The defendant was tried upon the information above set forth, convicted, his motion for a new trial was denied, and the cause is now before this court on his appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Three questions are presented for consideration upon this appeal, to wit: The constitutional question presented and dealt with in former cases; the question of essential scienter or knowledge, considered and passed upon in the case of People v. Flanagan (Cal. App.) 223 Pac. 1014; and the admission of hearsay testimony.

The case at bar differs very materially from any of the former cases considered by this court, in that none of the literature advocating or suggesting forms of sabotage condemned by the statutes was introduced upon the trial of this action. It is only by conjecture or supposition that such a conclusion could be reached from any of the papers, pamphlets, or books presented to the jury as exhibits. The literature in question purports to set forth the purposes and principles of the I. W. W., and of how its aims and purposes are to be accomplished. This literature makes no express reference to direct action or any manner of violence, whatever may be said of the visionary or impossible schemes set forth and contained therein.

[1] We make this statement because, as said, in substance, in the case of People v. Thornton (Cal. App.) 219 Pac. 1020, every case of this kind must rest upon the character of the evidence introduced therein. The statute does not condemn or prescribe the I. W. W. as an illegal organization per se; hence, the mere fact of membership in such an organization does not, in and of itself, warrant the conclusion of belonging to an organization seeking to accomplish an industrial change by violence or unlawful means. In other words, the character of the organization is a question always to be determined.

[2] There being nothing in the literature introduced in this case expressly advocating violence or unlawful action denounced by the statutes, and, as we have said, only such conclusion could be arrived therefrom by conjecture, the ruling of the court upon the admission of other testimony becomes important.

To show the continuing and present character and the criminal designs and purposes of the organization, a witness, Elbert Coutts, was placed on the witness stand and testified to certain criminal acts of members of the I. W. W. occurring between January 2, 1913, and December, 1917. It appears from the transcript that this witness' membership in the organization ceased with the month of December, 1917. There is no testimony of any witness having actual knowledge of the teachings and acts of the I. W. W. later than December, 1917, set forth in the transcript. The defendants introduced testimony to the effect that the organization had discarded sabotage literature and was no longer seeking or advocating an industrial change by violence or unlawful means. Apparently to bridge this gap and to establish the continuance of the unlawful character of the I. W. W., the following hearsay testimony of Elbert Coutts was introduced over the objection of the defendant:

> "Q. Have you talked with any of the leaders or discussed the I. W. W. with any of the leaders since 1917? A. Well, I couldn't say leaders; I talked with one of the men I knew quite a while, Harry Letour, in Los Angeles, along toward the latter part of February or first of March, 1922, during one of these cases down there.
> "Q. Was there anything said about the teaching of the word 'sabotage' or anything of that character by the organization at the present time? A. I was talking with him quite a while, and that was discussed during the conversation.
> "Q. Who was this man Letour; was he one of the speakers? A. Some time before that he had been released from Leavenworth, where he was confined for a case tried in Sacramento in 1918 and the beginning of 1919. He was a delegate then; member and delegate.
> "Q. Do you know whether or not he was at the time you talked to him? A. He didn't show me a membership card, but showed me a delegate slip at that time there—a sheet of paper, and it had his name on there; very similar to the ones they had during the time I was a member—and told me about his time in Leavenworth, and also stated he was a member at that time.
> "Q. What was the date of the delegate's certificate? A. Oh, I don't remember now; I never paid much attention to it. It was familiar to me.
> "Q. You didn't know what date it was? A. I don't remember now; he stated to me at that time he was a member.
> "Q. How long had you known this man? A. I had known him in 1917 when he was secretary of the I. W. W. in Modesto and met him several years previous to that when he was a member of the I. W. W., and knew him quite well around Modesto and Stockton in 1917 as a member of the I. W. W.
> "Q. Now, state what the conversation was. A. At that time he was telling me that I didn't know about the I. W. W.—what I knew about the I. W. W. and what they were doing, that it didn't amount to much of it—and he also told me the I. W. W. still taught sabotage, but they didn't carry it on their literature any more, but carried it on by word of mouth.
> "By the Court: That part will go out, what he said, what they were doing. Confine yourself to what he said they taught. A. He said they carried on their teaching of sabotage by word of mouth; they had cut it out of the literature; and he told me also—he says he wasn't afraid to tell me this because it would be hearsay testimony at that time.
> "Q. That is what he stated was his conclusion? A. That is what he stated to me was the reason he told me that.
> "Q. As I understand, the only change was that now they were not advocating sabotage in their literature, but carried it on by word of mouth? A. Yes, sir."

It will be noted that this hearsay testimony is not a declaration of a conspirator in furtherance of a conspiracy, and is but a recital of past transactions of the organization and the conclusions of the person with whom the witness Coutts was talking. We have carefully examined the case of People v. Gitlow, 195 App. Div. 773, 187 N. Y. Supp. 783, and People v. Lloyd, 304 Ill. 23, 136 N. E. 505, two cases strongly relied upon by the prosecution, and we think two of the leading cases having to do with the subject of the introduction of declarations of conspirators in I. W. W. cases, and we find nothing therein which conflicts with the rule heretofore declared in cases decided by this court. The two cases above referred to raise this declaration of the law:

> "Where a conspiracy is once established, every act and declaration of each member in furtherance of the common design are, in contemplation of law, the act and declaration of all the members and therefore original evidence against each of them."

Nothing in the hearsay testimony above referred to comes within the application of this rule. Nothing said by the individual named Letour was in furtherance of any common design or undertaking whatever; it was purely and simply recital.

In the case of State v. Gibson, 115 Wash. 512, 197 Pac. 611, a case heretofore approved by this court, an almost identical state of facts with those at bar appears:

> "Over appellants' objections the witness was allowed to detail what Hannon had told him concerning the teachings, purposes, and objects of the organization. The witness Fisher testified that he had talked personally to many members of the I. W. W., among others, the Roi sisters, who informed him that they were members of the I. W. W. and had knowledge of the objects and purposes of that organization. Over appellants' objections the court permitted this witness to testify what the Roi sisters had told him concerning the purposes of that organization."

Of this testimony the court said:

> "This was hearsay testimony, and in our opinion the trial court erred in receiving it."

In the case of State v. Pettilla, 116 Wash. 589, 200 Pac. 332, the same question was presented and the same ruling had. The court in this case states when such testimony is admissible and when it is not. We take the following from the syllabus:

> "In a prosecution of I. W. W. members for criminal syndicalism, testimony of witnesses who had talked with persons who they had reason to believe were memebers, either by discovery of membership cards, or by their declarations, or other facts, as to the purposes, objects, principles, and teachings of the organization, is inadmissible as hearsay; but testimony as to statements, speeches, and declarations made by members or in their presence at recognized meetings of the organization, or proven to have received the sanction of the organization, and as to conversations with persons whose membership is shown to be of such a character as to carry with it the authority of the organization to make such declarations, is admissible."

The same holding is had in the case of State v. Kowalchuk, 116 Wash. 592, 200 Pac. 333.

In the case of State v. Dingman (Idaho) 219 Pac. 760, the Supreme Court of Idaho had occasion to examine the law on this subject, and it is there held that the character of the testimony introduced in this case is inadmissible and comes within the rule excluding hearsay testimony. The Washington cases to which we have referred were also cited and considered in the decision rendered by the Idaho Supreme Court.

In the case of People v. Sullivan, 59 Cal. App. 633, 211 Pac. 467, the court, in considering the hearsay testimony of one Vale, held as follows:

> "This is true of the relation by him of what other persons had told him that they, as members of the I. W. W., had done in the way of acts of sabotage and lawlessness. The ultimate fact which the prosecution was endeavoring to establish was the illegal character, teachings and acts of the I. W. W. This could be shown by literature authorized or issued by it, by witnesses whose past relation to the organization gave them first-hand knowledge, and by testimony of witnesses as to the specific acts of sabotage, arson, and revolution within their own knowledge. People v. Roe, 58 Cal. App. 690, 209 Pac. 381. But to go beyond this and relate purported incidents, not known to the witness, but being based upon statements made to him by others, would clearly be hearsay and as such inadmissible. Authorities cited by respondent do not justify the admission of such evidence."

The same ruling was had in the case of People v. La Rue (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 6270.

Again, in the case of People v. Flanagan (Cal. App.) 223 Pac. 1014, this court said:

> "Hearsay evidence, of a character similar to that held to have been erroneously admitted in the case of People v. La Rue, supra, being declarations of past acts, was admitted over the objections of defendants. In People v. Irwin, 77 Cal. 494, 504, 20 Pac. 56, 59, it is said: 'Declarations showing past acts, or expressing merely the opinion or desire of the conspirator making them, are not binding upon any one except himself, or those in whose presence they are made.'"

Here the cases which we have above cited are also referred to. It is further stated:

> "The hearsay statements erroneously admitted were not made at any meeting of the organization, or to or by an officer or representative thereof, or in the way of propaganda to further its purposes, but the fact sought to be proved by the declarations were the commission of criminal acts by its members."

The Flanagan Case was reversed for other reasons, but the rule there declared is applicable here. We think that section 1845 of the Code of Civil Procedure is applicable to this case, and that the hearsay testimony heretofore set forth should have been excluded. The rule of exclusion in relation to hearsay testimony and the reasons therefor are very clearly set forth in 10 Cal. Juris, page 1033, beginning with section 288.

Is the error in the admission of hearsay testimony cured in this case by reason of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution? We think not. Without this testimony we do not very well see how a conviction could have been had. As we have shown, there was no other testimony showing the criminal character of the organization since December, 1917. As a matter of fact, the testimony of the witness Coutts did not bring the unlawful acts testified to by him down to that date, and granting that the criminal character of the I. W. W., as it existed prior to that date, was sufficiently established, we are not prepared to hold that the presumption of the continuance of such character is entitled to prevail over the presumption of innocence to which every defendant is entitled under the law, and especially is this true when such a long period of time has elapsed between the testimony tending to show such character and the date of the trial, as is evidenced by the transcript in this action.

Objection is also made to the instructions given by the court. These instructions we have examined, and find that they conform to the rule laid down in the Flanagan Case. The court, at the request of the defendant, instructed that knowledge was an essential ingredient of the crime charged.

For the reason hereinbefore given, the judgment and order of the trial court in this cause will be, and the same are hereby, reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

MILLIKEN v. BANK OF ITALY.
(Civ. 4776.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 12, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 9, 1924.)

1. Banks and banking 🔑227(3)—Evidence held insufficient to establish bank's contract to apply proceeds of sale remitted to it in particular manner.

Evidence held insufficient to establish contract whereby bank receiving proceeds from sale of hemp agreed to devote one-half of same to payment of a note due from seller to a previous partner and other half to payment of indebtedness due bank from seller.

2. Contracts 🔑24—Submission of written agreement inconsistent with prior oral agreement may be treated as rejection of same and suggestion for new agreement.

One receiving a written instrument purporting to embody terms of a prior oral agreement, but inconsistent with same, is entitled to treat it as a rejection of the oral agreement and a suggestion for a new agreement.

3. Appeal and error 🔑931(1) — Every presumption is indulged in favor of judgment of trial court.

Every presumption is indulged in favor of judgment of trial court.

4. Appeal and error 🔑996—Power to draw inferences rests with trial court.

Power to draw inference rests with trial court and appellate court has no power to state that one of two conflicting inferences should be drawn in preference to the other.

5. Banks and banking 🔑227(3) — Evidence held insufficient to establish delivery of note to bank for indorsement of payments thereon.

In action against bank for breach of alleged contract, whereby it agreed to apply one-half of proceeds of hemp remitted to it for payment of owner's note to former partner, and to indorse such payments on the note, evidence held insufficient to establish delivery of same to it.

6. Banks and banking 🔑227(3)—Judgment against bank for failure to apply proceeds of sale remitted to it on note held unwarranted.

In action against bank for breach of alleged contract, whereby it agreed to apply one-half of proceeds of sale of hemp remitted to it to payment of note of seller belonging to plaintiff, fact that plaintiff had accepted of maker of note a conveyance of other property, and entered into an agreement not to take a deficiency judgment in proceedings to be had looking to foreclosure of a mortgage securing note, held to preclude any judgment against defendant in the absence of showing as to value of property so received or amount remaining unpaid on note.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by L. E. Milliken against the Bank of Italy. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Preston & Duncan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis Ferrari, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover moneys alleged to have been received by the defendant for the plaintiff's use. The plaintiff pleaded his cause of action in two counts. In the first count he pleaded a breach of an express contract, and in the second count he pleaded the common count for money had and received. The defendant interposed an answer which contained denials of all of the material allegations. A trial was had by the trial court sitting without a jury. Thereafter the court made findings:

> "That the said defendant, Bank of Italy, never entered into any contract with said plaintiff with reference to the disposition or the sale of any hemp produced on Woodward Island by the plaintiff and one H. H. Laughlin, or otherwise, and said defendant, Bank of Italy, never agreed to be bound by any agreement between the said H. H. Laughlin and the said plaintiff or otherwise."

And the court also made a finding:

> "That the said defendant has never received the sum of $3,750 or any other sum, as agent for the plaintiff, nor has it ever received any money belonging to plaintiff in any other capacity; that said defendant has never received any money for or to the use of said plaintiff, and that the said defendant never agreed to pay any note or any money to plaintiff, on demand or otherwise."

[1] On this appeal the appellant maintains that each of said findings is not supported by the evidence, and that the only evidence in the record is to the contrary. If the appellant's contention in this behalf is not sustained, the judgment must be affirmed.

For some months prior to December, 1920, the plaintiff and H. H. Laughlin had been copartners engaged in the production of hemp. At least during a part of that time Laughlin in a different capacity had also been engaged in the production of vegetables and seeds. Laughlin had been doing business with that branch of the defendant's bank which is located at Stockton. The record shows that his personal indebtedness to the bank had arisen to the sum of $20,000 or more. The business of the partnership was not prosperous, and in December, 1920, the partnership was indebted to the bank on a promissory note in the sum of $2,500. Shortly prior to the month of December the partners had discussed a dissolution of the partnership. After certain preliminary conversations, Laughlin called at the bank and understood that the bank was willing to advance him the money, and thereupon he went to the plaintiff and offered the plaintiff $7,500 for his half interest in the business. The plaintiff accepted the offer, and when the time came for Laughlin to make the payment the bank informed Laughlin that he had misunderstood the bank officials, and that the bank would not advance the $7,500. When thereafter Laughlin failed to make his payment on the purchase of plaintiff's interest in the partnership the plaintiff commenced an action against Laughlin for damages. As to when that action was commenced, and as to what further proceedings were had in that action, the record does not disclose.

However, in the latter part of December, 1920, the plaintiff and Laughlin discussed a contract on different terms. The partnership owned a plant for the milling of hemp, and it also owned a quantity of hemp which had not been harvested and had not been milled. At the same time Laughlin, in a different capacity, owned a quantity of seeds and onions which were in a warehouse, and the warehouse receipts were held by the Bank of Italy as security. Under the terms of the second tentative agreement the partners, as between themselves, had agreed that the plaintiff would accept, under certain conditions, the promissory note of Laughlin in the sum of $7,500 in payment of plaintiff's interest. The two partners discussed their affairs with their attorney, Mr. John Hancock. After the discussion, Mr. Hancock went to the bank and called on Mr. Ferroggiaro, the assistant vice president of the bank. Mr. Hancock testified:

> "I asked Mr. Ferroggiaro whether or not it would be satisfactory to the Bank of Italy to permit the hemp owned by the partnership to be sold through the Bank of Italy, that is, in the name of the Bank of Italy, or the proceeds thereby to be received by the Bank of Italy, and one-half of those proceeds to be applied to the Laughlin indebtedness to the bank, and any future indebtedness arising from any loan that the bank might make Mr. Laughlin to harvest or mill that hemp, and the other half to be paid to Mr. Milliken. * * * That Mr. Milliken was willing to sell his interest in the partnership for $7,500, if he was given half of the proceeds of the sale of the hemp. * * * Mr. Ferroggiaro said it would be satisfactory. * * * I also explained to Mr. Ferroggiaro that Mr. Miller was representing Mr. Milliken and threatened to sue Mr. Laughlin on his promise to buy the half interest for $7,500, that in order to avoid any litigation we were attempting to buy Milliken out on this basis, providing he was assured that the sales of hemp would be made through the Bank of Italy and he got one-half of all the proceeds. I want to say that at that conversation Mr. Laughlin, the principal, was there, that he agreed, and it was said at that time that the bank would do that. * * * Then I went back to my office and drew the contract and sent it to Mr. Milliken at Fort Bragg.
> "Subsequent to that time I spoke to Mr. Ferroggiaro about the matter after I was told that the money had not been deposited to the account of Mr. Milliken. Mr. Ferroggiaro then denied having told me and Mr. Laughlin at the time that he had that agreement with us that he would so divide the fund. He said we were mistaken about it. * * * I am not sure whether Mr. Milliken was present when that arrangement was made with the bank. I am not sure; my belief is that Mr. Laughlin and I had that agreement with the bank. I do not remember that Mr. Milliken was there, because I sent the papers in a day or two up to Mr. Milliken. But I know he was in Stockton at the time the arrangement was entered into about this new deal where he was taking Laughlin's note. That was discussed in my office, but I do not remember now that Mr. Milliken was in the bank with Mr. Laughlin and me, but I have no memoranda in my file on that at all. He might have been. I do not remember going to the bank with Mr. Milliken alone.
> "The first conversation I had with Mr. Ferroggiaro was between the 10th and 15th of December, 1920. I went to the bank and had a conversation with Mr. Ferroggiaro about the refusal of the bank to loan Mr. Laughlin the $7,500. In the conversation we had immediately before the drawing of that agreement we discussed the former conversation that we had. * * * Then I dropped out of the picture and did not have anything further to do with it until some time after that, when either Mr. Milliken or Mr. Laughlin informed me, I cannot say which one, that the bank had not applied the one-half of the money to the Milliken account, and then I discussed it with Mr. Ferroggiaro, but when that was I could not say. It must have been after the proceeds had been received. * * * The conversation between Mr. Ferroggiaro, Mr. Laughlin, and me was had in the course of the discussion between Mr. Milliken and Mr. Laughlin between December 10th and February 15th. The transaction between Laughlin and Milliken was in process of negotiation about being closed. In that conversation I stated to Mr. Ferroggiaro the terms upon which Laughlin and Milliken had agreed. * * *
> "Q. Previous to drawing that agreement of February, 1921, you had a conversation with Mr. Ferroggiaro about a lawyer in Stockton named Miller. Had Mr. Milliken at that time had him as his legal representative in the matter? A. I don't know, except Mr. Miller told me that he had instituted suit against Laughlin because of his failure to pay the $7,500. * * * I could not say now that I told Mr. Ferroggiaro that the notes which Mr. Laughlin was going to execute and deliver to Mr. Milliken would be deposited in the bank so the amount could be indorsed on the back of the note. * * * I told Mr. Ferroggiaro the agreement that had been arrived at between the parties. It had not been drawn yet. * * * I told him the amount of the sale, and the fact that Mr. Milliken was going to take Mr. Laughlin's note, and what he wanted to be sure of was that the money would come through the Bank of Italy, and that Mr. Milliken wanted it done that way, and I told him further that Mr. Milliken was interested; that he would get one-half of the proceeds. That was the important thing we discussed. I think I told Mr. Ferroggiaro in that conversation everything that was to go in that agreement that had to do with the Bank of Italy. I would not say that I told Mr. Ferroggiaro that the written agreement was to provide: 'It is further agreed that the said note for $7,500 will be deposited with the said Bank of Italy so that the payments made as hereinbefore stipulated may be indorsed upon the said note by the Bank of Italy when paid at the time as hereinbefore stated.' I might have and might not. I know I certainly did not call verbally to the attention of Mr. Ferroggiaro everything in that contract. My explanation of that is this: I had not yet drawn the agreement, and I intended to send it to Mr. Milliken, expecting that he would return it so I could take it to the Bank of Italy, but he never sent it back to me. * * *

"In that conversation with Mr. Ferroggiaro and Mr. Laughlin my memory is this: That Mr. Laughlin had to have some immediate money, and my memory is that Mr. Laughlin told Mr. Ferroggiaro that he would need before these proceeds came in about $1,500. Now that refreshes my memory. Then I discussed with Mr. Ferroggiaro the demand that Mr. Milliken had made that he wanted all the proceeds, and that could not be done for the reason that the Bank of Italy had to put up about $1,500, to pay for the work and labor, and which I explained to Mr. Milliken in my letter to him, where I told him that the bank would not finance the farming operations unless it received half of all the proceeds of the sale and, second, it was impossible for Mr. Laughlin to continue business unless he was given the cost of production. That was why we could not give Mr. Milliken all the proceeds, but were willing to give him half. The bank was not to be paid for its advances for milling before Milliken or Laughlin received anything. The question came up how much would the sales amount to, Mr. Ferroggiaro wanted to know, and Mr. Laughlin said approximately $8,000. They wanted to know how much was coming to the bank, and it was supposed to be $8,000, and the bank had to put up some money, I think about $1,500, and was willing to take one-half of all the proceeds, thinking that would cover the advances they were making, and the rest of the half was to go on Laughlin's (Milliken's?) account. I do not remember anything being said about the net proceeds. It was discussed in that conversation that there was no money on hand to mill that hemp to put it in shape to be sold, and that the Bank of Italy was going to advance that money."

The plaintiff also called as a witness Mr. H. H. Laughlin. Referring to the conversation had with Mr. Ferroggiaro in February, 1921, the witness testified:

> "All that was said was included by Judge Hancock. That conversation was as given by Judge Hancock. * * * At the time of the conversation between Mr. Ferroggiaro, Judge Hancock, and me, Mr. Milliken and I were making propositions back and forth, and nothing definite had been agreed upon."

The witness further testified that in harvesting the hemp he borrowed from the bank on promissory notes, in addition to the $2,500 above mentioned, further sums aggregating $3,200; that when the hemp was ready for sale he found purchasers, and that the purchasers after receiving deliveries paid the moneys directly over to the Bank of Italy. From the stipulation of counsel it appears that the total proceeds so received were $7,005.59.

Testifying in his own behalf, the plaintiff testified that shortly before January 18, 1921, he had a conversation with Mr. Ferroggiaro at the bank. He said:

> "I have a faint recollection that Mr. Hancock was there; I will not state positively whether he was. * * * I asked Mr. Ferroggiaro if in the sale of the hemp that was to be milled that I would like to have all the gross proceeds of the sale placed to my account, on the offer of Laughlin to pay me $7,500. Mr. Ferroggiaro said it would be impossible to pay all the gross proceeds in my account, but they would be willing to place half of them on my account, so I said if that was possible that could be done all right. * * * He said he could only place half of the proceeds of the sale on my account because Mr. Laughlin needed some money to conduct the business, and by taking all of the proceeds he would not have the funds to go on with the milling of the hemp."

The witness testified that he had theretofore done his banking business through Mr. Keyes, who was his personal friend and next door neighbor. He further testified that, when he went to the bank in January, 1921, he spoke to Mr. Keyes, and that Mr. Keyes told him that Mr. Ferroggiaro was handling that business and to see him. The contract had not been drafted at the time he talked to Mr. Ferroggiaro, and therefore he did not have all of the provisions of the contract in mind; he did not discuss with Mr. Ferroggiaro that part of the contract which reads:

> "It is further agreed that the warehouse receipts held by the Bank of Italy shall not be delivered to the said Laughlin until said note is paid, and the proceeds from the sale of the said products so represented by warehouse receipts shall be applied in the manner set forth in the foregoing agreement."

He further testified that the same passage was not in the contract at the time Mr. Hancock had his conversation with Mr. Ferroggiaro.

> "I expected the bank would put up the money to mill the hemp and then give me one-half of the proceeds irrespective of its claim for money advanced. That was expressed in the contract. I was not concerned at all in what it would cost to mill the hemp; the only thing I was concerned in was the agreement with the bank whereby they were to pay half the proceeds on my note, irrespective of how much money the bank might have in the hemp itself."

The plaintiff read in evidence the deposition of James C. Keyes, the assistant cashier of the defendant bank. In his deposition the witness read a letter received from the plaintiff under date of January 18, 1921. That letter was produced from the files of the bank. It is addressed, "Bank of Italy, Stockton, California. Gentlemen," and therein this plaintiff enjoins the bank from making certain payments. After that letter was received at the bank, the plaintiff went to Stockton. While there he went to the bank regarding his tentative contract of sale to Laughlin. When he went in he called on Mr. Keyes, and upon stating the business in hand Mr. Keyes informed him that Mr. Ferroggiaro had charge of that matter. After the plaintiff left the bank, he returned to Fort Bragg. While at Fort Bragg he received from Judge Hancock a formal written agreement. After he had executed it, he sent the formal written agreement, together with a letter, addressed "Mr. J. C. Keyes, Bank of Italy, Stockton, Calif. Dear Sir." In the letter he requested that the agreement be read and then recorded. At the time of the trial Mr. Keyes was unable to produce the letter, as it was a personal letter, and he did not preserve it. Mr. Preston, who had written the letter for the plaintiff, produced his copy. After Mr. Keyes received the written agreement, he said that he did not read it, but that he informed Mr. Ferroggiaro that Milliken had sent it to him with a request to have it recorded, and the reply was, "The Bank of Italy is not a party to it, go ahead and record it."

In addition to the writings above mentioned the record contains a copy of the promissory note dated February 15, 1921, for $7,500, a chattel mortgage of even date to secure the same, and a formal written agreement which on its face purports to be between L. E. Milliken, the party of the first part, and H. H. Laughlin, the party of the second part; it purports to be an agreement to buy and sell an undivided one-half interest in the partnership; it states the consideration of the sale as being evidenced by the promissory note and secured by a mortgage; it covers six pages of the transcript, and among other covenants the following:

(1.) "It is further agreed that the proceeds from all sales of products, not including hemp, owned by the party of the second part, now situated in the warehouse and upon which the Bank of Italy owns, or has in its possession, warehouse receipts, shall first be applied to the payment of the present indebtedness of the party of the second part, to the said Bank of Italy, on loan against above products, and after the payment of such indebtedness, the remaining proceeds from the sales of said products shall be divided as follows:

(2.) "One-half thereof to be paid to the party of the first part, and applied by the Bank of Italy upon the promissory note for $7,500 hereinbefore referred to, and the remaining one-half thereof to be retained by the party of the second part, for the use in the conduct of the business.

(3.) "It is further agreed that the warehouse receipts held by the Bank of Italy shall not be delivered to the said H. H. Laughlin until the said note is paid, and the proceeds from the sales of the said products so represented by warehouse receipts shall be applied in the manner as set forth in the foregoing agreement.

(4.) "It is agreed that all hemp products on Woodward Island shall be sold in the name of the Bank of Italy, and the proceeds thereof shall be applied by them on the said $7,500 note as follows:

(5.) "One-half thereof to the Bank of Italy and the remaining thereof to L. E. Milliken, party of the first part.

(6.) "It is further agreed that the said note for $7,500 will be deposited with the said Bank of Italy, so that the payments made as hereinbefore stipulated may be indorsed upon the said note by the said Bank of Italy, when paid, at the times as hereinbefore stated." (Numbering ours.)

[2] It will be noted that after the payment of Laughlin's debts secured by warehouse receipts, the foregoing paragraphs numbered by us 1, 2, and 3, had the effect of taking from the possible claims of the defendant and turning over to the plaintiff one-half of all proceeds from sales of Laughlin's crops, although the defendant then held a note of the partnership for $2,500. There is no claim that the defendant ever agreed to such a covenant. Conceding, but not deciding, that Mr. Ferroggiaro, for the defendant, had agreed orally to the rest of the terms of the written agreement of February 15, 1921, when the draft was completed and presented containing the additional terms, Mr. Ferroggiaro was entitled to treat the written instrument as a rejection of his oral agreement and the suggestion of a new agreement. 13 C. J. 281, § 86. Such, apparently, was his view, because, when Mr. Ferroggiaro first saw it, he said the bank was not a party.

[3, 4] As to the other paragraphs there are two separate elements involved which require separate considerations. The plaintiff's theory was that the defendant was to advance the moneys for harvesting, but, before repaying itself, that it was to turn over to the plaintiff one-half of the gross proceeds from the sale of hemp. Such a contract would vary from the ordinary experiences of men. It would not be fair to the defendant. The evidence thereon was oral. Oral admissions are to be received with caution. Every presumption is in favor of the judgment of the trial court. The power to draw inferences from the facts rested with the trial court. This court has no power to state that of two conflicting inferences the trial court should have adopted one inference rather than another. We may not hold, under these circumstances, that the trial court erred because it held, in effect, that plaintiff's witnesses had misunderstood Mr. Ferroggiaro.

[5] The other branch requiring a separate consideration is that the defendant agreed to set aside one-half of the proceeds and indorse on Laughlin's note payments accordingly. The evidence does not show, and no person who was present at the oral negotiations testified, that Laughlin's note was ever to be in the defendant's possession (and it never was), or that it would ever be presented to the defendant, or that the defendant would make any indorsement thereon. Moreover, the evidence shows that, when the parties were endeavoring to make a tripartite agreement, that from the beginning it was contemplated that the agreement between Laughlin and Milliken was to be in writing. No evidence was introduced showing any excuse for not making the defendant directly a party, or, at least, having it indorse its acceptance. Mr. Ferroggiaro was the officer of the defendant who had charge of the business, and there is no evidence that either Laughlin or Milliken, or their agent, ever caused the written agreement, which it is claimed he was to carry into execution, to be exhibited to him, or that he was ever advised of the terms which had been actually inserted therein.

[6] There is yet another reason why the plaintiff cannot recover in this case. As pointed out above, the plaintiff held a mortgage on the property theretofore owned by the partnership. After the hemp above mentioned had been sold, and the proceeds applied upon the notes held by the bank, the plaintiff returned to Laughlin the promissory note executed by him and accepted a bill of sale conveying Laughlin's interest in the hemp mill. The bill of sale was dated the 9th day of December, 1921. When the plaintiff surrendered to Laughlin the promissory note, he entered into agreement not to take a deficiency judgment against Laughlin in the proceedings to be had looking toward the foreclosure of the mortgage. All of these things had been done, had, and taken before this action was commenced on the 5th day of July, 1922. Now it is the constant theory of the plaintiff that the liability of the Bank of Italy rests in the oral agreement of Mr. Ferroggiaro to carry out the written agreement made between Laughlin and Milliken. However, the facts just adverted to show a decided modification of that agreement.

From the facts above stated several inferences may logically be drawn. It may be reasonably inferred that the value of Laughlin's interest in the hemp mill was a considerable sum, or else that the plaintiff would not have exchanged for it a note of the face value of $7,500. On the other hand, it may be inferred that the value of said interest was not of the full sum of $7,500, or otherwise there would not have been any necessity for a covenant regarding the waiving of the right to take a deficiency judgment. No evidence was introduced from which the trial court could determine the value of the mill, the amount of Laughlin's credit for conveying his one-half interest therein, or what amount, if any, was due by Laughlin to Milliken on the agreement after the bill of sale had been made. The utmost that could be claimed against the Bank of Italy was that the bank should pay on the unpaid balance of the note a sum not exceeding one-half the proceeds of the sale of the hemp, but, until the unpaid balance was ascertained, it could not be known what sum the bank was liable for. It is clear that, if the note had been fully paid, the defendant would have no right, with notice of such payment, to pay, for Laughlin's account, any additional moneys to the plaintiff. Although the plaintiff surrendered the note for $7,500 to the maker, he claims he did not, by the surrender, intend to release the whole of his claim against the defendant. By its judgment the trial court found otherwise.

We may not hold that the trial court drew the wrong inferences from the foregoing facts. Rideout v. City of Los Angeles, 185 Cal. 426, 434, 197 Pac. 74.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeals from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Actions by D. A. Stewart and another and W. A. Stewart, respectively, against Blanche Erskine-Bolst, formerly Blanche Ryer. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Purcell Rowe, of San Francisco, W. U. Goodman, of Fairfield, and Chas. S. Wheeler, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, and Jos. M. Raines, of Fairfield, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. The two cases above named were heard in the trial court together upon the same testimony which has been presented to this court upon one transcript, and therefore will be heard and determined as one cause of action. The actions are for damages for the destruction of crops. Plaintiffs had judgment, and the defendant appeals.

On the 14th day of June, 1917, the defendant, being the owner of a tract of land embracing several hundred acres situated on Ryer Island in the county of Solano, state of California, made and entered into an indenture of lease with the plaintiffs whereby said lands and premises were demised and let to the plaintiffs for a term of 12 years upon a rental aggregating approximately $250,000. This indenture of lease, among other provisions, contains the following paragraphs constituting the basis of this action, the meaning of which is held to be different by the respective parties, and calling for construction by this court. The first of said paragraphs appears in said indenture of lease in typewritten form, and is as follows:

"Said first party agrees to do everything reasonably necessary to keep the water level in the district ditches bordering on and running through the lands hereby demised, as near as possible, at an elevation of four feet below the surface level of the land."

The second paragraph, just referred to, appears in the printed body of said indenture of lease, and is as follows:

"And in consideration of the premises, it is further agreed by and between the parties hereto that said second parties will have no claim against said first party for damages suffered by them or either or any of them, or their or either or any of their families or effects, by reason of any flood or overflow of water upon or over said premises against said first party, either personally or as a stockholder or a member of said Reclamation District No. 501."

Following the allegations of the complaint and the testimony set forth in the transcript, it appears that during the months of January and February, 1919, the defendant did not comply with the typewritten covenant in the lease in that the water in the ditches referred to was not kept at an elevation of four feet below the surface of the demised lands, but was permitted to rise therein above the surface of said lands, to spread out over the same, and so inundate and saturate the lands in question that crops growing thereon were very greatly injured; that the plaintiffs were thereby prevented from cultivating or planting crops upon other portions of said lands, all to the damage of the plaintiffs in a large sum of money, and as found by the jury in one case in the sum of $20,934 and in the other case in the sum of $23,000.

Upon this appeal the appellant sets forth four grounds for reversal, to wit: First, that neither of the complaints filed by the plaintiffs states a cause of action; second, that the printed paragraph of the lease set forth herein exonerates the defendant from all damages suffered by the plaintiffs; third, that the damages are excessive; and, fourth, errors in instructions given by the court to the jury. The amended complaint in each action sets forth the typewritten clause which we have quoted, in which the lessor covenants to do everything reasonably necessary to keep the water level in the ditches, bordering on and running through the demised premises, as near as possible at an elevation of four feet below the surface level of the land and the allegation that the defendant failed to comply with such covenant, that the plaintiffs have complied with the terms and conditions of the lease covenanted to be performed by them, and then the following allegation as to damages that by reason of said failure of said defendant said plaintiffs have suffered great damage and injury to the crops growing on said lands and premises, etc.

The defendant demurred to both of the amended complaints, the demurrers being identical, the first ground of demurrer being that the amended complaints do not state a cause of action, and then specifically setting forth eight different grounds, only one of which need be here set forth. It reads:

> "How or in what manner the alleged failure of defendant caused injury or damage to the crops of plaintiffs."

The demurrers were overruled, and the ruling of the court is assigned as error.

[1-3] As against the general portion of the demurrer, we think the complaint in each case is sufficient; as against the special cause of demurrer which we have quoted, we are inclined to the view that the trial court should have sustained the same and required an amended complaint to be filed in each case setting forth more clearly and particularly the manner in which the plaintiffs' crops had been damaged, etc. This view of the pleadings, however, does not necessitate a reversal with a direction to the court below to sustain the appellant's demurrers and allow the plaintiffs to file further amended complaints in these actions. The cause went to trial, as appears from the transcript, upon the theory that the defendant had not taken or performed the necessary acts reasonably required by her to be performed under the covenants of the lease prior to the months of January and February, 1919; that, by reason of not having enlarged the district ditches, running through and bordering upon the demised premises prior to the time referred to, their capacity was not sufficiently large to enable the defendant to comply with the terms and conditions contained in the lease, and that by reason of such failure the waters rose in said ditches and flowed out over the demised lands and premises, inundating and saturating the same and materially injuring the crops growing thereon. All of this testimony was introduced without a single objection being interposed thereto or any statement being made by counsel indicating that all of said issues were not properly tendered by the pleadings, or that the defendant was being taken by surprise or did not fully understand the issues tendered and to be met. A few quotations from counsel for appellant will suffice to show that the scope of the issues being tried and to which the testimony was being directed was fully understood. We cull these statements from the record:

> "We are in court under what we had failed to do prior to and up to February, 1919." "We are here to answer this one proposition: Did we do everything necessary in order to keep the ditches that were then there as near as possible at a certain level? If we show that, that is our defense." "We are in court here to determine whether we have followed the terms of our lease."

The testimony also shows that all the parties to the action fully understood the location and character of the lands, the necessity for keeping the water at a certain level below the surface; that to do so it would be necessary to remove the waters falling upon said land during the rainy season, as well as take up and convey away the natural seepage water permeating all lands situated in the Delta district.

The answers filed by the defendant also specifically met the issue as to whether the defendant had or had not complied with her covenant in reference to keeping the water in the ditches at a certain level.

We are now dealing with the pleadings after a full hearing upon all the issues which could have been presented if the amended complaints had been drawn according to the forms approved by the most skillful lawyers or exacting methods of procedure. There is no pretense that the defendant has been misled; there is no showing whatever that any injury has resulted from the defect in the pleadings. Under this state of the case, we think the language of this court in the case of Boyle v. Coast Improvement Co., 27 Cal. App. 714, 721, 151 Pac. 25, 28, directly in point.

"It seems to us that the reformed procedure would receive a decided shock if a defendant should be permitted to stand by and without objection allow an issue to be tried as though properly presented by the pleadings and on appeal escape the consequences by claiming that the complaint failed to present such issue. * * * In the case here the trial proceeded in all respects as though the pleadings sufficiently presented the issue as to there being heirs, and precisely as it would had the complaint contained the allegation which it is insisted it should have contained. Why, then, should the case go back to have the complaint amended, as it is manifest that the proof would be the same. How can it be said that defendant has sustained 'substantial injury and that a different result would have been probable if such error * * * or defect * * * had not occurred?'" This is a quotation from a former decision by this court in the case of Slaughter v. Goldberg, Bowen & Co., 26 Cal. App. 321, 147 Pac. 90. In both cases section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution are referred to and relied upon. That section requires that no judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted for any error as to any matter of pleading unless the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Nothing of that kind appears in this case. The two decisions to which we have referred, the cases there cited, the section of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the amended section of the Constitution, we think a sufficient answer to the appellant's objection to the complaints now under consideration.

[4] We come now to the second objection. Many cases have been cited based upon exoneration clauses contained in leases, and the deduction is drawn therefrom that the exoneration clauses in the leases involved in this case overcome and annul any and all obligations contained in the typewritten covenant which we have heretofore set forth. On the part of the respondent it is earnestly contended that the typewritten covenant, if there is any conflict between the two clauses or paragraphs, takes precedence over printed matter contained in the lease, and therefore stands in the indenture as though there were no printed exoneration clause.

As we view this case, there is no conflict between the two clauses or paragraphs, and each of them may stand and be given full force and effect. They refer to different contingencies and conditions. They relate to different waters and to different causes and results.

The evidence shows that Ryer Island, on which the demised premises are located, is entirely surrounded by levees constructed for the double purpose of reclaiming the lands within district 501 and to protect such lands from the flood waters that come down through that section of the country when the rivers spread out over their banks and carry destruction and devastation in their course. As we read the lease, the exoneration clause relates to flood waters as ordinarily understood, to wit: A body of moving water; a flowing stream; a body of water rising, swelling, and overflowing land not usually thus covered. This is the definition given by Webster and approved by several courts. The parties executing the lease under consideration knew and had in mind the liability of the flooding of Ryer Island by the waters of the Sacramento river and its tributaries. They knew that the swelling waters in the river were likely to break the barriers theretofore erected by the district and flood the demised premises, destroying everything in the way of improvements that the plaintiffs might place thereon. This is the kind of flood to which the printed portion of the lease refers. Against such a flood no one could reasonably be required to covenant. The damages arising from floods of this nature are such as every farmer in the delta region is presumed to take into consideration when he begins farming operations upon premises always exposed to such menace. If this is not the kind of flood referred to in the exoneration clause, then, in the event that defendant found that her covenants involved the expenditure of more money than was contemplated all the defendant need to do would be to cease operations, let the waters rise in the ditches, saturate, inundate and overflow the demised lands, and then say, "I am not responsible for the flooding of your lands." This statement clearly shows that the two paragraphs have reference to different and separate causes and effects. The typewritten paragraph refers to a condition and situation inside the levee; the printed paragraph, an exoneration clause, relates to a cause arising and coming from outside the district, rising above the surrounding levees and producing a condition of damage and devastation therein.

We think the foregoing sufficiently shows that the two paragraphs may stand as independent clauses or paragraphs in the lease, and that each of them may be given full force and effect.

[5-7] The question then occurs: Did the defendant do everything reasonably necessary to keep the water level in the district ditches bordering on and running through the demised lands and premises as nearly as possible at an elevation of four feet below the surface level of the lands, and was the jury justified in finding that the defendant had not done so? The covenant in question is not limited in its language as to the capacity of the ditches at the time of the execution of the indenture of lease. It is a covenant to keep the water at a certain level.

This includes everything reasonably necessary to accomplish such purpose. It presupposes the maintaining of ditches of such capacity and pumping plants of such water-hoisting power as may be reasonably sufficient to comply with the intendment of the parties in the execution of the lease. The lease itself sets forth that a considerable portion of the acreage of the demised premises shall be planted to asparagus, and it is reasonable to infer that the parties took into consideration the necessary conditions requisite to be maintained for the profitable cultivation of that plant. The testimony shows, as well as the covenant in the lease, that all parties understood that the successful cultivation of asparagus required the water level in the ditches to be kept at least four feet below the surface level of the land. It, also, satisfactorily appears from the testimony that during the months of January and February, 1919, the waters in the ditches referred to were not kept at the required level, but rose therein to such an extent that a large portion of the demised lands was inundated, saturated, and rendered unfit for the cultivation of crops for a considerable period of time. The testimony also shows that, while the rainfall for the seasons of 1918 and 1919 was excessive, it was not unusual, nor such as does not frequently occur, and was not such a precipitation as might not be reasonably anticipated and guarded against. It also appears that after the execution of the lease and prior to the injury complained of, a period covering approximately 18 months, nothing was done toward enlarging the ditches bordering upon or running through the leased lands and premises so as to render it possible for the defendant to keep the water level as nearly as possible at a certain line or elevation. The testimony of several engineers, as shown by the transcript, is to the effect that the taking care of the rainfall, such as occurred during the season in controversy, was a mere matter of ditch capacity, and that the ditches, as they existed at the time of the injury, were insufficient in capacity and required enlargement in order to properly protect lands leased to the plaintiff in this action. In other words, the question of protecting the lands and safeguarding them from the rise of waters in the ditches as covenanted in the leases is a mere matter of financial expenditure, and not a question of physical possibility or impossibility. It may be true that the expenditures required to properly protect the lands as covenanted aggregate or would aggregate a considerable sum of money, considered in and of itself, and by itself, but, when the further fact is considered that the rental value required to be returned and paid by the lessees to the lessor is graduated according to years, from $10 to $27.50 per acre, aggregating the total sum, as heretofore stated, of approximately $250,000, the cost of protection agreed to be afforded may not be at all out of proportion, when all the circumstances and conditions are considered together. Be that as it may, however, the covenant of lease, as we read it, is to do a certain thing or to perform an act which is in no sense a physical impossibility, but requiring only the expenditure of capital. This, of course, constitutes no defense. We think in this particular the jury, from the testimony introduced, had a right to conclude that the defendant had not done all that she was reasonably required to have done prior to the injury complained of, and that the defendant's failure so to comply with the covenant of lease to keep the water level below, or at a certain elevation, was the proximate cause of the damage to the plaintiffs' crops. When the question of the sufficiency of testimony is presented, it is not the province of the court, as has been often stated, to weigh and determine the same, but only to ascertain whether there is testimony in the case upon which the trial court or jury may reasonably base the conclusion reached. We think there is such testimony in this case, and that determines the question.

[8] The third contention urged by the appellant, that the damages are excessive and that the rule adopted for ascertaining the same is incorrect, meets the same principle of law encountered by appellant's first objection considered in this opinion. The testimony upon the subject of damages was introduced without any objection whatsoever. The rule laid down in the case of Teller v. Bay & River Dredging Co., 151 Cal. 209, 90 Pac. 942, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267, 12 Ann. Cas. 779, appears to have been followed very closely. The whole subject was gone into both upon the direct and cross examination of the witnesses. The whole theory of the case, so far as the question of damages is involved, appears to have been that the proper method of procedure was being followed, and that the testimony introduced and submitted to the jury was the proper testimony to be considered by them in ascertaining what damages, if any, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. Upon this appeal, it is asked that plaintiff's claim of loss on field No. 2 of $2,885.52, also of the sum of $2,173.29 on fields Nos. 4 and 5, and the further sum of $1,607.25 on fields Nos. 6 and 7, should have been calculated and determined according to the rule laid down in Crow v. San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Co., 130 Cal. 309, 62 Pac. 562, 1058, that the rental value only of said land should have been considered. No such contention was made in the court below; no objection was made to the character of the testimony introduced to enable the jury to ascertain and determine the losses suffered by the plaintiffs upon the particular tracts here enumerated. The contention now is that those lands had not been planted or seeded to crops, and rental value only constituted the loss suffered by the plaintiffs. Whenever the rule laid down in the Crow Case, supra, applies, we, of course, are bound by that rule, but it is evident that the mere mental value paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants for waterlogged lands would in no sense be adequate in this case. The plaintiffs were deprived of the use of the lands adapted for a particular purpose, and we may conclude from the amount of rent per acre agreed to be paid were peculiarly valuable for agriculture when properly protected. Some such view must have been in contemplation of the parties when the testimony was being introduced upon which it was purposed to ask the jury to fix the amount of damages in these cases. The amount of damages appears to have been very carefully presented and the testimony in relation thereto submitted to the jury upon a state of facts tacitly admitting that, if the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, they were entitled to recover the amount asked for. Under such circumstances, we do not very well see how this court can now sustain an objection to testimony which was not made at the time of the trial or hold that such testimony was improperly admitted and order a new trial when the whole case shows that no one questioned the competency of such testimony to fix the damages in this case at the time of its admission. It is evident that the judgments are not excessive in the amounts claimed by appellant. The difference, if any, would be the rental value of the lands to the plaintiffs and the amount allowed. What that is we have no way of ascertaining and nothing to show the same was introduced in the court below or offered to be introduced or pointed out to us here. We think appellant's third objection insufficient to warrant a reversal of this cause.

The contention is further made by the appellant that the jury awarded damages covering 20 acres of barley destroyed by fire, and for which destruction the plaintiffs collected insurance. Testimony as to the destruction of 20 acres of barley was introduced by the defendant, and also as to the payment of the insurance thereof. It is here sought to have us conclude that the 20 acres of barley referred to were taken into the estimate made by the jury. We have read the testimony carefully, as set out in appellant's brief and also in the transcript, and do not find that there is anything showing that the 20 acres here mentioned were a part of the inundated and replanted lands, but if such were the case it would not materially alter the result, because as to the replanted lands the jury allowed damages only for the lessened production of the crops realized, and not for the amount which was actually obtained. This appears to have been overlooked by the appellant.

[9, 10] It is finally urged that the court below misdirected the jury as to matters of law, one of the contentions under this subdivision being that the court left to the jury the interpretation of the clauses of the leases which we have heretofore considered in this opinion. This contention requires but little comment. It is evident that the jury by its verdict followed the interpretation which we have given, and hence must have followed what we believe to be the law applicable to this case and the consideration of the leases involved herein. Under such circumstances, the defendant is not prejudiced, even though we were to hold that consideration of the leases is a pure matter of law for the court. It is further urged that the court committed prejudicial error by inserting the following words, to wit: "Through no fault of the defendant"—in instruction No. 4 asked by the defendant. The instruction as requested reads as follows:

> "Plaintiffs, in their leases, expressly agreed to keep all ditches clean from weeds at all times. If you find from the evidence that the plaintiffs did not at all times keep all ditches on said premises clean from weeds, and that as a result of such failure, the drainage ditches became clogged up and the flow of the water in such ditches in February and March, 1919, was impeded to such an extent that damage resulted, the defendant cannot be held liable for the injury resulting from such a cause."

This instruction, as given, was made to read as follows by the court:

> "Plaintiffs, in their leases, expressly agreed to keep all ditches clean from weeds at all times. If you find from the evidence that plaintiffs did not at all times keep all ditches on said premises clean from weeds, and that as a result of such failure the drainage ditches became clogged up and the flow of the water in such ditches in February and March, 1919, was impeded to such an extent that damage resulted, through no fault of defendant, the defendant cannot be held liable for the injury resulting from such a cause."

It is evident that the court had in mind, in modifying the foregoing instruction, the fact that the drainage ditches emptied into and discharged their waters into the ditches which we have heretofore been considering, and that unless the defendant kept the waters in such ditches below a certain level the drainage ditch could not discharge waters thereinto. In this view we do not think the modification erroneous, but if so, it was harmless, in view of instruction No. 6, immediately given thereafter, which reads as follows:

> "No damages can be awarded plaintiffs in this case unless it is proven to your satisfaction that there was a breach of the clause of the lease in question on the part of defendant and that such breach caused the damage alleged."

Minor objections are made to some other instructions which do not seem to us to call for comment herein further than to say that upon the whole case we think there were no errors in the instructions prejudicial to the defendant, or which furnish any reasonable cause for urging errors therein.

We think the judgments of the trial court entered in these cases should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Ex parte BROWN. (Cr. 1175.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. April 14, 1924.)

1. Intoxicating liquors 🔑279—Judgment sufficient in restraining features to be basis of contempt proceedings.

Portion of judgment in liquor nuisance case, "Defendant and * * * agents * * * are enjoined * * * from using * * * said premises * * * for * * * one year," held sufficient, independent of writ signed by clerk, to be basis for contempt proceeding.

2. Intoxicating liquors 🔑279—Knowledge of unserved injunction judgment sufficient for contempt.

Though judgment in liquor nuisance case enjoining defendant was not served on him, his knowledge of its rendition was sufficient on which to base contempt proceedings for its violation.

3. Intoxicating liquors 🔑279—Affidavit on information and belief sufficient as complaint.

Affidavit in nature of complaint for contempt, for violating liquor nuisance injunction, constituting at most a misdemeanor, though based solely on information and belief, without setting out sources thereof, is sufficient, though it could not be used as evidence.

4. Intoxicating liquors 🔑279—Immaterial that commitment was faulty in quotations from writ of injunction.

Where defendant was charged with violating judgment enjoining him from using for any purpose premises which he had been using as liquor nuisance and also the injunction writ issued by clerk thereon, and the contempt for which he was committed consisted of violating of such provision of judgment, it is immaterial that commitment did not follow terms of injunction writ varying from judgment.

Original habeas corpus proceeding by Harry Brown for release from commitment. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., Earle Warren, Asst. Dist. Atty., and Carlisle C. Crosby, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Petitioner seeks his release under habeas corpus from a commitment for contempt in which he was charged with violating an injunction of the superior court restraining him from using and occupying certain premises in the county of Alameda which had been ordered vacated as a nuisance under the terms of the statutes prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors. Three points of attack are made upon the commitment and we will consider them in the order of their presentation.

[1] 1. It is argued that the writ of injunction which the petitioner was charged with violating is ineffective because signed by the clerk of the court and not by the trial judge. The original action was instituted by the district attorney for the purpose of having the premises owned and occupied by the petitioner herein declared to be a public nuisance because said premises were being used by the petitioner for the purpose of selling intoxicating liquors in violation of the prohibition statutes. After trial a judgment was rendered signed by the trial judge and duly entered. Thereafter what is termed a permanent writ of injunction was issued by the clerk of the court. In this the people followed the old practice, which has long since been discontinued in this state, and if this writ of injunction were the only restraining order involved the question presented by the petitioner herein would offer serious difficulties. But in addition to this writ the trial judge, as has been said, signed and entered a judgment which, though it is not to be commended as to form, is sufficient in its restraining features to form the basis of the contempt proceedings. This judgment is a combination of findings of fact, conclusions of law, an order that an injunction should issue restraining the defendant from performing certain acts in regard to the property, an order which in itself restrains the defendant from performing certain other acts in regard to the property, and an order mandatory in form requiring that certain other acts be performed in regard to the property. The portion of the judgment which is of importance to our consideration reads:

> "And the defendant Harry Brown, and each of his agents, servants and employees, and any and all persons acting in conjunction with or in concert with him, or either or any of them, are enjoined, restrained and prohibited from using or occupying or permitting said premises to be used or occupied for any purpose whatever for said period of one year from the date hereof, or until the further order of this court."

[2] The affidavit upon which the contempt proceedings were based charged the petitioner herein with the violation of this portion of the judgment as well as the so-called writ of injunction which was issued by the clerk. In so far as the judgment restrained the petitioner from using and occupying the premises for the period of one year, it was in strict accord with the terms of the act under which the proceedings were instituted and thus constituted a valid restraint against the use of the premises. It is true, as argued by petitioner, that the affidavit upon which the contempt proceedings were based does not clearly allege service of this judgment upon the petitioner, but it does appear that he had knowledge of the rendering of the judgment and this the Supreme Court, in In re Brambini, 218 Pac. 569, held was sufficient.

[3] 2. It is argued that the whole proceedings charging contempt were invalid because the affidavit on which they were based set forth all the essential allegations on the information and belief only of the affiant. Ordinarily an affidavit made solely on information and belief is ineffective for any purpose unless at least the sources of the information and belief are stated. This rule obtains where such affidavits are to be used as evidence in some judicial proceeding. Where, as here, the affidavit is in the nature of a complaint, the statement of facts upon information and belief and the failure to give the sources thereof has not been held to be fatal. In Selowsky v. Superior Court, 180 Cal. 404, 407, 181 Pac. 652, it was held that an affidavit charging the commission of a contempt need not be more specific in its averments of the facts constituting the contempt than a complaint or an information charging a crime. A contempt of this character is at the most a misdemeanor, and, of course, a complaint charging a misdemeanor may be based upon information and belief. The affidavit under consideration in the Selowsky Case was, to a large extent, based upon information and belief, and, though the point was not expressly decided, these allegations were treated as sufficient. Though the practice is not an approved one, it would seem to follow from that case that an affidavit charging a contempt may be based on information and belief. If such affidavit is sought to be used as evidence against the alleged contemner on the hearing of the contempt proceedings, then a different situation would arise and the rule relating to hearsay would apply. This objection is not open to the petitioner here, as it appears that the affiant was put on the stand and gave his testimony orally at the contempt hearing.

[4] 3. It is argued that the commitment is faulty in its quotations from the judgment and the writ of injunction, but, as has heretofore been pointed out, the petitioner was charged with violating both the judgment and the injunction, and it is therefore immaterial whether the so-called writ of injunction issued by the clerk followed the terms of the judgment signed by the trial judge. This judgment prohibited the occupation and use of the premises for any purposes whatsoever and the contempt for which the petitioner herein was committed consisted of the occupation and use of said premises in violation of the terms of this order.

The writ is discharged and the prisoner remanded.

WILES v. HAMMER. (Civ. 4004.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 15, 1924.)

1. Trial ⟹404(1)—Finding in form of negative pregnant, attempting to negative affirmative allegation, implies truth of allegation.

A finding in the form of a negative pregnant, attempting to negative an affirmative allegation, implies the truth of the allegation.

2. Trial ⟹398—Inconsistent and contradictory findings require reversal.

Where the findings on all the causes of action were for plaintiff, but findings on affirmative defenses were in the form of a negative pregnant, making the findings inconsistent and contradictory, a reversal of the judgment was necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by A. T. Wiles against P. W. Hammer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, and L. E. Nathan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. E. Schmidt, of Wasco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. [1, 2] This action is for the recovery of a money judgment against the defendant. The complaint contains three causes of action: The first, upon a contract for the drilling of a well; the second, for the value of certain well-casing; and, the third, for services performed in the development work on wells belonging to the defendant. The answer consists of a denial of the allegations of the complaint and affirmative matter in the nature of an affirmative defense to each of the three causes of action set out in the complaint. Defendant also filed a cross-complaint, but no point seems to be made by appellant regarding any issue involved in the latter pleading. The court found in favor of plaintiff upon all three causes of action set forth in said complaint and awarded judgment in his favor for the amount prayed for, less the amount of a counterclaim set up by defendant in his answer. The counterclaim was no part of, and was entirely independent of, the matters set forth in the affirmative defenses of the answer.

In the findings of fact filed, the court, after finding in favor of plaintiff upon the allegations of the complaint, found also upon the issues made by defendant's affirmative defenses. Upon these issues it is apparent that the court intended to find in plaintiff's favor, but many of the findings upon this branch of the case were prepared by using the statement, "It is not true," and following such statement with a copy of the allegations of the affirmative defense, with the result that the findings thus prepared and signed by the court contained many contradictory and inconsistent statements. Accordingly, we find that in many instances where it was evidently the intention of the court to find in favor of the plaintiff, on account of the erroneous method employed in drafting the findings, the very opposite result was obtained. Take, for instance, the findings upon the issues presented by plaintiff's second cause of action. The plaintiff alleged, and the court found as true, that the plaintiff furnished and delivered to defendant, at defendant's special instance and request, well-casing of the reasonable value of $117.58, no part of which had been paid. In addition to his denial of these allegations of the complaint, the defendant alleged in substance that all well-casing furnished by plaintiff was furnished at plaintiff's own cost and expense, by reason of his careless, negligent, and unskillful construction of two other wells which he had drilled for the defendant, and by reason of the fact that plaintiff had wasted and lost a large quantity of casing belonging to defendant in the worthless construction of these other wells, and that any and all casing furnished by plaintiff was furnished under an agreement on the part of plaintiff to drill for defendant, without further cost to defendant, a good and sufficient well.

The finding of the court upon this allegation of defendant's answer was as follows:

> "That it is not true as alleged in the answer and cross-complaint that all casing furnished by plaintiff was furnished at his own cost and expense by reason of his careless, negligent and unskillful construction of the first two wells, and by reason of the fact that in the construction of said last-mentioned well the plaintiff had wasted and lost a large quantity of casing belonging to the defendant in the worthless and useless wells above mentioned, and that all of the casing furnished by plaintiff was furnished under and pursuant to the agreement of plaintiff above mentioned to finish and complete defendant a good and sufficient well."

It is apparent from the reading of this finding that it does not negative the allegations of defendant's answer above referred to, but is in the nature of a negative pregnant and implies the truth of at least some of these allegations without showing which ones, if any, are untrue. A finding in the form of a negative pregnant, attempting to negative an affirmative allegation, implies the truth of the allegation. Tormey v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irrigation District, 53 Cal. App. 559, 200 Pac. 814; Auerbach v. Healy, 174 Cal. 60–65, 161 Pac. 1157; Southern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Dufour, 95 Cal. 615–619, 30 Pac. 783, 19 L. R. A. 92. We find this condition exists in respect to the findings upon the issues in all three causes of action.

The findings, therefore, being inconsistent and contradictory upon the material issues in the case do not support the judgment.

> "The rule on this subject may safely be said to go this far, at least—that where there are contradictory findings about matters material to the merits of the case, and the determination of which, one way, or the other, is essential to the correctness of the judgment, there the judgment cannot stand. If one part of the contradictory findings would support the judgment, and another part would necessarily upset it, then the judgment must be reversed." Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454–460, 21 Pac. 11, 13.

We regret the necessity of reversing the judgment under these circumstances, especially where the intention of the court to find in plaintiff's favor is so apparent; but, if we give to the findings their proper construction and meaning, no other result can follow.

Judgment is reversed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 10, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 9, 1924.)

1. Fraud 🔑50—Presumption in favor of innocence.

Courts do not infer fraud because of conduct not conforming to complainant's ideas of morality, since law presumes that a person is innocent of wrong; that private transactions are fair and regular; that ordinary course of business has been followed.

2. Fraud 🔑50—Proof essential.

Fraud must be proved.

3. Fraud 🔑17—Full disclosure required.

Though one may be under no duty to speak, if he undertakes to do so, he must tell the truth, and not suppress facts within his knowledge or materially qualify those stated.

4. Fraud 🔑9 — Fraudulent representations may consist of half-truths.

Fraudulent representations may consist of half-truths calculated to deceive, and a representation literally true is actionable, if used to create an impression substantially false.

5. Fraud 🔑11(2) — Misrepresentation as to rental value held actionable.

In an agreement of exchange, defendants' misrepresentation of rental value of their property amounted to actionable fraud, for matter was one peculiarly within their knowledge.

6. Fraud 🔑22(1)—Representations held actionable notwithstanding investigation.

Plaintiffs were entitled to relief from fraud practiced on them by defendants' misrepresenting rentals of their property in exchange thereof, though plaintiffs investigated and were deceived by tenant, where they relied on defendants' statements and would not have gone through with transaction, had they known true facts.

7. Fraud 🔑22(1)—Investigation does not raise presumption party relied on own judgment.

That one makes an independent investigation does not necessarily show that he relied on his own judgment rather than on representation of other party, nor does it give rise to presumption of law to that effect.

8. Fraud 🔑23—Purchaser may rely on representation of facts not within his knowledge.

Purchaser may rely on vendor's representations as to facts not within purchaser's knowledge, and vendor cannot escape responsibility by showing that purchaser might have ascertained upon inquiry that representations were untrue.

9. Fraud 🔑31—Remedies available.

On discovery of fraud, party may restore what he has received and proceed in equity to rescind contract and recover what he has parted with; or he may affirm sale and recover damages for deceit, as he is entitled to his bargain.

10. Fraud 🔑59(2)—Measure of damages.

Where injured party affirms the sale, measure of damages will ordinarily be difference between value of the land as it is and what its value would have been if condition had been as represented.

11. Fraud 🔑59(2)—Measure of damages for misrepresentations as to rental value.

Plaintiffs were entitled to recover, as damages in exchange of property in which defendants misrepresented rental value of their property, difference in its value as it was and as it would have been if rent had been as represented.

Action by John V. Sullivan and others against Andrew Helbing and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles S. Peery, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Byrne & Lamson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action in tort alleged to have been committed through the making of misrepresentations as to the rental value of certain real property in the negotiations of an exchange.

The appeal is prosecuted from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $2,000 damages for the fraud found to have been perpetrated, after denial of a motion for nonsuit; no evidence having been offered by defendants.

The facts may be briefly stated as follows: Plaintiffs and defendants were the owners of different parcels of improved real property situated in the city and county of San Francisco. On or about the 3d day of May, 1922, defendants made an offer to the plaintiffs through an agent to exchange their respective holdings. The complaint alleges that for the purpose of inducing plaintiffs to make the exchange defendants falsely stated to them that their (defendants') property was under lease to a tenant who was paying as rental therefor the sum of $155 per month. It is admitted that the lease did provide for such rental, and that such lease was secured by a chattel mortgage on certain machinery; but it is charged that the tenant never paid such sum nor any sum greater than $135 per month, the difference in the amounts having been rebated by defendants. It is further charged that the defendants made the false representations concerning the rent for the purpose of leading the plaintiffs to believe that the property owned by defendants had a rental and market value in excess of that which it actually possessed, and that relying on such representation plaintiffs made the contract. The agreement further provided that when the transfers were consummated the rental paid by defendants' tenant for the current month should be prorated between the parties; and in pursuance of this arrangement, and in furtherance of the fraud, so it is alleged, defendants paid to plaintiffs the sum of $150, which sum they represented had been received by them as rent for the month of June, 1922. It is then alleged that neither this nor any other sum had been received by defendants from their tenant as rent for the period stated, but such amount was paid by them from funds otherwise acquired, and that it was so paid for the sole purpose of preventing plaintiffs from discovering the true state of facts, which were only ascertained by plaintiffs after the exchange had been consummated and when they demanded from the tenant the rental of the premises for the month of July, 1922, on which occasion the tenant vacated the premises and never paid plaintiffs any rent whatever. Plaintiffs then sold the machinery covered by the chattel mortgage according to law for the sum of $50, which they applied to the rent due for the month of July, and thereafter brought this action.

The trial court found that the defendants had made the false representations, and that by reason of their acts and concealments plaintiffs had been damaged in the sum of $2,000, for which amount judgment was rendered.

As ground for reversal it is urged that defendants made no false representations, as the premises were as a matter of fact leased under a rental of $155 per month, and that such lease was secured in the manner indicated; that under such circumstances, there being no confidential relations involved, the parties dealt at arm's length through an agent, and that no duty rested upon defendants to disclose to respondents that there had been a rebate in the rent, assuming this to be a material circumstance.

In support of this contention, we are cited to cases to the effect that, in the absence of a confidential relation, a vendor is under no obligation to volunteer information to his vendee which was as readily accessible to both parties, as the law will not undertake the care of persons who will not with the means at hand take care of themselves, and mere silence under such circumstances cannot be construed to be a fraudulent concealment sufficient to support an action for fraud. Bacon v. Soule, 19 Cal. App. 439, 126 Pac. 384; Ruhl v. Mott, 120 Cal. 668, 53 Pac. 304. It is accordingly claimed that the learned trial judge applied an idealistic conception of the law, which might be very commendable in morals but which has no support in law.

[1, 2] In dealing with cases in which one party to a transaction complains of the conduct of the other, courts are not to presume or infer fraud because such conduct does not conform to their ideas of morality. Fraud must be proven. The law presumes that a person is innocent of wrong; that private transactions are fair and regular; that the ordinary course of business has been followed. An inference of good faith rather than of fraud should be indulged, and the presumption against fraud must be overcome by him who alleges improper conduct. Arakelian v. Sears, 53 Cal. App. 653, 200 Pac. 757.

These principles, however, have no application to the instant case. Here defendants expressly represented that under the lease in question the tenant was obligated to pay $155 per month rent. While this representation was literally true, it amounted to a concealment of the true facts, since it was not disclosed that a lesser amount was actually paid and accepted in satisfaction of the obligation.

[3] Though one may be under no duty to speak as to a matter, if he undertakes to do so, either voluntarily or in response to inquiries, he is bound not only to state truly what he tells, but also not to suppress or conceal any facts within his knowledge which materially qualify those stated. If he speaks at all, he must make a full and fair disclosure. 12 R. C. L. Fraud and Deceit, § 71.

[4] Fraudulent representations may consist of half-truths calculated to deceive. Thus a representation literally true is actionable if used to create an impression substantially false. 26 C. J. p. 1100.

[5] Here the representation contained in the exchange agreement, as above indicated, expressly recited that the property was under present rental of $155 per month. This in legal effect amounted to a willful misrepresentation by the vendors, affirming that the rental from the property sought to be exchanged was greater than in truth it was. It amounted to actionable fraud, for the matter was one peculiarly within their knowledge. Hecht v. Metzler, 14 Utah, 408, 417, 48 Pac. 37, 60 Am. St. Rep. 906.

[6, 7] It is true that the evidence shows that the plaintiffs did make some independent investigation and were informed by the tenant that he could pay his rent; but it further shows that they relied upon the statements of defendants concerning the same, and that they would not have gone through with the transaction had they known the true facts. The mere circumstance that one makes an independent investigation or consults with others does not necessarily show that he relied on his own judgment rather than upon the representations of the other party, nor does it give rise to a presumption of law to that effect. Here plaintiffs were deceived by the tenant, who subsequent to the completion of the transaction informed them he had paid no rent. Under these circumstances, plaintiffs were misled through no fault of theirs, and as they also relied upon the representations of the defendants they are entitled to relief from the fraud practiced upon them. 12 R. C. L. Fraud and Deceit, § 111.

[8] A purchaser has the right to rely on the representations of the vendor as to facts not within the purchaser's knowledge, and the vendor cannot escape responsibility by showing that the purchaser might have ascertained upon inquiry that the representations were untrue. Morris v. Courtney, 120 Cal. 63, 52 Pac. 129.

It is intimated in the closing brief of appellants that respondents' remedy was an action for rescission.

[9, 10] Generally, there are two courses open to the injured party: He may on discovery of the fraud restore what he has received, and proceed in equity to rescind the contract and recover what he has parted with; or he may proceed in affirmance of the sale and recover damages for deceit, as he is entitled to his bargain. In the latter case the measure of damage will ordinarily be the difference between the value of the land as it is and what its value would have been if the condition had been as represented. 3 Sedgwick on Damages (9th Ed.) 1027, 1029; 39 Cyc. 2116; Page v. Wells, 37 Mich. 415; Estell v. Myers, 54 Miss. 174; Morse v. Hutchins, 102 Mass. 440. Quite frequently, though not always, the value of land is made to depend upon the amount of rent that it will produce, the rent being some evidence of value; and usually when the land is purchased for investment this is the controlling inducement.

[11] Here there is evidence in the record to show that the rental value of the property during the period in question was from $125 to $135 per month. There is also evidence to show that the effect of the rental value of this particular property controls in a measure its market value, and the difference in value as it is and what its value would have been if the rent was as represented amounts to $2,000. The trial court so found, and we are of the opinion that the findings are fully supported by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Provision of contract, whereby plaintiff doctor was employed to attend practice of another during absence, which required the one to surrender and abandon his practice in that place for period stated, and to allow plaintiff sole and exclusive management, if void, under Civ. Action by Frederick M. Rossiter against Elmer H. Thompson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Swaffield & Swaffield, of Long Beach, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant, arising out of an action brought on an alleged breach of contract.

Each of the parties is a physician and surgeon. From the record herein it appears that for several years prior to October 1, 1918, defendant had been engaged in the practice of his profession in the city of Burbank; that for a period of some seven or eight months prior to said date plaintiff had been practicing medicine in the town of La Brea; that at about that time defendant either had received, or was about to receive, a commission in the medical corps of the United States Army; and in anticipation of such appointment defendant initiated negotiations with plaintiff looking to an arrangement whereby plaintiff would abandon his medical practice at La Brea and take over defendant's medical practice at Burbank. The result of the negotiations was that an oral agreement was entered into between the parties, which, according to the finding of the judge of the trial court, was as follows:

"That on said 14th day of October, 1918, said parties entered into an agreement wherein and whereby plaintiff agreed to surrender and abandon his said residence and practice in said town of Brea and to take up his residence in said city of Burbank, and defendant agreed to employ plaintiff to take and assume full management and control of said defendant's practice and to maintain, carry on, and conduct the same for the period of one year, beginning October 14, 1918; and it was further agreed that plaintiff should receive as compensation a portion of the income derived from said practice computed as follows, to wit: The necessary operating and running expenses connected with said business, together with plaintiff's house rent, and also together with a sum of money sufficient to pay such income tax as should be levied upon the income derived during said period should be first deducted from the income of said practice during said period, and of the balance remaining plaintiff should receive 90 per cent. and defendant 10 per cent.; that by the terms of said agreement it was further agreed that defendant should not be obligated to render any services in the prosecution of said practice for one year, and should be privileged to remain away from said practice for the entire term of said agreement; and that defendant would allow plaintiff to remain and continue in the full management and control of said practice for said period and upon the terms above mentioned."

The terms of the agreement were complied with by each of the parties to the agreement until on or about the 14th day of January, 1919, when (again to quote the findings of the trial court): "defendant wrongfully and in violation of the terms of said agreement, and without any cause therefor, resumed the management, control, and conduct of his said practice,. and wrongfully and without any cause therefor discontinued the said employment of plaintiff, and wrongfully and without any cause therefor excluded plaintiff from said practice and from the management, control, and conduct thereof, and wrongfully and without any cause therefor excluded plaintiff from participation in any of the income from said practice, and continued to so wrongfully and without cause exclude plaintiff from said practice and from the management, control, and conduct thereof and from participation in any of the income of said practice, from said 14th day of January, 1919, for the balance of the term of said agreement."

[1] Defendant's first contention is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The basis of the objection is that, in addition to stating what is concededly unobjectionable as a cause of action, the complaint contains matter which it is claimed precludes plaintiff from a recovery of any judgment against defendant. The language of the complaint to which appellant's attack is directed is as follows:

> "That on or about the 14th day of October, 1918, it was agreed by said parties that plaintiff should surrender and abandon his said residence and practice in said town of Brea and take up his residence in said city of Burbank; that plaintiff should assume and undertake the burdens and responsibilities of and conduct and carry on the said practice of defendant for the ensuing year, and give to the same such time and effort as should be necessary, and that defendant should absent himself from said city of Burbank and the immediate vicinity thereof, and abandon his said practice and patients for said period of time, and allow and permit plaintiff to remain in the sole and exclusive management and control thereof for said period of time, so far as concerned the activities and professional efforts of defendant."

Appellant urges that the allegation that it was agreed "that defendant should absent himself from said city of Burbank, * * * and abandon his said practice and patients for said period of time" presents a situation inimical to the provisions of section 1673 of the Civil Code, by which any contract whereby any one is restrained from exercising a lawful profession "is to that extent void." The contract between plaintiff and defendant was one of employment, the compensation for which was based upon a percentage of the remuneration received for the work which was to be done. The apparent intention of the parties was that the employee was to do all the work and the employer was not expected to be present even for the purpose of overseeing it. The language of the contract that the employer "should absent himself * * * and abandon his practice" was more in the nature of a privilege extended to the employer than that it was mandatory or compulsory that he should do so. The employer was "to allow and permit plaintiff to remain in the sole and exclusive management and control thereof for said period of time, so far as concerned the activities and professional efforts of defendant." In the very nature of things it would not be expected that an employer would abdicate all authority in the premises which might ensue from an enforced absence from the place where the work was to be performed. The terms of the contract, if strictly followed, might preclude the employer from visiting his family residing within the territorial limits of the city of Burbank, or even go so far as to prevent the employer from passing through the city on a train or an automobile. Such an absurd result, of course, was never contemplated by the parties. The principal and controlling feature of the agreement was "that plaintiff should assume and undertake the burdens and responsibilities of and conduct and carry on the said practice of defendant for the ensuing year." The provision that defendant should absent himself and abandon his practice was merely incidental to the main object of the agreement. The contract was composed of several severable parts. If it be assumed (without necessarily deciding the point) that that part of the agreement by which defendant was "restrained from exercising a lawful profession" was in contravention of the provisions of section 1673 of the Civil Code, and was "to that extent void," yet the remainder of the contract having to do with the employment of plaintiff by defendant, being complete in itself, and not in any manner relating to or dependent upon the objectionable feature of the agreement, and not in violation of any law, may stand.

In the case of City Carpet, etc., Works v. Jones, 102 Cal. 506, 36 Pac. 841, there was a sale of a business, including its good will, within the counties of San Francisco, Alameda, and San Mateo. The statute to which reference has been made permits a sale of "the good will of a business * * * within a specified county." In holding that the covenant was divisible, and that it might be enforced as to that part which was not in violation of the terms of the statute, the court said:

> "In this case three counties are named in the contract, and I see no difficulty in upholding it as to the county in which the business was conducted, and declaring it void as to the other two counties. The boundaries of each are definite, and fixed by law. Neither includes any part of the others. If the city and county of San Francisco had alone been named, the contract would have been good. How the naming of the counties of Alameda and San Mateo in addition, such addition being void, could affect that which otherwise is valid, the void part being capable of exact ascertainment and separation, I do not comprehend, and especially when such separation not only does no violence to the language of the statute, but does justice between the parties and promotes the public interests, and conforms to the obvious intention of the statute, and it is only to the 'extent' that the contract departs from the provisions of the Code that it is declared void."

So in the case at bar the void part of this contract (assuming it to be such) is "capable of exact ascertainment and separation"; and "such separation does no violence to the language of the statute," and certainly does justice between the parties.

In the case of Ragsdale v. Nagle, 106 Cal. 332, 39 Pac. 628, it is held (syllabus) that—

> "Where a contract for the sale of a good will of a business, and to refrain from carrying on a similar business, goes beyond the scope of the law in certain particulars, it is nevertheless valid in all those particulars in which it falls within the provisions of the law."

Section 1599 of the Civil Code provides that—

> "Where a contract has several distinct objects, of which one at least is lawful, and one at least is unlawful, in whole or in part, the contract is void as to the latter and valid as to the rest."

And the following cases are in point with reference to upholding that part of the contract herein to which there can be no statutory objection: Brown v. Kling, 101 Cal. 295, 35 Pac. 995; Hedges v. Frink, 174 Cal. 552, 163 Pac. 884; Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 58 Pac. 372; Treadwell v. Davis, 34 Cal. 601; Jackson v. Shawl, 29 Cal. 267; Hogue-Kellogg Co. v. Baker, 47 Cal. App. 247, 190 Pac. 493; Porter v. Fisher, 4 Cal. Unrep. 324, 34 Pac. 700.

[2] Appellant's second contention is that the contract as set forth in the findings is illegal. No authorities are cited to support the claim, and this court is unable to discover any defect therein which would result in a legal declaration of the nature of that suggested by appellant.

[3] It is next urged by appellant that there is a material variance between the pleadings and the findings, and that the court erred in not finding upon the issue as to whether or not there was any agreement that defendant should absent himself from the city of Burbank and abandon his practice and patients during the time covered by the contract.

[4] It will be remembered that it was plaintiff who pleaded the fact in question. Defendant answered, denying that such fact was a part of the agreement. The most that defendant could expect would be a finding in accordance with the averments of his answer. The substance of the allegations contained in the answer is that no such agreement was made. Taking defendant's allegation at its full face value, defendant is not hurt because the court failed to find thereon, for the reason that such a finding would have eliminated all question as to the legality of the contract. This was an oral agreement. The findings of the court purport to set forth the entire agreement that was entered into between the parties thereto. Necessarily everything not included within the court's statement of what the oral agreement consisted is presumed not to have been agreed to by the parties; therefore, if any finding had been directly made on the allegation, it would necessarily have been that no such agreement was made. But, assuming that, had the court found directly on the matter, the finding would have been against defendant's contention, then the agreement would simply have contained a clause which would not have materially assisted defendant for the reason, as heretofore stated, that the inclusion of such alleged objectionable matter in the agreement at most renders the contract invalid only "to that extent." The rule is well settled that, if an omitted finding would have been adverse to a defendant, such omission will not constitute an error sufficient to authorize a reversal of the judgment. Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 452, 26 Pac. 504; Southern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Whitaker, 109 Cal. 274, 41 Pac. 1083; Reed v. Johnson, 127 Cal. 541, 59 Pac. 986, and cases there cited; Gerth v. Gerth, 7 Cal. App. 737, 95 Pac. 904, and cases there cited; Furlong v. White, 51 Cal. App. 265, 196 Pac. 903; U. S. Trading Corp. v. Newmark Grain Co., 56 Cal. App. 191, 205 Pac. 29.

Appellant further complains that the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding by the trial court as to the amount of damages sustained by plaintiff, or that defendant wrongfully and in violation of the agreement resumed the management and control of his practice and excluded plaintiff therefrom. But an examination of the record on appeal clearly shows that there was ample evidence to warrant the conclusion reached by the judge of the trial court in regard to each of such matters.

[5, 6] Appellant's final contention is that the court erred in refusing to grant defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The evidence which defendant claimed had been discovered after the case had been tried was cumulative in character, and went only to the point of contradicting the testimony of plaintiff. The showing as to diligence in discovering such evidence before the close of the trial was weak and altogether unsatisfactory. In circumstances such as were presented at the time the motion for new trial was considered the decision rested entirely with the discretion of the judge of the trial court. The rule is unquestioned that, unless such discretion is clearly shown to have been abused, the conclusion by the trial court is final. There is nothing in the record herein which would indicate other than that the motion for new trial was accorded a full and fair hearing on its merits and that the decision thereon by the judge of the lower court was entirely free from any suspicion of prejudice or improper conception of his legal duty in premises.

The judgment is affirmed.

MORTON v. ALBERS BROS. MILLING CO.

(Civ. 4385.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 28, 1924.)

1. Contracts ⚿238(2) — Unexecuted oral agreement altering written contract by extending time for performance void.

Under Civ. Code, § 1698, an unexecuted oral agreement altering a written contract by extending the time for performance is void.

2. Principal and agent ⚿101(1)—Agent cannot change contract or waive provision intended for benefit of principal under general authority to perform.

The authority of an agent to perform a contract already made by his principal does not include authority to change the contract or to waive any of its provisions, especially where the provision is one intended for the benefit of the principal.

3. Principal and agent ⚿119(1)—Agent presumptively employed to acquire and not to give up interests.

The presumption is that an agent is employed to acquire interests, not to give them up.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by W. Morton against the Albers Bros. Milling Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hickcox, Crenshaw & Trude, of El Centro, for appellant.

C. L. Brown, of El Centro, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action for damages for the alleged breach of a contract to purchase milo maize. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant appeals.

Some of the milo was delivered, and payment therefor was made by defendant. It is claimed by plaintiff that he was ready and willing to deliver the balance within the time provided for by an oral extension of the time for delivery, but that defendant wrongfully refused to accept it. Thereafter plaintiff sold the undelivered milo in the open market for $29 per ton. This action was brought to recover the difference between that and the contract price.

The facts of the case, as revealed by the pleadings and proof, are substantially these: On September 16, 1920, at Brawley, in this state, plaintiff and defendant executed a written contract which, so far as it is material to the questions presented, reads:

> "W. Morton has this day sold, and the Albers Bros. Milling Co., a corporation, of El Centro, California, has this day bought 250 tons of good No. 1 marketable milo now being grown or located Mead and Arnold Ranches, to be sacked in Standard, new jute bags at the purchase price of $50.00 per ton, said milo to be delivered f. o. b. cars main line points by December 1st, and seller further agrees to keep said milo insured to the time of its delivery, in said Albers Bros. Milling Co.'s favor to an amount equal to that paid on same by said Albers Bros. Milling Co. The seller hereby acknowledges receipt of $1.00 on account of purchase price of said milo. Said Albers Bros. Milling Co. agrees to pay the balance on said purchase price of said * * * upon its delivery; should the delivery not be made within the time specified herein, it shall be optional with said Albers Bros. Milling Co., when delivery is made, to take said milo at the price stated herein, or at the market price at the time of said delivery."

It is claimed by plaintiff that on November 25, 1920, and while he had 250 tons of milo on deposit in warehouses at Calipatria and Rockwood ready for delivery, he and a Mr. Louis Prenot, the assistant manager of defendant's Los Angeles branch who then was visiting in the Imperial valley, entered into an oral agreement whereby the time for delivery was extended to December 25, 1920. The testimony given by plaintiff in support of his claim, reduced to narrative form, is substantially as follows: About November 25, 1920, I went to the office of B. F. McCormick [a buyer for the defendant] and there found Mr. Prenot, who held up his hands and said: "Morton, we cannot take your corn." I said "Why?" and he said, "We haven't the money to pay for the corn and can't get it." I said, "It puts me in bad shape. I bought a ranch in Nevada and I expected this money to help me make the payments on it and it is going to put me in bad. I have to make a payment the first of the year." He said, "If we can get some time on the corn we can take it. If you will give us until the first of the year we will take the corn." I said, "I can't do that, I have to have my money on the first, but I will extend the time to the 25th of December." He said, "Morton, you are a prince. If everybody understood this situation and looked at conditions like you do we would all get by." I said, "Mr. Prenot, I think we ought to have a little contract to that effect," and he said, "Very well." He turned around and dictated a contract to Harry Cuthbertson [defendant's local manager in the Imperial valley], who wrote in pencil on a piece of paper that they were to have an extension to the 25th of December. This writing was never signed by either party. Mr. Prenot instructed Cuthbertson to get a typist to type this contract so we could sign it. Cuthbertson went out and came back, saying he couldn't find a stenographer, that he had gone to lunch. Mr. Prenot then said, "Well, let it go and to-night we will fix it up and leave it here with Frank [B. F. McCormick] in the morning." I said, "All right, that is fair enough." I never got the written contract for the extension. The following day I met Mr. Prenot and I asked him about it. He said they were too busy the night before and overlooked it, but "We will fix it up. I represent a $7,000,000 concern and we cannot afford to go back on our contract." I said, "All right," and let it go at that. They were to pay me for the corn as it was shipped, and they were to have until the 25th of December in which to clean up the lot, the whole works. There was no change in the contract as to the class of corn they were to receive. On November 30th, at Brawley, defendant caused tests to be made of the milo which I had stored in the Calipatria warehouse. The tests showed that there was one lot which had a moisture content of less than 14 per cent. and another which showed a moisture content of 14.7 per cent. After the tests were made Mr. Prenot stated that he would take the lot which was within the moisture test [the lot which showed a moisture content of less than 14 per cent.] as soon as they could get cars, and pay me for it, but that they would turn down the rest. Prenot told me he would not take any except the No. 1 marketable milo, as shown by the tests. Two or three days later [i. e., about December 2d or 3d] I came to El Centro to see Mr. Prenot. I asked him what he meant by having made this [oral] agreement with me and then turning it down. He said his hands were tied—he was working for a corporation and he could not do otherwise. They [meaning, doubtless, defendant's board of directors or managing officers] would not stand for it. I said, "Why didn't you tell me you could not do it?" He said he thought he could get it by. I said, "Mr. Prenot, I am going to bring suit to make you people pay me the difference on that corn. I hate a lawsuit, and hate trouble, but I am not going to take that loss." He said, "I will take it up with the company and see if we cannot yet fix this matter up. We don't want trouble." I said, "All right," and I didn't say anything more after that.

The written contract, it will be recalled, provides for the delivery of "good No. 1 marketable milo." A licensed government grain inspector, called as a witness for the defendant, testified that "good No. 1 marketable milo should have a moisture content of 14 per cent. and under," and that "any milo which contains over 14 per cent. moisture is not No. 1 milo." In fairness to plaintiff, who is a farmer and grower of corn, it should be added that he testified that he did not know that corn "should have a certain percentage of moisture"; that he "didn't know anything about it before," and that it "was new to us corn growers." This notwithstanding, the fact remains that the testimony of the licensed government grain inspector was not contradicted. Though plaintiff testified it was "new to us corn growers," he did not pretend to say that milo could be "good No. 1 marketable milo" and yet show a moisture content in excess of 14 per cent.

On or about the 8th or 10th of December, 1920, plaintiff, claiming that he had until December 25th under the oral extension of time within which to complete delivery, caused tests to be made of the milo. It was the same milo which was in the warehouse when defendant caused the tests of November 30th to be made. The milo must have "dried out" in the interim, for the tests which plaintiff caused to be made on or about December 8th or 10th showed a moisture content at that time of less than 14 per cent.

Plaintiff's case was tried by him upon the theory that his oral agreement of November 25th with Mr. Prenot was a valid agreement for the extension of the time for delivery, and that it was binding upon defendant. It also was plaintiff's contention in the trial court, as it is here, that because of his arrangement with Mr. Prenot it was permissible for him to cause tests of the undelivered milo to be made at any time between December 1st, the date fixed by the written contract as the limit of the time for delivery, and December 25th, the time fixed by the oral agreement, and that if such tests were made, and if, when made, they showed a moisture content of less than 14 per cent., then defendant would be legally obligated to accept the milo and to pay for it, notwithstanding the tests and the tender of the milo were made subsequent to the time fixed for delivery by the written contract. Indeed, it seems to be conceded, tacitly at least, that plaintiff's right to a recovery, if any he have, is wholly dependent upon the oral agreement between him and Prenot for an extension of the time for delivery.

Running all through appellant's brief, although most obscurely expressed, if indeed it be expressed at all, is the notion that the agreement for the extension of time is invalid. That this undeveloped idea lurks in the background of appellant's several contentions is shown by the following: During the trial plaintiff, testifying as a witness on his own behalf, was asked by his counsel if he had caused a test of the milo to be made as early as December 8th and not later than December 10, 1920. To this question defendant's counsel objected as follows:

> "Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, for this reason: The contract, as stated here [the written contract of September 16, 1920] is a contract for delivery of corn on a certain date, and the contract has been introduced in evidence. The condition of the corn at the date of delivery [sic] is not material, because the character of the corn, or of any commodity, may change. It may be better or it may be worse, as the case may be. Under this contract they had a right to have a certain character or class of corn, to wit: No. 1 marketable maize, delivered to them on or about a certain date. They [defendant's agents] accepted delivery at the warehouse of that which was known as the Cramer lot on November 30th. They rejected the other. Now, they [plaintiff] cannot come in here and introduce evidence showing the condition of the corn under the contract at a later day, because it may have been better or it may have been worse, and it is immaterial which it was."

The objection was overruled, and the witness was permitted to testify that he did cause a test to be made between the 8th and 10th of December. The witness testified that the test made on that date showed a moisture content under 14 per cent. By another question propounded to plaintiff on his direct examination he was asked if, subsequent to the oral agreement, he held the corn for defendant under that agreement until the 25th of December. This question was objected to upon the ground, among others, that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The objection was overruled, and the witness was permitted to answer the question in the affirmative. Assigning as error the rulings of the court on the objections to the questions last mentioned, appellant's brief presents the point as follows:

> "The position taken by the defendant and appellant in this case, which we believe to be correct [is that] any test of the milo made after it was to be delivered under the contract [the written contract of September 16, 1920] was ineffectual and of no avail, as the price was rapidly falling and the defendants were only required to take so much of the milo as measured up to the standard stated in the contract. The foregoing questions and answers were a successful attempt by the plaintiff, over the repeated objection of the defendant, to get before the jury that the milo, some ten days after the date of delivery, would test according to contract. This was error, as the evidence in this case shows that milo under certain conditions would dry out rapidly, and especially the test they got before the jury made on the 9th or 10th of December, if it was the same milo, which was not proven, was made under conditions that would not be the same as the milo left in the sacks in the warehouse and therefore was not competent or material."

Referring to another similar objection, appellant, in its opening brief in this court, says:

> "The defendant had refused to take the milo on November 30th or December 1st, and if the plaintiff was right it was his duty then to sell it, not to hold it in the warehouse while the price of milo was rapidly going down, and have tests made of it from time to time, and finally sell it when it became marketable."

We have been at pains to state appellant's contentions thus fully in order that it may clearly appear that, though appellant's counsel have not attacked the validity of the oral agreement upon any specific legal ground, its validity is nevertheless necessarily involved in the points presented to us for our determination. We shall proceed, therefore, to consider whether the oral extension of time for delivery was binding upon defendant, for that seems to be the decisive question in the case and one which is inescapable if all implications of appellant's several points are to be passed upon and determined.

[1] With respect to the validity of the oral agreement, respondent is confronted with two and only two alternatives: Either he must take the position that the arrangement which he testified he made with Prenot was an unexecuted oral agreement altering a written contract by extending the time for performance, or he must contend that it was a parol waiver of a provision inserted in the written contract for the benefit of the buyer. If the first alternative be adopted then it must be held that the oral agreement is void under section 1698 of the Civil Code. Henehan v Hart, 127 Cal. 656, 60 Pac. 426; Harloe v. Lambie, 132 Cal. 133, 64 Pac. 88; Standard Box Co. v. Mutual Biscuit Co., 10 Cal. App. 746, 755, 103 Pac. 938. If the second alternative be espoused then, while there seems to be authority for the proposition that section 1698 does not prevent a valid oral waiver of a written provision inserted for the benefit of the party waiving it (Fairbanks, Morse & Co. v. Nelson, 217 Fed. 218, 133 C. C. A. 212), there is no evidence that Prenot had authority to waive any provision of the written contract. Indeed, Prenot himself, according to respondent's testimony, personally notified the latter on or about December 2, 1920, that he had no authority to grant the extension. This Pre-not did, in effect, when, in reply to respondent's inquiry as to what he meant by making the new agreement and then "turning it down," he said that "his hands were tied," that "he was working for a corporation," and, that "they [presumably the officers of the corporation] would not stand for it."

[2, 3] Prenot was not a general officer. He was only an assistant manager for appellant at one of its branch offices. It possibly may be inferred from the evidence that he was authorized to do certain things which were necessarily incident to the performance of the written contract, such, for example, as seeing to it that proper tests were made to determine whether the milo measured up to the requirements of the contract. But authority in an agent to carry out or to perform a contract already made by his principal does not include authority to change the contract or to waive any of its provisions, especially where, as here, the provision is one which was intended for the benefit of the principal. Presumptively, an agent is employed to acquire interests, not to give them up. Gerrish v. Maher, 70 Ill. 470; Hutchings v. Munger, 41 N. Y. 155; Thomas v. Anthony, 30 Cal. App. 217, 157 Pac. 823. See, also, 2 C. J., pp. 645–646.

The judgment is reversed.

RED RIVER LUMBER CO. v. NULL.

(Civ. 2680.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 11, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 9, 1924.)

1. Adverse possession 🔑71(2) — Deed of homestead land, executed by husband only, color of title.

Deed of land on which there was a homestead, though void because not joined in by wife, is color of title.

2. Quieting title 🔑10(1)—Right of recovery must be based on title in plaintiff.

Plaintiff's right of recovery in action to establish its right to remove standing timber and to quiet its title thereto must be based on title in it, not on weakness of defendant's title.

3. Adverse possession 🔑27—Evidence as to occupation and control sufficient to show title under color of title.

Evidence of regular patrolling for purpose of guarding against trespassing and fires and to see if there was any timber that should be taken off and of taking off dead and down timber, and of fighting fires, held to sufficiently show such occupation and control, as to give title by adverse possession to the standing timber, to one having color of title, and paying taxes separately assessed on the timber to him.

4. Logs and logging 🔑3(7)—Deed of right to cut and remove is conveyance of timber.

A deed of right to cut and remove timber is a deed of the timber.

5. Adverse possession 🔑6—Standing timber subject for.

Standing timber, like minerals, is subject for separate adverse possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; J. E. Barber, Judge.

Action by the Red River Lumber Company against E. M. Null. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McCoy & Gans, of Red Bluff, and Carter & Smith, of Redding, for appellant.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. In this action the plaintiff prayed for a decree establishing its right to remove the timber standing and growing on the lands described in the complaint, in accordance with the terms of a written conveyance of such timber to plaintiff, and quieting its title to said timber. The defendant denied plaintiff's right to the timber upon that part of the described lands hereinafter referred to as the homestead and disclaimed any interest in the timber upon the remainder. The court gave judgment as prayed for in the complaint, and defendant appeals.

During the year 1879 J. C. La Tour and his wife, Arrena La Tour, resided upon the lands in controversy. November 26th of that year La Tour executed and recorded his declaration, in due form, claiming such lands, and other lands, as a family homestead. He and his wife continued to reside on the land covered by the homestead until the year 1889, when they removed to another place where they thereafter resided. April 11, 1901, La Tour executed and delivered to his wife a deed purporting to convey to her the lands described in the complaint and containing the following clause: "The condition of this deed is such that it is to be recorded at or after my death, and then to be in full force and effect, otherwise to be null and void." The deed was recorded October 30, 1906. May 29, 1905, La Tour executed and delivered his deed purporting to convey to M. C. Thatcher, "his heirs and assigns, the sole and exclusive right to cut, fell, remove and carry away all, or so much as said second party may desire, of the trees standing or down wood and timber growing, being, standing or down, or hereafter to grow, be or stand, except what cedar timber first party may require for making posts or rails for keeping up the fence upon the within described land, and such dead timber as first party may need for fuel to use in dwelling house on all those certain lots (describing the lands set out in the complaint) for and during the full period of twenty-five years from and after the date hereof, * * * together with the right to enter on said premises, and every part thereof, and to pass over and across the same, in such manner and with such appliances as shall be deemed by said second party convenient in the cutting or removing of any of the trees, down or standing wood or timber, and to do such other and further acts and things on said premises as shall be convenient or reasonably necessary to the full and complete enjoyment by the said party of the second part, or his assigns, of the rights hereby granted, to said trees, standing wood and timber." La Tour died in October, 1906. June 13, 1907, Arrena La Tour conveyed the land to C. A. La Tour, the son of herself and J. C. La Tour, the deed containing no reference to the sale of the timber to Thatcher. February 18, 1911, C. A. La Tour conveyed the land to his wife, this deed also being silent as to the deed to Thatcher. May 22, 1912, Thatcher executed and delivered to plaintiff his warranty deed purporting to convey the timber on the land in accordance with the terms of the deed of J. C. La Tour to him. April 29, 1915, C. A. La Tour and his wife conveyed the land to defendant. The deed contained the following clause:

> "Subject to that certain deed of right of way dated May 29th, 1905, and recorded May 31, 1905, in book 83 of deeds, page 590, records of said Shasta county; also subject to whatever rights and privileges may have been conveyed by that certain deed dated May 29th, 1905, and recorded June 2d, 1905, in book 83 of deeds, page 613"—the Thatcher deed.

[1] Admittedly the deed from J. C. La Tour to Thatcher was void, there being a homestead on the place at the time the deed was executed and the wife of the grantor not joining in the execution thereof. The deed, however, constituted color of title. Donnelly v. Tregaskis, 154 Cal. 261, 97 Pac. 421; 2 C. J. 186; Goodrich v. Mortimer, 44 Cal. App. 576, 186 Pac. 844. Respondent contends and the court found that plaintiff and its predecessor in interest, Thatcher, had acquired title by adverse possession. The La Tours never claimed any interest in the timber after the execution of the deed to Thatcher. C. A. La Tour negotiated the sale of the land to defendant. He testified:

> "I told Mr. Null, when he was talking about taking the place over, * * * that the timber belonged to the Thatcher Lumber Company or Mark Thatcher. * * * He said that he understood that. * * * I never claimed the timber."

The defendant testified:

> "I came here and examined the record myself, * * * and found the state homestead. I also went over the records myself for abandonment of state homesteads, and found no abandonment of this land. * * * Chris La Tour may have told me, or he may not have told me, I think he did tell me, however, the timber had been sold to the Thatchers for 25 years. * * * I have no recollection that I told La Tour anything about the state homestead; that was his affair; I was looking out for my side of it; he was looking out for his. * * * Really I did not make La Tour's side of the trade; * * * I traded for myself."

The deed to defendant was prepared by his attorney. C. A. La Tour testified that after the delivery of the deed the defendant said to him:

> "Chris, I know you rather see me prosper than the Red River Lumber Company; * * * I am going to claim the timber on those three 40's in section 2, * * * because your mother had a state homestead."

[2] From the foregoing it clearly appears that C. A. La Tour, acting for himself and his wife in the sale of the land, did not intend to sell the timber to defendant, a fact of which the defendant had full knowledge at and prior to the transfer. If this were a suit to reform the deed so as to express the true intention of the parties, further consideration of the case would be unnecessary, but plaintiff's right of recovery in this action must be based upon title in itself. It then becomes necessary to determine whether there is sufficient evidence to show title by adverse possession.

M. C. Thatcher and other owners of timber pooled their interests and operated a sawmill in the vicinity of the La Tour land under the name of the Thatcher Lumber Company. He testified that after the purchase of the timber in dispute he went over the La Tour land twice a year during the years 1905 and 1906; that in 1907 he hauled therefrom 2,000 shakes and "had some logs cut and hauled"; that in 1908 he "went over the land several times during the summer and the same during 1909, 1910, and 1911, and 1912"; that his purpose in going over the land was "to see that there was no trespassing, that there were no camp fires, to see if there was any timber that should have been taken off"; that he claimed to own the timber during those years; that in 1910 C. A. La Tour "wanted to buy some timber for shakes," but that the witness "did not agree to it"; that his brother and nephew, who were interested with him in the operations of the Thatcher Lumber Company, "between 1905 and 1912, went upon and over or worked upon this timber on this land." H. W. Knapp, one of Thatcher's associates, testified:

> "We had a mill ditch that headed on this land, and we had to make weekly trips, sometimes two or three a week, to the head of this ditch, and in most every case was over most all of the land; part of it, probably 40 or 50 times a year, I was on that land, on that one piece; not to look it over every time."

He testified that in 1907 it was necessary on two occasions to have employees fight fires, started by operations of the company, to keep them off the La Tour and other lands; that during the years 1908 to 1912, inclusive, he went over the land two or three times a year to "look out for dead timber, down timber and forest fires" and trespassers. A. C. Thatcher testified that he hauled two loads of logs off the land for the company in May, 1907, using a steam tractor and two trucks; that he "widened out" an old shake road over which to haul the logs; that he fought fires in 1907 and 1908 and that the latter fire was not caused by the operation of the company. Alexander Thatcher testified that from 1905 to 1912 he rode over the land "as much as once a month of each year" from the first of April to the last of October, that he was handling cattle and "aimed to look after the timber" and "watch for fires"; that in 1907 C. A. La Tour "informed us * * * a big tree fell out on the edge of his meadow * * * and we ought to remove it." Earl S. Thatcher testified that during the latter part of October, 1907, "at two different times" he hauled logs off the La Tour land for the company. The land described in the conveyance to Thatcher and in that to defendant is in part timber land and in part meadows. Only a part of the land is fenced. C. A. La Tour resided on the premises during some of the summer months. The evidence justifies the following statement contained in the opinion of the trial court:

> "The lands in question * * * are rough, mountainous timber lands valuable chiefly, if not solely, for the timber thereon, which consists of a heavy growth of pine, fir, and spruce with a heavy growth of underbrush. From the time that M. C. Thatcher secured the deed to said timber on May 29, 1905, the said M. C. Thatcher and members of the firm of Thatcher Lumber Company and its employees began and continued during each year thereafter and to May 12, 1912, a period of nearly seven years, to patrol said lands, upon which said timber is situated, for the prevention of trespassing and for the protection of said timber from fire; that in 1907 a road was built over a part of said lands by Thatcher, and that Thatcher cut and removed therefrom 2,000 shakes, and also cut and hauled logs therefrom; that in 1908 a fire threatened said timber upon said land, and Thatcher, with a crew of men from the Thatcher Lumber Company, fought said fire for the purpose of preventing the fire reaching and destroying the timber upon the lands in question; that from time to time, as fires occurred and threatened to invade the said lands, bodies of fire fighters were used by Thatcher in preserving said timber from destruction. The timber upon said land was separately assessed to M. C. Thatcher for the year 1905, and each year thereafter up to and including the year 1912, and the taxes levied upon said timber during each of said years was paid by Thatcher.
> "That from the time of the execution of said deed to Thatcher and up to May 12, 1912, neither James C. La Tour, Arrena La Tour, or any other person occupied said lands, or any part thereof, or claimed the timber thereon, save and except the said M. C. Thatcher and the Thatcher Lumber Company and Chris A. La Tour; but that said Chris A. La Tour at no time since the execution and delivery of the deed to M. C. Thatcher claimed or asserted ownership of said timber; that since May 12, 1912, the date of the deed to plaintiff herein, the said plaintiff has by its agents patrolled said lands, herein concerned, for the purpose of preventing fires and trespassing, and that said timber for each year from 1912 to the inception of this action have been assessed separately to said plaintiff and the taxes paid thereon by plaintiff; although the defendants in this action had the said land, together with the timber thereon, assessed to him after he acquired his deed thereto and paid the taxes assessed thereon."

[3] The facts herein are similar to those in the case of Cousino v. Western Shore Lumber Co., 179 Cal. 1, 6, 175 Pac. 406, 408, except that in that case the defendant claimed title to the land as well as to the timber thereon. The court said:

> "The lands, as we have seen, were timber lands. The defendant, who was thus the occupant of said lands, was a lumber company, and the ordinary and eventual use to which said lands were to be put was that of the cutting, logging, and milling of the timber thereon; and this being so, we think the possession of the defendant, as indicated by its foregoing assertion of control over said property, based as it was upon a claim of title founded upon a written instrument, was sufficient to constitute adverse possession for the required statutory period under subdivision 3 of section 323 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

A lumber company does not ordinarily cut timber from all of its holdings at the same time, and prior to the time at which it commences such cutting upon a given parcel of land the usual occupation and control thereof are of the character here shown. It must be held that the evidence sufficiently shows title by adverse possession in the plaintiff.

[4, 5] Appellant contends that the deed to Thatcher does not purport to convey title to the timber in dispute, but only "the right to cut, fell, remove and carry away" trees and timber. In Bolland v. O'Neal, 81 Minn. 15, 83 N. W. 471, 83 Am. St. Rep. 363, the conveyance under consideration granted "the right, privilege, and permission" to enter upon the lands described in the instrument and "cut and remove from said lands * * * all the pine timber standing or being thereon." The court said:

> "It was in effect a conveyance of the pine, with the privilege to go upon the premises within a stipulated time and remove it. * * * Such a deed is a conveyance of an interest in real estate."

Title to timber standing upon land is capable of being severed from the title to the land itself. Bibbs v. Peterson, 163 Cal. 758, 127 Pac. 62; Sears v. Ackerman, 138 Cal. 583, 72 Pac. 171; Ciapusci v. Clark, 12 Cal. App. 44, 106 Pac. 436; Gazos Creek Mill, etc., Co. v. Coburn, 8 Cal. App. 150, 96 Pac. 359. In Fairbanks v. S. F. & N. P. Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 579, 583, 47 Pac. 450, 451, it is said:

> "For the purposes of adverse possession, and the invocation of the statute of limitations, there may be cleavage of corporeal real estate horizontally as well as vertically."

This rule has been held applicable in cases of minerals, oil, gas, and buildings. 1 R. C. L. 738; 2 C. J. 227. No reason appears why the same rule should not govern in the case of standing trees. There are no equities to support defendant's claim of title to the timber in controversy. He knew that La Tour did not intend to sell it to him, and it may fairly be said that the judgment awards him everything that he purchased.

The judgment is affirmed.

LAKE VIEW NO. 2 OIL CO. v. WHITE et al.
(Civ. 4353.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 23, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 19, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error ⚿994(3)—Appellate court bound by trial court's decision on question of fact raised by testimony not inherently improbable.

Where the trial court found defendant's testimony, which was not inherently improbable to be true, the appellate court was bound by the trial court's decision upon question of fact raised by such testimony.

2. Corporations ⚿428(5)—Knowledge of directors acting in good faith as to terms of contract offered to corporation was notice to corporation.

Where two directors of an oil corporation were not conspiring together to dissuade or to prevent the corporation from accepting or performing a lease contract offered by a third person, the knowledge of those directors of the terms of the contract gave notice and information to the corporation to the same extent, as knowledge of any other director would have been notice.

3. Corporations ⚿319(7)—Evidence of corporation's financial stringency held admissible on issue of director's fraudulent misrepresentation to stockholders.

Evidence of corporation's financial stringency held admissible on the issue of director's alleged fraudulent misrepresentation to stockholders of inadvisibility of purchasing an oil lease from a third person, which he afterwards purchased.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the Lake View No. 2 Oil Company against Floyd G. White and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Myers, C. J., and Shenk, J., dissenting.

E. R. Young and C. E. Spencer, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Seward A. Simons and B. J. Bradner, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant Floyd G. White, at a time when he was the secretary and a director of the plaintiff corporation, acquired 10,000 shares of stock in the Interstate Oil Company, a corporation, and thereafter as owner of said shares of stock, received dividends from said Interstate Oil Company. The plaintiff, claiming to be the real owner of said shares of stock, brought this action to recover the same, together with the amount of said dividends. Plaintiff alleged that said defendant acquired said property through and by reason of the connivance and assistance of defendants C. H. White and D. W. Wickersham, who were, respectively, president and treasurer, and were directors of plaintiff, at the time when defendant Floyd G. White acquired said shares of stock, and during the time when the transactions occurred which led to his acquisition of said shares of stock; defendant Floyd G. White being during all of that time secretary and a director of plaintiff. Plaintiff alleged that said property and profits were acquired by defendant Floyd G. White secretly, and that he and his codefendants, pursuant to agreement between themselves, concealed from plaintiff certain facts relating to the transactions in question, and thereby made it possible for defendant Floyd G. White to obtain for himself the said property and profits which lawfully and equitably belonged to the plaintiff.

Answering the complaint, the defendants denied substantially all of those allegations from which it could be inferred, or from which the conclusion could be derived, that the defendants agreed or conspired together to defraud the plaintiff, or that the defendant Floyd G. White, by and with the assistance of his codefendants or either of them, or at all, abused his position as secretary, or as director of the plaintiff, or that he thereby secretly or at all acquired any property or profits which lawfully or equitably belonged to the plaintiff. Upon the issues of fact so presented the case was tried. The findings of fact upon these issues were in favor of the defendants. Accordingly judgment was entered that the plaintiff take nothing by this action. From that judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The case for the plaintiff, with respect to the principles of law upon which it relies, rests upon certain well-known doctrines which are amply supported by authority, and which, in substance, are to the effect that the directors and other officers of a corporation are trustees and fiduciaries of the stockholders, and are held to the highest degree of good faith in their dealings, and must serve only the interests of their beneficiaries; that they are not permitted to make profits for themselves out of the trust estate; that they will not be allowed through use of knowledge gained in their official capacity to make secret profit for themselves out of the funds or other assets of the corporation; that these obligations must be observed in the highest good faith; and that, when they have been disregarded by the officer, he cannot make the excuse that he was free from any intent to injure the corporation. Since these principles are well established and are not disputed by respondents, we accept them for the purposes of this case without discussion, and without quotations from any of the numerous decisions in which they have been discussed. The decision of this appeal depends upon the disposition to be made of appellant's contention that certain of the findings are not supported by the evidence.

In August, 1912, Pentland Union Oil Company was the owner of a lease of 80 acres, comprising the west half of the northwest quarter of a section of land in Kern county. This lease was what is commonly known as an oil lease, under which the lessee was obligated to drill wells on said land for the production of oil, and was entitled to the oil so produced, subject to certain conditions, including payment of rent in the form of royalties to the owner. At the same time the said Pentland Company owned the equipment of a well, known as well No. 1, on the south half of said property. In the record of this case the south half of the property is designated as the south 40, and the north half as the north 40. On the 30th day of August, 1912, the Pentland Company entered into a contract with the Lakeview No. 2 Oil Company, under which the lease, as to the south 40, was transferred to the plaintiff. The wells on the south 40 were given odd numbers and those on the north forty were given even numbers, and are so designated in the record. The terms of the lease were such that the lessee, the Pentland Company, had obligated itself, its successors and assigns, to complete at least one well on the north 40 within one year from September 11, 1911, and continuously to drill in such manner as to complete one well in every year subsequent to said date until eight wells had been completed on the north 40. The lessee likewise agreed to complete at least one well on the south 40 within one year from June 11, 1912, and continuously to work in drilling new wells at the rate of at least one well in every year thereafter until eight wells had been completed on the south 40.

The contract of August 30, 1912, contained terms obligating Lake View No. 2 Oil Company to take charge of the drilling of well No. 1 on the south 40 and well No. 2 on the north 40 and to make payments and accountings from time to time as set forth in the contract. It appears from the contract that the parties intended to obtain, if possible, from their lessor, the Sun Park Oil Company, a segregation of the land and lease, so that thereafter the several rights of either party would not be jeopardized by a failure of the other party to comply with the terms of the lease as to its half of the land. But this contract further provided that, "if the Sun Park Oil Company does not segregate said land, and does not allow each party hereto to attorn to it directly and drill each quarter section separately, then the parties hereto agree to at all times fully comply with the terms of said lease, each to protect the other and, in case either party, their successors or assigns fail to live up to the terms of said lease, then either party shall have the right to go on to the other party's property and comply with said lease and all the expenses incurred by it in complying with the lease for the benefit of the other party shall be billed to the other party" and be paid by it.

Said agreement was followed by a supplemental agreement of date September 14, 1912, between the same parties and a third party. But this supplemental agreement need not here be described. The changes made by it in the terms of the principal contract do not affect the questions which we shall have to discuss. It appears that the Sun Park Oil Company at all times refused to segregate the land or lease. Therefore both parties to the contract of August 30, 1912, continued to be mutually interested in preserving the integrity of the entire lease so far as necessary to prevent its forfeiture.

On the 20th day of August, 1913, the Pentland Company entered into a contract with one H. C. Russell, whereby the Pentland Company agreed to assign to Russell all of its right in and to the north 40, and also to assign to Russell all of the Pentland Company's interest in said agreement of August 30, 1912, and in the supplemental agreement of September 14, 1912 (with exceptions not necessary for us here to consider). In consideration thereof Russell agreed to pay to the Pentland Company a purchase price of $75,000 as follows: $11,000 payable in monthly installments of $1,000 (together with interest on a part thereof), and the remaining $64,000 to be paid out of the proceeds derived from production of oil on said premises.

In November, 1913, the Interstate Oil Company, a corporation, was organized under the laws of California. On the 17th of that month Russell presented to this company an offer to sell and convey to it his said contract with the Pentland Company in consideration of the issuance to him of 10,000 shares of the capital stock of said Interstate Oil Company, the repayment of all sums theretofore advanced by Russell on said contract and the performance of the contract by said company. This offer having been thereupon accepted, Russell executed to the Interstate Oil Company an assignment of said contract, and a certificate was issued to him for 10,000 shares of the capital stock of said company. Thereafter Russell transferred his said certificate of stock to defendant Floyd G. White. Upon surrender of that certificate a new certificate for the same shares was issued to White, who ever since has been the record owner thereof, as shown on the books of the company. As found by the court, the Interstate Oil Company has paid Floyd G. White $22,000 of dividends on said shares of stock.

In stating its cause of action, appellant alleged facts which in substance amount to the charge that Russell was an irresponsible person who took the contract of August 20, 1913, as a dummy for Floyd G. White; that Russell was unable to pay and did not pay anything for the contract; that the funds of appellant were used by the defendants to pay said monthly installments named in the Russell contract to the extent of $8,000 thereof; that other funds of appellant were used to pay expenditures made in the drilling of another well on the north 40 in connection with and in performance of obligations assumed by Russell under the terms of his contract in the development of wells on the north 40; that the defendants caused Russell to offer to assign to appellant his said contract without compensation to Russell therefor, but that the defendants concealed from appellant that its funds were being used to meet the payments required by the Russell contract, and in other ways misrepresented the facts concerning said Russell transaction, with the intention that appellant would thereby be influenced to refuse to accept said contract; that in fact appellant by reason of said concealments and misrepresentations, and not knowing that appellant was in fact making said payments and was in fact the owner of said contract, refused to accept from said Russell an assignment of said contract; that prior to said offer made by Russell to assign his contract to appellant the defendants agreed among themselves to endeavor to dissuade and prevent appellant from accepting or performing said contract, and likewise agreed among themselves to organize a new corporation and to cause said contract to be transferred to it in consideration of stock to be issued in the name of Russell, but in truth and in fact for said Floyd G. White, and to use the funds of the plaintiff in promoting said corporation to be organized and to enable it to carry out said contract; that the Interstate Oil Company was organized in pursuance of said plan or scheme and agreement, and Russell assigned his said contract to the Interstate Oil Company, which, in consideration thereof, issued to Russell 10,000 shares of its stock; that Russell had paid nothing for or on account of said contract; that Russell thereafter, at the instance and request of Floyd G. White, indorsed said certificate to said White; that said White did not nor did any one for him ever pay any consideration to Russell for said stock; and that the facts that Russell did not own any stock or claim any interest therein, and that said stock was in reality being issued to and obtained by Floyd G. White, were concealed from the plaintiff and remained unknown to the plaintiff until on or about June 17, 1919.

It is admitted, or is established so that there is no contrary contention, that, when the Russell contract was negotiated, both Floyd G. White and Russell intended and expected that the contract would be assigned to the plaintiff if the plaintiff would accept it, and that Russell would make such assignment without demanding any compensation therefor; that Russell was unable to pay and did not pay anything for the contract or in performance of its obligations; that in consideration of Russell's assignment of the contract to the Interstate Oil Company a certificate for 10,000 shares of stock of that company was, on or about the 20th day of November, 1913, issued to Russell, who thereafter assigned the same to Floyd G. White.

But the court also found and determined in its decision of this case that it is not true that Floyd G. White acquired said Russell contract for or on behalf of the plaintiff. The court likewise found that said contract was never the property of the plaintiff; that the defendants did not at any time agree that they would endeavor to dissuade or prevent the plaintiff from accepting or performing said contract, and never agreed among themselves to cause said contract to be transferred to said new corporation in consideration of stock to be issued in the name of Russell, but in truth and fact for said Floyd G. White; and that it is not true that the defendants, or any of them, agreed to use the funds of the plaintiff in promoting said corporation to be organized to enable it to carry out said contract; that in fact the defendants did not, nor did any of them, use said funds for such purpose; that in the month of October, 1914, for a good and valuable and sufficient consideration, Russell sold said stock to defendant Floyd G. White, and indorsed and delivered the certificate thereof to him, and thereupon the said Floyd G. White "became the owner of said stock by these means." The court further found that the payments made out of the funds of appellant, as aforesaid, were not made secretly; that, on the contrary, said payments were paid into the bank (where the contract was held in escrow) with the knowledge of the plaintiff, and were made in the usual course of the plaintiff's business for its own protection and entered on the books in the regular course of business, and an account thereof was made and kept in the usual way; that said payments continued to be made by the plaintiff until the close of said escrow, pursuant to an arrangement with the Interstate Oil Company, under a running account covering the said payments required to be made by said contract, and any disbursements in the drilling of any wells located upon the said north 40 acres covered by said contract; that from time to time the said Interstate Oil Company paid to the plaintiff all advances made by the plaintiff pursuant to their mutual arrangement. The findings contain a statement showing the state of accounts between said companies for the full fiscal year following the 20th day of September, 1913, and show that within that period of time all payments and advances made on account of said Russell contract had been repaid to the plaintiff by the Interstate Oil Company; that in the month of March, 1915, the facts as to the acquisition of the south 40 acres by the plaintiff and the north 40 acres by the Interstate Oil Company were fully laid before all the stockholders of the plaintiff and the plaintiff itself, and that the rights acquired by the Interstate Oil Company in said north 40 acres have at all times been acquiesced in by the plaintiff.

[1] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient, and in particular is insufficient to sustain the findings referred to in the last preceding paragraph hereof.

Floyd G. White testified directly that he purchased the shares of stock from Russell in October, 1914, in consideration of money paid by him to Russell at that time, together with the cancellation of notes which Russell had given him for moneys previously loaned. Appellant insists that for various reasons discussed in the brief this testimony is inherently improbable. This argument, no doubt, was made to the superior court, upon which devolved the duty to weigh the evidence. Since it is in no way impossible that this testimony was true, and since that court found that it was true, we in this court are bound by that decision upon that question of fact.

[2] The fact being thus established that in the transaction between Russell and the Interstate Oil Company the defendant Floyd G. White did not acquire or attempt to acquire said shares of stock for himself in the name of Russell, or at all, it then readily follows that the evidence is sufficient to prove that the defendants did not conspire together to dissuade or prevent the plaintiff from accepting or performing the Russell contract, or to cause it to be transferred to the new corporation, and thereby enable White to acquire said shares of stock in that corporation, as alleged in the complaint. It is not claimed that defendants C. H. White and D. W. Wickersham ever made any profit out of the Russell contract, or shared in any way in the illegal profit alleged to have been made by Floyd G. White. These conclusions having relieved C. H. White and D W. Wickersham from any complicity in the alleged fraud upon the plaintiff, it follows that their knowledge of the terms of the Russell contract at the time when the same was made gave the same notice and information to the plaintiff corporation that would be given by the knowledge of any other directors of the corporation. The minutes of the corporation, of the meeting of the board of directors, at the time when Russell offered to transfer his contract to the plaintiff show that at that time (August 22, 1913), after receiving Russell's offer in writing, the board of directors instructed the secretary to send to the stockholders a circular letter calling for their opinion as to whether or not they would favor the purchase of the contract. We have examined those minutes and the circular letter itself, together with the testimony of the witnesses concerning what occurred there, and the further testimony concerning the visit which defendant Floyd G. White made to sundry stockholders in Michigan and in Wisconsin. In these transactions Floyd G. White contends that he was endeavoring to persuade the corporation to accept Russell's offer, whereas the plaintiff contends that, while pretending to favor such acceptance, he was subtly instilling into the minds of the stockholders doubts and opposition, which led them to advise the rejection of Russell's offer. Here, again, we are confronted by the fact that there is evidence tending to sustain the court's finding in favor of the defendants upon these issues of fact, and that therefore we are bound by the determination of those facts as found in the decision of the trial court. It is contended that the evidence shows without conflict that Floyd G. White did not tell the disinterested members of the board (meaning thereby the directors other than the defendants herein) that Russell had not paid out anything to procure the contract, nor that Floyd G. White, secretary of appellant, with its attorney, had carried on all of the negotiations, nor that Russell was a mere nominal holder of the contract for the purpose of transfer to the plaintiff, nor that the $11,000 payment could be made in installments. The circular letter which was sent to the stockholders, and the testimony relating to this phase of the case, is not sufficient to compel the conclusion that any conscious or intentional misrepresentation was made, either by misstatement of fact or by withholding from the directors or stockholders knowledge which should have been received by them. The circular letter itself referred to various facts which might well have been received by the stockholders as argument favorable to the acquisition of the Russell contract. Upon the other hand, it stated that the proposition "calls for an expenditure of $75,000—$11,000 cash, and the balance of $64,000 to be paid out of production of wells," etc., and indicated the probability that the acceptance of the contract would make it necessary for the stockholders to respond to two assessments—one for three cents per share, payable immediately, and one for two cents per share in four or five months. But it was pointed out that in case of favorable production of oil the second assessment might not be necessary. As a whole, read from end to end, together with the conditions then existing as shown by the evidence, it does not appear that this letter was an unfair or misleading document. Without further extending our statement of the testimony—which testimony is very voluminous—it must suffice to say that we think the evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings.

[3] It is contended that certain rulings of the court on matters of evidence were erroneous and prejudicial to appellant. The first group of exceptions relates to evidence admitted in relation to the financial condition of appellant in August, 1913, as well as at some later dates. Exception No. 8 relates to the admission of some evidence in connection with the circumstances which led to the contract of August 30, 1912. Exception No. 10 refers to a ruling which limited appellant's examination of the witness Wickersham concerning a report made by him as treasurer to the stockholders of appellant in March, 1919. Exception No. 11 refers to testimony of Wickersham stating the amount in which he was a guarantor on notes and accounts of appellant in 1913. Exception No. 14 refers to a ruling admitting in evidence Defendant's Exhibit D, which consists of certain figures and data taken from the books of appellant. Exceptions numbered 15, 16, and 17 refer to certain testimony of the witness Blight, who was a public accountant and bookkeeper, who kept the books of appellant.

In view of the conclusions at which we have arrived, and which we have stated, concerning the main issues of the case, we are of the opinion that it is not necessary to critically examine the merits of these rulings. It is not at all probable that the matters which were the subjects of these rulings had any controlling influence upon the court's decision wherein it determined that Floyd G. White did not acquire the said 10,000 shares of stock in the name of Russell or in any manner, except that nearly a year later he purchased the same from Russell for a substantial consideration; or upon the further decision wherein the court determined that the defendants did not fraudulently conspire together for the purpose of obtaining said stock for the defendant Floyd G. White.

The general argument made by counsel with relation to the testimony to which the exceptions relate is that the court was erroneously receiving evidence tending to show that appellant could not finance the Russell contract—although it had in fact financed it to some extent—and that the admission of this evidence must have had an effect upon the court by causing it to conclude that the plaintiff sustained no loss through the transfer of the Russell contract to the Interstate Oil Company. We think that this evidence had an appropriate bearing upon the question concerning the reasonable fairness of the representations made to the stockholders. It might well be that, although appellant paid out some money on the Russell contract and for the commencement of another well on the north 40 before that contract and the work had been taken over by the Interstate Oil Company, nevertheless this was a strain upon the resources and credit of appellant, which it was necessary to relieve at an early date. This was accomplished through the intervention of the Interstate Oil Company through its purchase of the Russell contract and under the arrangement made between that company and appellant. This is shown by the statement set out at page 438 of the transcript. It there appears that beginning in January, 1914, and during the months thereafter, appellant received from the Interstate Oil Company large sums of money, so that by August of that year the balance of the account ran against appellant. The highest balance of credit in favor of appellant at any time was $4,358.59 at the end of December, 1913. By March it had been reduced to less than $1,000, and thereafter never was as much as $3,000. It is unreasonable to contend that appellant was unaware of these facts and was not chargeable with notice of the circumstances connected therewith.

The judgment is affirmed.

66 Cal. App. 553

MUNDORFF v. RAMM et al. (Civ. 2671.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 16, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 14, 1924.)

1. Guaranty 🔑26—Mental competency of guarantor of note held question for jury.

In action against guarantor of note, whether guarantor was of unsound mind because of habitual drunkenness and delirium tremens, when contract was entered into, held for jury.

2. Guaranty 🔑24(1)—Guarantor's administratrix could defend note on ground of mental incompetency without formal rescission.

Guarantor's administratrix could defend action on note on the ground that guarantor was mentally incompetent to enter into the contract without first formally rescinding the contract, the guaranty being purely one of accommodation, and there being nothing to return as prerequisite to the right to rescind under Civ. Code, § 39, and section 1691, subd. 2.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1066—Insufficiency of evidence for submission of one defense held harmless in view of proof of other defense.

In action against guarantor of note, insufficiency of evidence to justify submission of question whether guaranty was conditional held harmless in view of proof that guarantor was mentally unsound.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1066—Instruction not warranted by pleadings held harmless in view of reliance on another defense.

In action against guarantor of note in which principal reliance was on defense based on guarantor's mental incompetency, error in instructing on undue influence, though issue was not made by pleadings, held harmless.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Howard F. Mundorff against Pearl E. Ramm, administratrix of the estate of Charles H. Ramm, deceased, and others. From judgment for named defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. F. McCormick, of Fresno, and F. J. Heid, Jr., of Tulare, for appellant.

George Cosgrave and Lindsay & Conley, all of Fresno, for respondent.

HART, J. This action was instituted by the plaintiff against the defendants to recover on a promissory note, alleged to have been executed by the defendants in favor of the plaintiff on the 1st day of September, 1920, for the sum of $25,000, interest payable at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

The cause was tried before a jury by whom a verdict was returned in favor of Pearl Ramm, etc., and judgment as to her was entered accordingly. The defendants Knox, Noroian, and Hagopian defaulted, and judgment on their default was entered against them for the full amount of the note sued on. A motion for a new trial as against the verdict in favor of said Pearl Ramm, etc., was made and denied. This appeal is by the plaintiff from the judgment in favor of said Ramm.

The note declared upon is set out in full in the complaint. It provides for the payment thereof in installments as follows: $10,000 on or before the 1st day of January, 1921; $7,500 on or before the 1st day of April, 1921; and $7,500 on or before the 1st day of September, 1921. Said note provides that interest on the principal shall be payable semiannually, and that if default be made in any installment of principal or interest, the whole amount of said principal and interest shall become immediately due and collectible.

The complaint alleges:

> "That at the time of the making, execution and delivery of the aforesaid promissory note, to wit, on the 1st day of September, 1920, and as a part of the same transaction, and as the consideration and inducement upon which and for which the plaintiff delivered to said E. J. Knox the consideration for said promissory note, the defendants George Noroian and Albert D. Hagopian, together with Charles H. Ramm, made, subscribed and caused to be indorsed and delivered upon the back of said promissory note their written instrument of guaranty in words and figures as follows, to wit: 'For value received, I hereby guarantee the payment of the within note and any renewal of the same, and hereby waive protest, demand and notice of nonpayment thereof.'" (Signed by the last above-named defendants.)

It is alleged that there became due on the principal of said note on the 1st day of January, 1921, the sum of $10,000, and likewise there became due the sum of $7,500, "but that neither of said installments of principal has been paid and on March 1, 1921, the interest on the whole amount of principal of said promissory note became due; that no part of said installment of principal due and no part of said interest due has been paid, and pursuant to the terms of said promissory note plaintiff has and does hereby elect to declare the whole amount of principal and interest immediately due and collectible."

It is further alleged that Charles H. Ramm died intestate in the county of Fresno on the 11th day of January, 1921; that thereafter, and on the 31st day of January, 1921, the defendant Pearl E. Ramm, after due proceedings, was appointed administratrix of the estate of said deceased, and that, on the 18th day of February, 1921, she duly qualified as such administratrix; that on the 19th day of March, 1921, plaintiff duly filed, in legal form, a claim against said estate founded on the note in suit. It is further alleged that 10 days had elapsed since the date of the filing of said claim, and that the said administratrix had taken no action thereon, neither rejecting nor allowing the same within 10 days from and after the filing thereof, and that plaintiff, therefore, proceeds upon the presumption that said administratrix has rejected said claim. Code Civ. Proc. § 1496.

The answer, besides interposing formal denials to the averments of the complaint, sets up several defenses which are in the nature of pleas by way of confession and avoidance, viz.: (1) That Charles H. Ramm, at the time that he executed and so became a party to the obligation on which it is herein sought to hold and bind his estate, was mentally incompetent to transact business; (2) that the consideration inducing and moving said Charles H. Ramm to sign and execute the instrument of guaranty "has wholly failed," in that said Ramm executed said obligation wholly upon the condition that one W. S. Munger would, prior to the delivery to plaintiff of said note, execute the said instrument of guaranty jointly with him (said deceased); that "the makers of said note delivered the same to plaintiff, the payee named therein, with said instrument of guaranty indorsed thereon, without having first procured the execution of said instrument by said W. S. Munger; that plaintiff had knowledge of said condition upon which said Charles H. Ramm executed said instrument, prior to the delivery of the same to plaintiff; * * * that the maker of said note promised and agreed with said Charles H. Ramm that if said Charles H. Ramm would execute said instrument, the execution thereof by one W. S. Munger would be procured prior to the delivery thereof to plaintiff, and in the case of the failure of said Munger to execute the same, said note, with said instrument of guaranty indorsed thereon, would not be delivered to plaintiff; that without said promise and agreement on the part of the maker of said note, said Charles H. Ramm would not have executed said instrument; * * * that, notwithstanding his said promise and agreement, said maker fraudulently and without right delivered said note to plaintiff, the payee named therein, with said instrument of guaranty indorsed thereon, without first having obtained the execution of said instrument by the said W. S. Munger."

A third special defense is set up, to wit: That the execution of the guaranty by Charles H. Ramm was by mistake, "which mistake plaintiff knew at the time or suspected," etc. This defense, however, is based upon the facts set out in support of the preceding special defense to the effect that Charles H. Ramm executed the guaranty solely upon the condition that said Munger would join in the execution of the same obligation prior to the delivery of the note, with said guaranty indorsed thereon, to the plaintiff.

At the trial there was little reliance predicated upon the two last defenses referred to above. The defense of mental incompetency was principally relied upon in resistance to recovery upon the guaranty as against the estate of the deceased. At any rate, the evidence was mainly addressed to that issue, and thus we may assume that it was upon that issue that the verdict was planted.

The plaintiff contends that the verdict is not sufficiently supported by the evidence. It is also likewise claimed that the court erred in instructing the jury upon the question of failure of consideration for the alleged reason that there was no evidence introduced in support of the defense based upon that ground. Another instruction is assailed on the same ground. The contention is also made that there was no rescission of the contract, as required by section 1691, subdivision 2, Civil Code. The first point necessitates, of course, an examination herein of the evidence upon the issue of the alleged unsoundness of mind of the deceased, Charles H. Ramm, at the time he executed the obligation upon which this action is founded.

The note and guaranty in suit arose out of the following transactions: One E. J. Knox and the plaintiff, respectively maker and payee of said promissory note, were in the year 1919, and for some time thereafter, partners under the firm name and style of Knox-Mundorff Company, and as such were engaged in the general automobile and auto supply business in the city of Fresno. The capital for the launching of this business (approximately $30,000) was obtained from one Ney Wolfskill. After the partnership of Knox and Mundorff was formed and the business for the carrying on of which it was formed was started, Wolfskill advanced the firm, as a loan, the sum of $20,000. In the month of August, 1920, Wolfskill brought an action to recover said $20,000 and to secure judgment for the same, at the same time causing an attachment to be levied upon the business and assets of the Knox-Mundorff Company. An indemnity bond was given by the company to the sheriff for the purpose of securing a release of the attachment lien. Judgment was secured by Wolfskill against the partnership for said $20,000; but the same, for some reason not explained in the record, had not been satisfied at the time of the trial of this action.

About the time of the release of the firm property from the attachment lien, as above indicated, Mundorff and Knox, by a written agreement, dissolved their partnership. The latter took over the entire business in consideration of the payment by him to Mundorff the sum of $30,000 in promissory notes —one, unsecured, for $5,000, and the other for the sum of $25,000, the note in suit.

At the time the note and the guaranty in suit were executed, the plaintiff was in the state of Colorado, and the transactions herein referred to were conducted by his attorney in fact, C. L. Russell, an attorney at law. The latter testified that on the day of the execution of the guaranty he went to the office of an attorney in Fresno, expecting to meet W. S. Munger and Albert Hagopian and there secure their guaranty of the payment of the note; it being provided in the contract between the plaintiff and Knox, so Russell said, that said Munger and Hagopian were to become guarantors of the payment of said obligation; that upon reaching said law office he saw the deceased and Noroian sitting in the waiting room engaged in conversation. He had never seen the deceased before, but while he was still in the waiting room he overheard the two men just named discussing the matter of executing an instrument guaranteeing the payment of the note in suit. Russell thereupon approached Hagopian and Ramm and asked them if they were there to execute a guaranty of said note. They replied that they were there for that purpose; that there were to be five signers to that note, to wit, Knox, W. S. Munger, Albert Hagopian, George Noroian, and the deceased. Russell replied to them that he did not know before that all those parties were to join in the execution of the guaranty, but said:

> "That will be satisfactory to us, but we are not requiring anybody under our contract to sign this note but Albert Hagopian and Mr. Munger."

Russell stated that Munger was not present and was told by Knox that he (Munger) had concluded not to join as one of the guarantors; that Ramm and Noroian insisted that they had other matters to attend to and that they would like to have their signatures taken to the guaranty so that they could give attention to said matters; that thereupon Ramm and Noroian, in the presence of Knox, Ney Wolfskill, a Mr. Tupper, an attorney connected with the law office referred to, and the witness, signed the guaranty. Russell testified that he did not hear the deceased state that the condition upon which he proposed to and did sign the guaranty was that W. S. Munger was also to become a joint obligor thereon; that the deceased never at any time said to him or in his presence that he did not want the note, with the instrument of guaranty indorsed thereon, delivered to the payee named therein until said Munger had signed the guaranty. Russell admitted, however, that some 10 or 12 days after the deceased, Noroian, and Hagopian executed the guaranty, the following undated document was delivered to him by one of the attorneys at whose office the above transaction took place; said document having been procured at his (witness') request:

> "We, Charles H. Ramm, Geo. Noroian and Albert Hagopian, the undersigned, do hereby state that we are the indorsers upon that certain promissory note in the sum of $25,000.00, dated September 1, 1920, signed by E. J. Knox as maker and payable to the order of Howard F. Mundorff.
> "And we hereby jointly and severally state and represent that our said indorsements were in no manner contingent upon the representation or fact that Warren C. Munger would also indorse said note, and we further represent and state that the indorsement of each and all of us thereon is in all respects valid whether the said Warren C. Munger, or any other person, does or does not indorse the said note."

Asked how he came to request that the foregoing writing be executed and delivered, he explained that, as above stated, he did not understand that Noroian and the deceased or any persons other than Munger and Hagopian were to become guarantors, and that when he learned that Noroian and the deceased were to join in the execution of the instrument, and after they did do so, he concluded that he would be better satisfied to have the above writing as a matter of precaution.

The foregoing statement of Russell's testimony is given herein solely for the reason that, as will later appear, it has more or less bearing upon the point involving a challenge of the correctness of the action of the court in giving one of the instructions above referred to.

There was a large number of witnesses who testified upon the question of the mental condition of the deceased prior to and subsequent to the date of his execution of the guaranty. The larger number of these testified for the defense. A minute examination herein of their testimony will not be attempted. A general statement of the testimony, with occasional brief excerpts therefrom, will be sufficient.

Charles H. Ramm died on the 12th day of January, 1921—a trifle over four months after the execution by him of the guaranty involved in this litigation. He died from the effects of prolonged and excessive use of intoxicating liquors and while in a state of delirium tremens, which itself indicates the abnormal use of such liquors for a long period of time. It was shown that he had for many years been a habitual user of intoxicants. A number of witnesses—intimate acquaintances—testified that, for a period of two years or more prior to his death, the deceased was constantly under the influence of liquor to an extent that rendered him irrational and wholly irresponsible. His conversations were incoherent, generally irrational, and, when near the border line of delirium tremens, which occurrences were for a long period in frightful contiguity, his declarations and statements were of a grandiose character. He had visions of the acquisition of colossal fortunes, sometimes in the form of a gold mine buried beneath his vineyard, which was without foundation; there not being the slightest evidence of mineral deposits of any character in said land. He declared to his friends that he proposed to purchase an airplane, and made other equally as extravagant statements having absolutely no foundation for their support. He on one occasion spoke to an acquaintance about erecting an apartment house involving a large expenditure of money, but within a few days thereafter, on being asked by said acquaintance when he intended to start work on the structure, replied, in effect, that he had never thought of erecting such a building and had never told said acquaintance or any other person that he had in view or contemplated the erection of an apartment house. He was in the habit of telling acquaintances, with apparent seriousness, that he had made investments involving the expenditure of thousands of dollars, when the truth was that he had made no such investments. When in a state bordering upon delirium tremens he had the wildest visions of unreal happenings, things, and persons. He claimed to have seen spirits of the dead and that some had actually ridden with him in his automobile, and, as is characteristic of the delirium tremens, he insisted that he had been in the company of and pursued by demons of the most horrible description.

Mrs. Ramm testified that during nearly the whole of the period of their married life he was an incessant drinker of intoxicants; that he was in a state of drunkenness much of that period; that he got so he would drink any kind of liquor, or, if he could not get liquor at some particular time, he would drink any other stimulant of which he could get possession; that on one occasion, when he had no wine or other liquors at home, he drank a quantity of vinegar. She further testified that he always carried liquor in his automobile, and that in September, 1920, had 500 gallons of wine delivered to him at his home. "He would go out in the morning," she said, "and bring this pitcher in the house practically full, and he would take it in the library, and set it on the library table with a glass or a cup, and he would drink it during the day, and it would be empty in the evening. In the evening he would go to the garage again and have it filled, bring it in the house and drink it during the night. The next morning the pitcher would be empty, and of course, would be filled the same way." She stated that the pitcher he used in bringing the wine to his house would hold a gallon and a half. She further testified that "toward the end of the year (1920) he still continued drinking that wine in the way I said, and he would bring it in in the morning and he would be in a paralyzed condition during the whole day." She stated that in the year 1920, and particularly in the fall of that year, he told her in the most serious manner about big deals he had made and from which he insisted he had realized large profits; whereas, the truth was, she said, no such deals had been made by him, or, for that matter, no business deals of any kind or character had been made by him at the times referred to. "He would have different visions of things and always seeing horrible things," Mrs. Ramm continued. "He would see people all cut to pieces, see four-legged human beings and see animals with human heads and all kinds of things." She declared that he squandered his money so recklessly that she was compelled to take charge of his affairs so as to protect herself and child. Mrs. Ramm related many other instances, all occurring within a brief time of each other, in which her husband exhibited like evidences of a seriously disordered mind. She stated that he suffered from such hallucinations as are above described both prior and subsequent to the 1st day of September, 1920, and down to the date of his death.

The other witnesses for the defense—some 14 in number—described Ramm's mental condition in substantially the same way as it was described by Mrs. Ramm. One witness testified that he would drink anything in the nature of intoxicants that he could get hold of—whisky, wine, brandy, and even jackass brandy and straight alcohol. Nearly all of the witnesses, having known him well for a considerable period of time and seen and talked with him on many occasions in the year 1920, declared that it was their opinion that during said year his mental condition was such that he was mentally incompetent to transact any kind of business. In fact, one of the witnesses stated that some of the time he thought that the deceased had no such thing as a mind, although there were times when he seemed to be in pretty good condition. The witness said, however, that the deceased kept growing worse all the time. The foregoing statement comprehends a brief résumé of the testimony of the lay witnesses, although it should be said that these witnesses in describing the mental condition of the deceased gave detailed instances of evidence of mental aberration and gave a full explanation of the reasons which they thought justified them in expressing the opinion that the deceased was mentally unsound to the extent that he was without volition or intelligence sufficient to carry on a business transaction properly.

Dr. Clarence J. Tillotson, a practicing physician for 31 years, knew the deceased and was his family physician. He knew him prior to and in the spring of the year 1920, when the deceased left Dinuba in Tulare county and went to Fresno county. He testified that he saw him two or three times a week and rendered him professional services during that time. After the deceased left Dinuba and down to the time of his death, the doctor saw him two or three times a month. The doctor testified:

> "My relation with Charley Ramm was one of particular friendship. In the year 1918 I left Dinuba for one year. I was in the service. I came back in 1919. Up until that time I had known that he drank considerably, but after that time, after my return, his mental condition was very badly deranged. He was in a state of alcoholic paresis. He was disconnected in his reasoning and in his talk and he was unable to give a connected story of anything. He also had a great many visions and hallucinations about making money very easily. * * * He was unsteady, at times his tongue was thick, and his ideas were mixed and confused. In my judgment he was not competent to handle business affairs after the beginning of 1920. I came home in 1919, and from that time on, in my opinion, he was not competent to do business. Throughout the year 1920 his condition did not improve. I saw him about a week before he died, and at that time his condition was very much worse than it had been any time. The most of any business transactions that he was engaged in that he discussed with me was that he wanted I should buy some stock in various concerns that he was interested in; he had a story about a gold mine; I never paid very much attention to these stories, but it seemed that he had it in his mind that all he had to do was to go out on certain portions of some of the ranches and he could dig all the gold they needed. He told me this. That was just before he came up here (referring to Fresno)."

The doctor described alcoholic paresis as "a gradual dissolution of the mental faculties by long continued use of alcoholics. Some of the symptoms of paresis in relation to large wealth or expectations of wealth are that usually those people have a great imagination as to accumulating wealth with very little effort."

[1] The defense introduced no direct testimony as to the mental condition of the deceased on the day upon which he joined in the execution of the guaranty in suit. There was, though, the testimony of several gentlemen who were present when that transaction took place. They testified for the plaintiff that the deceased appeared to understand what he was doing and so far as they were able to observe showed no signs of such deficiency in his mentality as would justify the conclusion that he was not capable of understanding the business he was then attending to. It was further shown that the deceased, through a real estate agent, sold his farm for $120,000 in September, 1920, and that deceased and his wife executed the papers negotiating the sale and a conveyance of the property; but Mrs. Ramm attended him and was present on all occasions when that transaction was under negotiation and finally consummated and took active part therein. But it is clear that the case, as made, is one which this court is not at liberty to take from the jury, even if it be conceded that the testimony of the witnesses for the plaintiff who were present at the time of the execution of the guaranty may properly be regarded as substantially negativing the testimony introduced by the defendant. Upon the issue of unsoundness of mind, the most that can be said of the situation as presented here is that there exists thereon a substantial conflict in the evidence.

Although the illusions, delusions, and hallucinations of the deceased, as indicated above, are the characteristics or the result of a mental malady (delirium tremens) which, when taken in time and religiously attended to, is subject to the curative power of appropriate therapeutic treatment, yet, when such occurrences have become common and cover a long period of time, all due to the inordinate prolonged use of intoxicants, they will afford well-nigh unimpeachable, if not conclusive, evidence of substantial impairment of the mentality, or, indeed, of insanity. But it is not necessary to look further than to the uncontradicted testimony of Dr. Tillotson for sufficient justification for the conclusion which it is to be assumed the jury arrived at, to wit: That, at the time of the execution of the transaction in question, the deceased was mentally incompetent. Paresis, with which the doctor testified that the deceased was afflicted, is the destruction of the brain cells, and, as that witness declared, is progressive. This testimony is itself sufficient to support the verdict. But when considered in connection with the other testimony in the case tending strongly to show that the deceased was for a long period of time mentally unbalanced, from the excessive use of intoxicating liquors, it is manifest that a very strong case of mental incapacity was made out.

The rule uniformly laid down in the cases in which an act of a party is challenged on the ground that, at the time he performed or executed the act, he was insane or mentally unsound to such a degree that he could, at the time, have had no appreciation or rational understanding of the nature or quality of his act, is that evidence is admissible as to his mental condition before and after the act was performed for the purpose of showing what his mental condition was at the precise time of doing the act, and that when there is, upon its face, substantial or credible evidence that he was insane before and near the time of the doing of the act and that such condition existed after the act, evidence of those facts will, on review, be held sufficient to uphold a verdict or finding of insanity, notwithstanding that there may be evidence tending to show that he was, at the time of performing the act, sane and mentally capable of transacting business in his usual or accustomed way. Some of the cases laying down and applying the rule thus stated are: Estate of Tibbetts, 137 Cal. 123, 69 Pac. 978; Estate of Huston, 163 Cal. 166, 169, 171, 124 Pac. 852; Estate of Jones, 166 Cal. 108, 135 Pac. 288; Estate of Martin, 170 Cal. 657, 151 Pac. 138; Estate of O'Connor, 51 Cal. App. 339, 196 Pac. 792.

In Estate of Jones one of the grounds of contest of the will of the deceased was that he was insane at the time of the making thereof. It appeared that—

> "At the very time of making the will, the persons present were those who, it is claimed, exercised the undue influence. They all, without exception, testified that the testator was then of sound and disposing mind. There was no direct evidence to the contrary as to his condition at that time. It is argued that for this reason the verdict on this issue is contrary to the evidence.

The court held against that contention upon the proposition that the evidence of the insanity of the deceased before and subsequent to the date of the execution of his will was sufficient to uphold the verdict

In Estate of Martin it is said: "Direct and uncontradicted testimony that at the time of the execution of his will the testator was of sound and disposing mind, is not conclusive upon the question of his then mental condition," there being, as here, as also in the case of Estate of Wilson, supra, evidence of the unsoundness of mind of the party whose act was assailed on the ground of mental incompetency before and after the performance of the act.

[2] The contention that "no defense was established because neither Ramm nor his administratrix rescinded the obligation" is devoid of merit. Counsel cites section 39 of the Civil Code as authority for the contention. That section merely provides that the contract of any "person of unsound mind, but not entirely without understanding, made before his incapacity has been judicially determined, is subject to rescission, as provided in the chapter on rescission of this Code." But said section does not provide, nor is it subject to such a construction, that the defense of unsoundness of mind may not be set up as in avoidance of a contract or the effect thereof without a previous rescission of the same. The defendant is not seeking affirmative relief. There is no ground here for asking such relief. She is not asking that anything be returned to her. The act of her husband in signing the guaranty was purely one of accommodation. He received nothing of value as a consideration for that act. There was therefore nothing for him or his administratrix to return to the plaintiff as a prerequisite to the right to a rescission. Section 1691, subd. 2, Civ. Code. She has merely interposed a defense as in avoidance of the enforcement of the obligation against the estate of the deceased on the ground that he was, at the time he signed the guaranty, without mental capacity to make a contract. This course she had the legal right to take under the circumstances of the situation presented here without first formally rescinding the contract. Pomeroy, Equity Jur. (2d Ed.) § 872; Toby v. O. P. R. Co., 98 Cal. 490, 498, 33 Pac. 550, Field v. Austin, 131 Cal. 379, 63 Pac. 692; Simon Newman Co. v. Lassing, 141 Cal. 174, 178, 74 Pac. 761; California Reclamation Co. v. New Zealand Ins. Co., 23 Cal. App. 611, 138 Pac. 960; Dunlap v. Plummer, 1 Cal. App. 426, 82 Pac. 445.

[3] The given instruction addressed to the special defense based upon the claim that deceased signed the guaranty solely upon the condition that W. S. Munger would also sign the instrument was not entirely without pertinency, although, in view of the ample showing made upon the defense of mental incompetency, there was no real necessity for giving it to the jury. The testimony of Russell, plaintiff's agent in the transaction, disclosed several facts which were not lacking in significance in connection with the defendant's claim as indicated by said defense, viz.: (1) That the contract between Knox and plaintiff as to the making of the note provided that the same should be indorsed by Hagopian and Munger; (2) that Russell had never heard of deceased in connection with the transaction, and, in fact, had never seen him until the day the guaranty was signed; (3) that when the deceased informed Russell that he intended to sign the guaranty, either he (deceased) or Noroian stated at that time that five persons were to sign the guaranty (three besides the deceased and Noroian) and named Munger as one of the five; (4) that, some 10 days after the guaranty was signed by the deceased. Russell procured the written document signed by Ramm and the other guarantors, stating, among other things, that they did not sign the guaranty on the condition that Munger would sign it before the note, with the guaranty, was delivered to plaintiff; that Russell testified that this document was desired by him as a "matter of precaution." We are not prepared to say that those facts would be sufficient to support a verdict in favor of the defendant on that issue; nor are we willing now to say that, taken with certain other circumstances, slight in character, it is true, but apparently corroborative thereof, those facts would not support a verdict upon said defense for the defendant. But, in any event, if it should be conceded that there was not sufficient evidence to justify the submission of the instruction to the jury, it is clear that, in view of the vast amount of evidence supporting the defense of mental unsoundness of the deceased, a miscarriage of justice has not and will not result from the giving of the instruction under present consideration.

[4] The instruction upon the subject of undue influence should not have been given. There was no such issue made by the pleadings. It is true that the testimony, rather incidentally than through any purposed attempt to make undue influence an issue, revealed a few circumstances which might well generate a suspicion that undue pressure to some extent was brought to bear upon the deceased, while under the influence of liquor, to induce him to sign the instrument; but they were not sufficiently potent in probative power to justify a verdict predicated upon that issue. The instruction, however, involves nothing more than an abstract statement of the rule applicable in cases in which an instrument in writing is sought to be set aside on the ground that the party making it was unduly influenced to enter into the engagement evidenced thereby. The language of the instruction does not assume that there existed in the case any evidence tending to establish that deceased was unduly influenced to sign the guaranty. We think that, in view of the fact that the principal reliance of the defense was on the issue of mental incompetency and of the large amount of evidence presented in support of that issue, the instruction was innocuous in its effect upon the rights of the plaintiff. See Bosqui v. Sutro R. Co., 131 Cal. 390, 401, 63 Pac. 682. Indeed, it would be an uncomplimentary commentary upon the intelligence of the jury to hold that the instruction influenced them in the consideration of their verdict, when it must have been obvious to them that the only substantial testimony in the case tending to support the case of the defendant was that which was addressed to the issue of mental incompetency. At any rate, considering the record as a whole, we would not be justified in holding that a miscarriage of justice was produced by the giving of the instruction.

The contention that the court erred in denying plaintiff's motion for a directed verdict is fully answered by the above consideration of the evidence and the conclusion therefrom following that the verdict is amply supported, evidentially.

We have examined with care the rulings upon questions of the admissibility of certain evidence of which the plaintiff here complains, and thus have been carried to the conclusion that, while one or two of the assignments thus advanced against the legal integrity of the verdict may, in strictness, be subject to criticism, they are not of sufficient force to justify a reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

GORE v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 4841.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 2, 1924.)

1. Master and servant 🔑405(4)—Finding injury was not cause of death sustained.

Evidence in compensation case held to sustain a finding that death of employee was not caused by injuries in employment.

2. Master and servant 🔑403—Burden of proof on compensation claimant.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act, § 19d, the burden is on a compensation claimant to prove the claim.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Mrs. Maggie Gore, for the death of Charles H. Gore, her husband, claimant, opposed by the Quaker Hill Gold Mines Company, employer, and the State Compensation Insurance Fund, insurer. Claimant petitions for a review of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission refusing a death benefit. Affirmed.

Thomas C. Butler, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Petition for writ of review for the purpose of having the lawfulness of the findings of fact, decision, and award of the respondent, Industrial Accident Commission, denying a death benefit in favor of petitioner, the widow of a deceased employee of respondent Quaker Hill Gold Mines Company, inquired into and determined.

It appears from the petition that the deceased, Charles C. Gore, was the husband of petitioner; that on August 3, 1920, while in the employ of said mining company, he fell from a ladder, and received injuries consisting of a slight bruise of the right elbow, which, however, did not interfere with his employment. Subsequently, on November 29, 1920, while at work, he again sustained a fall, causing a further injury to the elbow. He still continued in his employment until January 7, 1921, when he was obliged to quit, so it is claimed, on account of these accidents.

The State Compensation Insurance Fund was the insurance carrier for the employer. No payments of compensation having been made to Gore, he filed an application in writing on April 12, 1921, for compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and made the mining company and State Compensation Insurance Fund parties defendant therein. On May 26, 1921, the matter came on for hearing before the Commission. No claim was made by Gore in this proceeding of any negligence or misconduct on the part of the employer. Two months thereafter, on July 6, 1921, a compromise and release agreement was entered into by and between the employer and employee, and filed with the Commission for approval, in the sum of $1,000, in satisfaction of the liability assumed by the employer and on account of any claims existing by reason of injuries sustained by Gore in the course of his employment. This agreement was disapproved by the respondent Commission. The State Compensation Insurance Fund then began paying $20.33 per week, workmen's compensation benefits, although the matter was not fully determined, and it paid the same up to the time of the applicant's death.

In April, 1923, being dissatisfied with the treatment he was receiving, Gore came to San Francisco, where he died on April 23, two days after his arrival.

On April 26, 1923, petitioner filed an application for death benefits, based upon the claim that her husband's demise was due to the injury he had received. This matter came on for hearing May 10 following, at which time it was consolidated with the undetermined application made by the deceased for compensation for his injury. It was not contended under this application that there was any negligence or misconduct on the part of the employer; on the contrary, it was stipulated otherwise.

[1] Upon the reports of the physicians who examined deceased immediately preceding his death it appeared that the injury which deceased had received to his elbow had nothing to do with his death. The report of the autopsy surgeon found that death was due to general tuberculosis, involving the lungs kidneys, bladder, and prostate, with chronic pleurisy and chronic peritonitis. It further appeared from the report that a tuberculous fistula of the elbow of deceased existed, but in the opinion of the surgeon the tuberculosis of the lungs was the most likely original source of the disease, which had spread to the other organs; that the injury had caused a localization of the tuberculous process in the elbow, but that it was hardly possible that the condition of the elbow was related to the cause of death. Other medical reports were to the same effect.

Upon the conclusion of the hearings the Commission found that death was the result of chronic pulmonary tuberculosis and chronic tuberculosis of the left kidney and the genito-urinal tract; that such condition was not caused by either of the injuries received by the deceased, and, further, that such injuries did not aggravate or exacerbate the tuberculous condition, and that neither was the cause of death, nor were they the cause of any disability beyond the period for which the employee received compensation, and that no further compensation was due. Accordingly it was ordered that the applicant take nothing by reason of her asserted claims.

A petition for a rehearing was filed upon the grounds that the evidence did not justify the findings, and that the findings do not support the order or award. This petition was denied, and, we think, rightfully so, as we are of the opinion that the evidence fully supports the findings of the Commission.

[2] The burden was upon appellant to prove her claim. Section 19d, Compensation Act; St. 1917, p. 831. This burden was not met by her. There is no medical testimony in the record to show that the injuries to the elbow caused the death of Gore, but, on the contrary, it was shown by abundant evidence that his death was caused by chronic tuberculosis, and that such injuries did not aggravate or exacerbate this condition. This being so, the Commission was fully justified in denying a death benefit.

The award is affirmed.

SCOTT et al. v. SCIARONI. (Civ. 2672.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 16, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 12, 1924.)

1. Pleading 🔑129(2)—Answer, denying injury to plaintiff because of defendant's negligence, admits injuries.

In malpractice suit, answer denying that plaintiff was disfigured or injured by reason of any negligence of defendant admits alleged injuries by failure to deny them.

2. Trial 🔑139(1) — When nonsuit may be granted, stated.

Court may grant nonsuit only when plaintiff's evidence, giving it all value to which legally entitled and indulging in every legitimate inference therefrom, without regard to conflicting evidence, is of insufficient substantiality to support verdict for plaintiff.

3. Appeal and error 🔑241—Respondent cannot urge grounds not stated in granted motion for nonsuit.

Defendant, on plaintiff's appeal from judgment of nonsuit, cannot urge grounds for nonsuit not stated in motion for nonsuit.

4. Trial 🔑159—Insufficiency of complaint not statutory ground for nonsuit.

Insufficiency of complaint is not statutory ground for nonsuit, Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 5.

5. Physicians and surgeons 🔑18(9)—Evidence of "fault" held for jury.

In malpractice suit, defendant's admissions that he left radium on too long and that it was his fault that plaintiff was in condition she was, in connection with proof of long-continued intense pain suffered and failure of burned part to heal, held sufficient expert evidence to require submission of case to jury; "fault" being synonymous with "negligence."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fault.]

6. Evidence 🔑213(4)—Positive admissions of distinct facts during attempt to compromise admissible.

Code Civ. Proc. § 895, as to inadmissibility of offer of compromise, which is not admission that anything is due (Code Civ. Proc. § 2078), does not render positive admissions of distinct facts, during attempt to compromise, inadmissible.

7. Appeal and error 🔑997(2)—Argument as to weakness of declarations and admissions as evidence not considered on appeal from judgment of nonsuit.

Argument that declarations and admissions are weakest kind of evidence goes only to credibility of witnesses and weight of evidence, which cannot be considered on appeal from judgment of nonsuit.

8. Appeal and error 🔑843(3)—Error in sustaining objections to questions which can be readily reframed not considered.

Alleged error in sustaining objections to questions to witnesses, which can be readily reframed to eliminate objectionable features, need not be considered on reversal of judgment of nonsuit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by Hazel Scott and husband against George H. Sciaroni. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Ernest Klette, W. M. Conley, Lindsay & Conley, and Phillip Conley, all of Fresno, for appellants.

M. G. Gallaher and Gallaher, Simpson & Hays, all of Fresno, and Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. At all times mentioned in the complaint the defendant was a physician and surgeon, engaged in practice in the city of Fresno. During June and July, 1920, he prescribed and applied radium treatment for fibrous tissue growths upon the hands, knees, and Achilles tendons of plaintiff Hazel Scott. The complaint alleges:

> That the defendant "did so carelessly, negligently and unskillfully give and apply said radium treatment * * * as to cause burns and sores upon the ankles, hands, knees, and Achilles tendons of both legs of said plaintiff; * * * that by reason of said negligence * * * the said plaintiff, Hazel Scott, has during all of the times herein mentioned, suffered, and does now suffer, great pain and anguish, and is permanently disfigured and injured, and will continue to suffer great pain and anguish in the future; that by reason of said negligence on the part of the said defendant and said injuries so caused thereby, the said plaintiff, Hazel Scott, was confined to her bed for a period of about six months; that the said injuries * * * have at all of the times herein mentioned interfered with the work, and does now interfere with the work, of the said Hazel Scott; and that she is unable to move about without great pain and suffering."

[1] The answer admits the application of the alleged radium treatment; admits, by failure to deny, the alleged injuries; but denies that such injuries were the result of any negligence on the part of the defendant. For example, in the second paragraph of the answer appears the following:

> "Defendant * * * denies that by reason of any negligence of the defendant, plaintiff Hazel Scott is permanently disfigured and injured, or disfigured, or injured at all."

This is not a denial of the alleged permanent injury and disfigurement, or that the same were caused by the alleged treatment, but only a denial that they resulted from any negligence of defendant. At the close of plaintiff's case, on motion of defendant, the court entered a judgment of nonsuit.

The case was tried in April, 1922. Dr. Mott, who is a particular friend of defendant and occupied offices with him, testified as follows concerning the condition of Mrs. Scott's injuries at the time of the trial:

> "The burns over the Achilles tendon, it is a raw sore, it is an ulcer, sore that weeps. I mean, there is a serum or exudate that comes from it more or less continuously and tender to the touch. * * * The burn has been painful and has been sloughing. * * * I think time will effect a recovery. * * * One leg is shorter than the other. Q. To what do you attribute that shortness? A. To the destruction of the Achilles tendon. Q. * * * Is there any possibility of it ever being remedied? A. Some time it may. * * * Q. Did he (defendant) say anything about the nurse having followed directions? A. I believe he told me that she left the radium on too long. * * * I couldn't swear whether he told me that himself or not. I said I thought he had."

The defendant testified that on one occasion he prescribed an application of radium for 3 hours, and that his technician, referred to by other witnesses as his nurse, applied it for 4 hours and 20 minutes, and that if radium is applied "considerably too long * * * the healing is all the more difficult." Mrs. Scott testified that the excessive application was made to the tendon of the left leg, the one on which it is claimed the permanent injury was inflicted; that she suffered intense pain from the injury continuously for nearly a year; and that she still suffered therefrom at the time of the trial. Relative to the effect of the treatment, she testified that the defendant said:

> "That he considered it was his fault; not exactly his fault, but the fault of his nurse, and him not applying it. * * * He said that he should have been more careful with letting his nurse handle it, and he should have applied it himself."

Plaintiff Charles Scott testified:

> That defendant "said he was very sorry she had been burned, and he realized it was his fault, and while he didn't have anything to do with applying the radium any more than directing his nurse, that he was responsible for everything she did in that office."

Ernest Klette, one of plaintiffs' attorneys, testified that defendant said:

> That "it was his fault that she was in the condition she was; that he had written to the insurance company to that effect."

The defendant testified:

> "Radium has a peculiar effect on tissues of the body, and especially so in diseased tissues. In the application of radium to a diseased area it causes a destruction of the cells. * * * Now that is nothing more or less than you might call it, a form of burn, though it is quite different than a burn where you apply hot iron. * * * In applying a hot iron to the tissue, you immediately destroy the tissue; but in the application of radium you so disturb the cell that it dies after a certain period of time, * * * varying from a few days to a week or three or four weeks. * * * It requires sometimes six weeks and maybe two months for these things to heal."

In this case radium was applied to the abnormal growths on both hands, both knees, and the tendons of both legs. Healing seems to have followed in the usual time and manner, except in the case of the left leg, where the application was made for a longer time than was prescribed, and at that place there continued to be "a raw sore, * * * an ulcer, sore that weeps," at the time of the trial, nearly two years after the treatment.

[2] Evidence in conflict with the foregoing is purposely omitted because it cannot be considered in determining whether the defendant was entitled to a judgment of nonsuit. A court "may grant a nonsuit only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, herein indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff." Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 150, 155 Pac. 631, 632.

[3, 4] Respondent contends that the judgment of nonsuit was properly entered on the ground of insufficiency of the complaint in various particulars. There are two answers to this contention: First, the grounds now urged were not stated in the motion for a nonsuit; and, second, insufficiency of the complaint is not a statutory ground for granting a nonsuit. Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 5; Keefe v. Keefe, 19 Cal. App. 310, 125 Pac. 929; Pacific Paving Co. v. Vizelich, 141 Cal. 4, 74 Pac. 352.

[5] Respondent urges that a physician and surgeon is not a warrantor of cures; that the result of the treatment alone is not sufficient proof of negligence or want of skill; that "whether or not a defendant physician and surgeon has been negligent or careless can only be tested, ascertained, and determined from testimony given by physicians and surgeons practicing the same methods as the defendant"; and that in this case "there is no such indispensable expert evidence that the treatment of plaintiff Hazel Scott by defendant was in any way responsible for the injuries of which plaintiffs complain." For the purposes of this case, at least, all the foregoing propositions except the last may be conceded. The defendant himself is an expert in the methods of treatment employed by him. The testimony as to defendant's admissions that he "left the radium on too long" and that "it was his fault that she was in the condition she was in," when considered in connection with proof of the long-continued intense pain suffered and the failure of the burned part to heal, constitute sufficient expert evidence to require the submission of the case to the jury. If the defendant had admitted that the injury complained of was caused by his negligence, it would hardly be contended that the evidence was insufficient to go to the jury. In the sense in which the word "fault" was used in the foregoing admissions, it is synonymous with "negligence." Indiana Union Traction Co. v. Long, 176 Ind. 532, 96 N. E. 604; Garland v. Hewes, 101 Me. 549, 64 Atl. 914; Sorensen v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co., 129 Wis. 366, 109 N. W. 84. It was in that sense that the word "fault" was used in Rudd v. Byrnes, 156 Cal. 636, 642, 105 Pac. 957, 960 (26 L. R. A. [N. S.] 134, 20 Ann. Cas. 124), where it is said:

> "The court should have allowed evidence of plaintiff's statements to the effect that the injury resulted from his own fault. They were declarations of a party, against his interest."

Respondent contends that the admissions of defendant "are not sufficient to supply the necessity for expert medical testimony," citing Loudon v. Scott, 58 Mont. 645, 194 Pac. 488, 12 A. L. R. 1487. In that case it is said:

> "There was not any expert testimony to the effect, that, upon the admitted facts, the action of Dr. Scott in causing the anæsthetic to be administered * * * indicated the exercise or want of ordinary care, skill or diligence, as is required in malpractice cases. * * * But it is the contention of appellants that they met the requirements of the rule fully by introducing the admissions made by Dr. Scott, to the effect that he knew that Loudon's intemperance had reduced his vitality and greatly increased the danger incident to the administration of an anæsthetic, and that he knew it was dangerous to cause the anæsthetic to be administered to Loudon on July 18, but because of his knowledge of the patient's physical condition he felt justified in proceeding at that time. That this does not amount to an opinion or admission that the treatment—the administration of the anæsthetic under the circumstances—was not in conformity to the requirements of good surgery, or indicated a want of ordinary care, skill, ability or diligence, is so obvious as to require no comment. No presumption of negligence arises from the fact that it was dangerous to administer the anæsthetic to Loudon on July 18, for the evidence discloses that the element of danger is present in every instance where a patient is anæsthetized."

The distinction between the case cited and the one here under consideration is patent. In the Montana case the defendant had acted in accordance with his best judgment, and the evidence failed to show that he did not act reasonably. He made no admission of fault or negligence. Here the defendant admitted, according to the testimony, that the injuries complained of were caused by his fault.

[6] Some of the foregoing admissions were made by the defendant during an attempt to compromise. Section 895 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an offer of compromise and failure to accept it cannot be given in evidence. This does not mean that an admission made during an attempt to compromise is not admissible in evidence against the party making it, but only that the offer itself is not admissible. The basis of the rule prescribed by section 895 is expressed in section 2078, which reads: "An offer of compromise is not an admission that anything is due." Admissions made in negotiations for a compromise, "except as they are admissions of distinct facts, * * * are regarded as hypothetical admissions, from which it is not proper to draw any inference of liability, and therefore are not to be received in evidence." Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 297, 30 Pac. 529, 534. In Wigmore on Evidence, § 1061, it is said:

> "If a plain concession is in fact made, it is receivable, even though it forms part of an offer to compromise."

The admissions here in question were of distinct facts, stated positively and not hypothetically, and therefore admissible in evidence, even though made in the course of an attempted compromise.

[7] Respondent argues that declarations and admissions are the weakest kind of evidence. The argument goes only to the credibility of the witnesses testifying to the admissions and the weight of the evidence, questions which do not arise on a motion for a nonsuit. The question here is whether the evidence, assuming its absolute verity, is legally sufficient to support a judgment for plaintiffs.

[8] Appellant contends that the court erred in sustaining defendant's objections to certain questions propounded to defendant by counsel for plaintiffs. Some of these questions assumed, contrary to the fact, that the witness had testified that he had been negligent in the application of radium. Others were speculative as to what would have been the condition of Mrs. Scott if there had been no application of radium. The questions can be reframed so readily to eliminate the objectionable features that it is thought unnecessary to further consider the matter here.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by Emil Brisacher against Philip Baier and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno, for appellants.

Robbins, Elkins & Van Fleet, of San Francisco, for respondent.

YOUNG, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff recovered judgment in this action for $3,081.50 against the defendants Philip Baier, E. A. McCord, and F. H. Smith, and Ed. L. Harper, who defaulted. The action was dismissed as to the defendant A. J. Pearce, who was not served. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury. The defendants Baier, McCord, and Smith appeal.

The complaint contains two causes of action, one of which is based upon the claim of plaintiff for services alleged to have been performed by him for defendants and for money advanced for their account, and the other cause of action is based upon an assigned claim of Robbins, Elkins & Van Fleet for legal services alleged to have been rendered by them for the defendants.

In reference to plaintiff's individual claim, among other things it was in effect found by the trial court that plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the defendants, and each and all of them, rendered services to them as advertising engineer of the value of $495.11, and advanced and paid out for the account of said defendants, and each and all of them, $1,086.40 for newspaper advertising, photographs, printing, and incidental expenses, which amount of $1,086.40 the said defendants and each of them agreed to repay to plaintiff.

As to the assigned claim, among other things, it was in effect found by the trial court that the defendants were engaged in a joint venture and promotion in obtaining a lease and option to purchase in the name of the defendant Philip Baier a certain grape juice and grape syrup factory, together with the lands upon which the same is situate, near Kingsburg, Fresno county, Cal., and the incorporation of a corporation under the name of Golden States Products Company, to take over said lease and option to purchase the said factory, and to purchase, operate, and manage the said factory, and that Robbins, Elkins & Van Fleet, at the special instance and request of the defendants and each and all of them, rendered legal services as attorneys and counselors at law for the defendants, and each of them, in connection with obtaining said lease and option, and negotiations concerning, and the preparation of various drafts of said lease and option, in consulting with said defendants in reference to said lease and option, and the formation of the corporation referred to, and the incorporation and organization of said corporation, Golden States Products Company, and that said services were of the reasonable value of $1,500.

Appellants contend that there is no evidence to support the finding of the trial court that the services rendered by plaintiff were rendered at the instance and request of appellants, or that the money advanced by him was advanced at the instance and request of appellants and paid out for their account.

It is conceded by appellants that as to the services rendered by Robbins, Elkins & Van Fleet in the formation of the corporation Golden States Products Company, they authorized the same, but they contend that the evidence does not support the finding of the trial court that the services rendered by said attorneys in connection with obtaining the lease and option were rendered at the instance and request of appellants, and further that the evidence does not support the finding that the services rendered by the said attorneys after the formation of the corporation were rendered at the instance and request of appellants.

The Golden States Products Company, a copartnership, consisting of Ed. L. Harper and several other members, owned a grape juice and grape syrup factory, together with the lands upon which the same is situate, near Kingsburg, in Fresno county, Cal. The business conducted by this copartnership in connection with the factory had been a failure, and the copartnership was heavily in debt. The members of the partnership, especially Harper, were desirous of disposing of the property, or of effecting a reorganization of the business. The latter part of January, or the first part of February, 1921, Harper received information to the effect that Philip Baier, one of the appellants, might be interested in the purchase of the factory, and sought an interview with him on the subject. Harper also heard that appellant Smith had been making inquiries about the grape juice manufacturing business, and called upon him at his office in Fresno. Smith informed Harper that Mr. Baier and himself were contemplating the building of a grape juice factory. A day or two later, Baier, Smith, and McCord met with Harper and a conference was had upon the subject. Baier informed Harper that he would like to obtain an option to purchase said factory if satisfactory terms could be agreed on. Other meetings were held between these parties, at some of which meetings there were also present Guthrie, Truss, and Pearce. It was determined that Baier and some of the others should go to San Francisco to meet the members of the copartnership and discuss the matter of obtaining an option to purchase the factory. On February 27, 1921, Baier, Guthrie, Truss, and Pearce went to San Francisco and met members of the copartnership in the office of Robbins, Elkins & Van Fleet. Mr. Elkins of this firm had been the attorney of Mr. Harper for some time, and it was at the suggestion of Mr. Harper that the meeting was held in this office, and that Mr. Elkins was invited to participate in the conference. The matter of obtaining an option to purchase running in the name of Mr. Baier was agreed upon, and Mr. Elkins understood he was employed by Mr. Baier and his associates to meet with Mr. Maurice E. Harrison, the attorney representing the copartnership, to work out the details of the option and to prepare a draft of the same. Several drafts of the option were prepared before one satisfactory to all parties was had. Finally, on March 30, 1921, at a meeting in Fresno at which Elkins, Baier, McCord, Smith, Harper, and Pearce were present, the final draft of the option which had been executed by the members of the copartnership was accepted by Mr. Baier, and the first payment called for by its terms was paid to a person in the Bank of Italy in Fresno, authorized by the members of the copartnership to accept the payment and deliver the option to Mr. Baier. Of this payment, Baier, Smith, McCord, Pearce, and Harper each paid $2,000. Mr. Elkins was then instructed by these associates, or some of them, to prepare the papers for the formation of a corporation under the name of Golden States Products Company, and also to prepare the necessary application to the commissioner of corporations for permission to sell stock of the corporation. Mr. Elkins proceeded with this work as directed. The plan of appellants and their associates for making further payments on the option in the purchase of the factory was to sell stock to raise the money therefor. A scheme of advertising was agreed upon, and plaintiff, an advertising engineer, was instructed to prepare a salesman's kit, so called, and to carry on advertising in the newspapers in the San Joaquin Valley. Mr. Elkins prepared the papers for the formation of the corporation, and the corporation was organized. Appellants were not among the incorporators. There consisted of Mr. Harper, Mr. Elkins, and others selected by Mr. Elkins to act as dummies. Plaintiff proceeded to carry out his instructions in reference to advertising. The effort to sell stock failed, and the appellants never became members of the corporation. In the advertising matter for sale of stock, they had been featured as directors of the corporation.

[1] Plaintiff's individual cause of action is based upon his claim that he was employed by each and all of the appellants and their associates. We are of the opinion that the evidence supports the claim of plaintiff. Harper testified that at a meeting had with appellants on March 25, 1921, the matter of carrying on a campaign of advertising was discussed, and that he suggested the name of plaintiff as the man to do this work, and that appellants and each of them told him to engage plaintiff and have him start to work at once; that he, on the following day, acting under this authority, employed plaintiff to do the advertising upon which his claim is based. Plaintiff testified in his own behalf to the effect that Mr. Harper called at his office on March 26, 1921, and told him that he arranged with Mr. Baier, Mr. Pearce, Mr. McCord, and Mr. Smith to promote this enterprise, and outlined the complete details of their plans, and asked him to prepare immediately a salesman's kit, and prepare certain letters and make ready to carry on the necessary advertising. It also appears that while the work was in progress he met with Harper and the appellants and had discussions in reference to the advertising. Appellants admit that the value of plaintiff's services as found by the trial court is reasonable. The matter of plaintiff's employment by appellants and their associates was clearly a matter of fact for the trial court to determine, and there is substantial evidence supporting its findings as to the same.

[2] The right of recovery on the assigned claim of Robbins, Elkins & Van Fleet is based upon the claim that appellants and their associates were joint adventurers and promoters, and that Mr. Baier, acting for himself and others, employed Mr. Elkins to render the services sued on. Appellants Smith and McCord testified to the effect that they were not associated with Mr. Baier until March 30, 1921, the day the option was accepted by Baier, and it is therefore contended by them that they are not liable for services rendered by Mr. Elkins prior to that date.

Mr. Baier testified to the effect that he did not employ Mr. Elkins to represent him in obtaining the option, and that he understood that Mr. Elkins was acting as the attorney for Mr. Harper.

It is our opinion that the claim that appellants and Harper and Pearce were joint adventurers and joint promoters is fully supported by the evidence. Harper testified that he had been told by appellants in several meetings held between them prior to February 27, 1921, that the appellants were all together in the deal. This, coupled with the fact that each of them was present when the option was finally accepted by Baier, and each then and there paid a part of the first payment called for by the option, justified the trial court in finding that they had been interested together in the deal from its inception. As to the employment of Mr. Elkins, the testimony of Elkins, Harper, and Sinton, all witnesses in the case, is to the effect that Mr. Baier instructed Mr. Elkins in the meeting held in the office of Mr. Elkins on February 27, 1921, to co-operate with Mr. Maurice E. Harrison, the attorney for the copartnership, in the preparation of the option, and that Mr. Baier told Mr. Elkins to protect his interest in the matter. Mr. Elkins also testified that in other conferences had with Mr. Baier that Mr. Baier had asked his advice pertaining to the option and as to his liability thereunder.

[3] The rule of law under which the liability of appellants arises is clearly announced in the opinion of the court in the case of Strause v. Richmond Wood Working Co., 109 Va. 724, 65 S. E. 659, 132 Am. St. Rep. 937, as follows:

> "Upon the soundest reasoning, the tendency of the courts in recent years is to an adherence to the doctrine, that those dealing with promoters should be left with the double security of the promotor and the company when one is formed, unless it clearly appears that the liability of the promoter was not intended, or that it was intended to be released when the liability of the corporation began."

In Hersey v. Tully, 8 Colo. App. 110, 44 Pac. 854, it is said:

> "Promoters of a corporation are personally liable for the contracts made by them, or by agents authorized by them, preliminary to its organization."

This rule is also supported in the cases of Ijams v. Andrews, 151 Fed. 725, 730, 81 C. C. A. 109; Leake v. City of Venice, 50 Cal. App. 462, 195 Pac. 440.

[4] The last point that calls for consideration is the contention of appellants that they are not liable for the services rendered by Mr. Elkins after the incorporation of the Golden States Products Company. It is contended by them that these services were performed for the corporation, and hence the corporation and its stockholders are liable. These services consisted of the preparation of minutes and by-laws and the application to the commissioner of corporations for permission to sell stock. When it is remembered that the corporation was organized for the benefit of the promoters with a nominal board of directors, and that the corporation never functioned, and that Mr Elkins performed these services under instructions given by the appellants before the incorporation, we think the obligation of the appellants to pay for these services arises under the rule above mentioned as to the liability of joint adventurers and promoters.

We are of the opinion that the evidence supports the findings of the trial court, and the judgment is affirmed.

FRAZIER v. SOUTHERN COUNTIES GAS CO. (Civ. 4007.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 18, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Finding of fact by trial judge, supported by substantial evidence, not disturbed on appeal.

A finding of fact by a trial judge, supported by substantial evidence, cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. Corporations 🔑432(12)—Finding that corporation is bound by acts of agent having implied authority held supported.

Where a district superintendent of a corporation had a duty to attend to business which was the foundation for the purchase of pipe, and in another similar transaction had acted in a similar way with the apparent consent of the corporation, in purchase of pipe in which he had at least implied authority, finding that the corporation was bound by his acts held supported by the evidence.

3. Trial 🔑397(3)—No duty to make finding on issue not presented by pleadings.

In an action by a seller against a buyer to recover payment for pipe, where the issue of fraud of the seller was not presented by the pleadings, there was no duty on the trial court to make a finding in connection therewith.

4. Appeal and error 🔑931(4)—In absence of finding by trial judge as to fraud, presumption is that suggestion of fraud was not favorably received.

In an action by the seller of pipe against the buyer to recover the price, where no fraud of the seller as against third parties who were to pay part of the price was pleaded, and there was no finding of a trial court as to fraud, and the evidence with reference thereto was conflicting, no relief can be given for such fraud on appeal.

5. Sales 🔑213—Selection of pipe and preparation for use held a "present transfer."

Under Civ. Code, § 1140, as to time of passing of title, where the workmen of a buyer of pipe selected and separated pipe from that which was not acceptable to it, and measured the pipe to be used, and removed threads from it preparatory to using it as contemplated by the interested parties, there was a "present transfer" of title to the pipe.

6. Sales 🔑384(4)—Twelve dollars for storing pipe refused by buyer not error.

Where the seller of pipe, which had been selected and prepared for use by the buyer, notified it to remove the pipe from his premises, on failure to remove it was not error to award the seller $12 for keeping the pipe 12 months.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by F. O. Frazier against the Southern Counties Gas Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

O. C. Sattinger and Le Roy M. Edwards, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. H. Thomas, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered against the defendant in the sum of $310.35 on account of certain gas pipe alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to the defendant and for which no payment was made.

[1] Appellant urges as a reason for the reversal of the judgment that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding of fact that the contract of sale was made as alleged in the complaint. An examination, however, of the record discloses the fact that there was substantial evidence to justify such conclusion on the part of the judge of the trial court, and the rule is so well settled as to require no citation of authority that in such circumstances the finding of the trial court cannot be disturbed on appeal.

[2] The contract in question was entered into between plaintiff and a district superintendent of the defendant, and it is claimed that there was no authority on the part of such agent to conclude the contract. The evidence shows that it was part of the recognized duty of the district superintendent to attend to the very business which was the foundation for the purchase of the pipe, and that in another transaction, which was a part of, or at least closely connected with, the particular transaction which brought about the purchase of the pipe which is the subject of this controversy, the same agent had acted with the plaintiff in conjunction with other interested parties in a similar way, apparently with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the defendant. In this connection there was evidence to the effect that plaintiff had originally negotiated with the superior officer of the agent, and had made with such superior officer a tentative contract entirely different from the one alleged in the complaint; but the finding of the court, by which this court is bound, and which finding was supported by other substantial evidence, is to the effect that the final contract was entered into between plaintiff and the district superintendent of the defendant, and that such agent had at least implied authority in the premises. It must therefore follow that the defendant's specification to the effect that the agent was acting without authority in the premises must fail.

[3, 4] It is also suggested that because the gas pipe was second hand, and for the reason that certain neighbors of plaintiff who were to receive the benefit of the pipe being laid in front of their several properties in order that they might make gas connections therewith were to contribute to the cost of the pipe on the assumption that it was new pipe, and that because of such deceit plaintiff was to make a secret profit on the transaction, the contract would be unenforceable. It is true that there was some evidence introduced on the trial which might justify such a conclusion. On the other hand, there was evidence from which the court would have been warranted in finding that plaintiff's conduct was blameless and entirely free from either legal or moral criticism. No fraud was pleaded by the defendant as against plaintiff; neither was there any finding by the court on the subject. Such being the case, the presumption must be that the suggestion of plaintiff's fraud in the matter was not favorably received by the judge of the trial court. Besides, no such issue having been presented by the pleadings, there was no duty resting on the court to make a finding in connection therewith. Burton v Mullenary, 147 Cal. 259, 81 Pac. 544; Glassell v. Glassell, 147 Cal. 513, 82 Pac. 42; Moran v. Ross, 79 Cal. 159, 21 Pac. 547. There being no finding on the question of fraud, and the evidence with reference thereto being conflicting, this court is powerless, were it so inclined, to afford the defendant any relief.

[5] It is also contended by the appellant that the trial court applied an erroneous rule of damages—the basis for such claim being that the pipe was not delivered to the defendant, and consequently, instead of plaintiff being entitled to recover a judgment for the agreed price of the pipe, the damages should have been for the difference between the contract price of the pipe and the value of the pipe to the seller. In this regard the findings of the trial court are "that in conformity therewith (the contract) the plaintiff did sell and deliver to the above-named defendant, under the specific terms of said agreement," the pipe in question. The transcript on appeal shows that, although the pipe was physically on the property of the plaintiff, the defendant took possession thereof to the extent of sending its workmen to select and segregate the pipe desired by the defendant from the pipe which was not acceptable to it, which was followed by defendant's taking measurements of the pipe which was to be used; and on the following day other employees of the defendant removed the threads from the designated pipe preparatory to using it as contemplated by all the interested parties. The question of the time when title to personal property passes is treated in section 1140 of the Civil Code, by which it is declared that "the title to personal property, sold or exchanged, passes to the buyer whenever the parties agree upon a present transfer, and the thing itself is identified, whether it is separated from other things or not."

In the case of Todd v. Lyon, 55 Cal. App. 67, 202 Pac. 899, where the authorities are collected, the principle is announced that the question of the sale of personal property is to be ascertained from the intention of the parties, which is to be determined by the judge from all the facts and circumstances of the case; and, where goods are identified, and the price to be paid therefor depends upon some unit of measurement or invoicing thereafter to be made, the transfer is complete. See, also, 35 Cyc. 192; Jensen v. Carlenzoli, 54 Cal. App 656, 202 Pac. 452. In the instant case, as found by the court, the parties agreed "upon a present transfer"; the pipe sold was clearly identified by its selection and its segregation from other pipe, by the defendant, which was followed by acts showing the defendant's ownership. The intention of the parties was thus determined to be a present change in title to the pipe, and the trial judge by his findings so declared. The evidence amply supports the finding thereon, and, as before stated, the rule is that such finding cannot now be disturbed by this court.

[6] Appellant's final complaint against the judgment is that the court erred in awarding the plaintiff the sum of $12 for storage of the pipe. It appears that, after defendant had selected and segregated the pipe, and had removed the threads therefrom, it left the pipe scattered over the ground in full view of plaintiff's living room window; that thereafter plaintiff notified the defendant to remove the pipe, which the defendant failed to do. Plaintiff thereupon moved the pipe to the rear of his garage, and piled it up in a neat pile, where it remained until the action was tried. The damages allowed by the trial court as a reasonable sum for the storage of the pipe on plaintiff's premises was the sum of $1 per month. The rule with reference to plaintiff's right to recover for such storage is laid down in 35 Cyc. p. 599, as follows:

> "The expenses incurred by the seller by reason of the breach of the contract may generally be recovered as part of the damages, such as extra expense incurred by reason of defendant's representations that he is ready for delivery, followed by repudiation, expense of resale, and expense for the keep of animals for a reasonable time in anticipation of a resale"—citing cases.

In the case of King v. Globe Grain & Milling Co., 58 Cal. App. 105, 208 Pac. 166, a recovery was permitted by the plaintiff in a case of this nature on account of warehouse charges.

In the instant case, if it be assumed that on the failure of defendant to remove the pipe, after having been notified by plaintiff to do so, plaintiff would have had the right to place the pipe in a warehouse, then there would seem to be no good reason why the defendant should not here be obliged to pay the reasonable charges for storage of the pipe on the premises of plaintiff.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

NIELSEN v. DAVIDSON. (Civ. 4726.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 5, 1924. Rehearing Denied May 2, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 2, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1) — Finding of fact supported by evidence not disturbed.

Trial court's finding of fact supported by some evidence will not be disturbed.

2. Guaranty 🔑24(1)—Defendant's attempt to revoke guaranty after it had been acted upon held ineffectual.

Defendant's attempt to revoke a contract guaranteeing payment of notes given by his associates in purchase of a creamery was ineffectual after it had been acted upon, and purpose for which it was executed had been obtained by his associates.

3. Guaranty 🔑5 — Contract not invalidated though bank's assumption of notes required it to exceed limitation prescribed by Federal Banking Act.

A contract guaranteeing payment of notes conditioned on a bank's purchase thereof was not invalidated though requiring bank to exceed limitation prescribed by U. S. Comp. St. § 9761; such violation being a question which concerned federal government alone.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by A. T. Nielsen against A. Davidson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Herbert Choynski and F. W. Nightingill, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Egerton D. Lakin, of Palo Alto, and Alexander McCulloch, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued the defendant to recover upon a written contract guaranteeing the payment of two promissory notes in the sum of $6,250. Plaintiff owned the University Creamery in the city of Palo Alto, and, in December, 1919, agreed to sell it to Allen and Carter for the sum of $25,000, plus the inventory of stock in trade. Pending the running of the statutory notice fixing the day of sale the bill of sale was executed and deposited in escrow with the First National Bank of Palo Alto. During this time the buyers requested Nielsen to accept two promissory notes to cover one-half of the agreed purchase price. Plaintiff agreed to accept the promissory notes providing they should be satisfactory to the First National Bank, and emphasized the fact that it would be necessary for the cashier of said bank to assure him that the notes were as good as cash, as he was selling the creamery for cash. This was agreed to, and one of the purchasers brought the defendant Davidson to the First National Bank of Palo Alto and introduced him to the cashier. The whole transaction was explained to Davidson, and during the course of the conversation he explained that he was a silent partner in the creamery; that he did not want his name known, but would guarantee the notes and would write a letter to that effect. On December 5th he sent to the cashier of the bank the letter which is the basis of this action, and in which he stated that he understood that the plaintiff wanted an agreement with the bank whereby at any time he might cash the two notes, and that his letter might be treated as an agreement of guaranty for the purposes mentioned in the event that the bank should see fit at any time to purchase or carry the notes. This letter was supplemented by a letter from the defendant's bank in San Francisco to the effect that he was good for the payment, and these were shown to the plaintiff by the cashier of the First National Bank, who thereupon assured the plaintiff that the notes were good, and that the transaction might be completed in accordance with his wishes. Upon such assurance plaintiff consented to the bank's delivery of his bill of sale to the purchasers. The sale was thus completed in the first part of December, 1919, and the purchasers took possession. Some time in August of the year following the defendant herein endeavored to revoke his guaranty. The notes had been made payable to the First National Bank of Palo Alto, and when the defendant attempted to cancel his guaranty the bank assigned the notes to plaintiff herein, who commenced this action. He recovered judgment for the full value of the notes, and the defendant has appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

[1] The parties concede that the letters referred to are sufficient to constitute a written guaranty on the part of the appellant. It is argued in support of the appeal that the guaranty is conditional upon the bank's either purchasing or carrying the notes. Conceding this to be true, the trial court found, as alleged in paragraph VIII of the complaint, that the notes were sold, assigned, and transferred to the bank for the full sum of $12,650. There was some evidence to support this finding, and this is a sufficient answer to the first point urged by the appellant.

[2] The second point presented is that the guaranty was revoked. It is true that the appellant attempted to revoke this guaranty long after it had been acted upon, and the purposes for which it had been executed had been obtained by his associates. As soon as the sale was consummated the guaranty became irrevocable so far as the respondent herein was concerned.

[3] The further contention is urged that the court erred in refusing to admit evidence showing the amount of the subscribed capital stock and surplus of the Palo Alto bank. The point is that the face value of these two notes exceeded 10 per cent of the capital stock and surplus of the bank, and that accordingly the bank was prohibited from purchasing the notes under the provisions of U S. Compiled Statutes, § 9761. Aside from the fact that this matter was not put in issue by any of the pleadings, it is a sufficient answer to the appellant to say that any violation of the federal banking act was a question which concerned the United States alone. Appellant's point is that, as the guaranty in suit is conditional upon the bank's either purchasing or carrying the notes, and as the bank could not carry both notes if in excess of 10 per cent. of its capital and surplus, then perforce the bank could not fulfill the conditions of the guaranty, and the whole, therefore, must fall. But such is not the penalty of the Federal Banking Act. At the instance of the United States the bank might be subjected to the forfeiture of its charter, and the officers might be required to personally make good the amount of the excess; but none of these matters may be urged by the debtor upon a loan or obligation in excess of the statutory limitation.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HADLEY. (Cr. 1031.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 27, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 26, 1924.)

1. Indictment and information 🔑146—On demurrer, facts well pleaded taken to be true.

On demurrer to information, material and issuable facts, well pleaded without inconsistency or conclusions of law, and not contrary to facts judicially known, are taken as true.

2. Public service commissions 🔑28—Finding of Railroad Commission on fact question not subject to review.

Under Public Utilities Act, §§ 1, 67, findings of Railroad Commission on questions of fact are final, and not subject to review.

3. Carriers 🔑10—Railroad Commission may order cessation of operation of stages, right of which was in possession when statute became effective.

Notwithstanding that prior to time Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act became effective defendant was in lawful possession of right to operate stages over named route, in absence of determination by Railroad Commission that public rights and interest would be advanced by such operation, defendant could not lawfully exercise the right.

4. Public service commissions 🔑27—Supreme Court only authorized to review orders of Railroad Commission.

Under Public Utilities Act, § 67, no court other than the Supreme Court has jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct, or annul decision or order of Railroad Commission, and only relief which aggrieved party may have from such order is through writ issued by Supreme Court.

5. Judgment 🔑564(1)—Order denying writ of review not accompanied by opinion held final adjudication and res judicata of matters presented.

Where Supreme Court having sole jurisdiction under Public Utilities Act, § 67, to review decision or order of Railroad Commission, denied writ of review, but without opinion, its order was final adjudication of correctness and validity of decision reviewed and res judicata of matters presented.

Finding by Railroad Commission of defendant's operation as a transportation company, as defined by St. 1917, c. 213, and amendments thereto, held equivalent to finding that vehicles were operated on public highways.

7. Carriers 🔑10—Order of Railroad Commission in language of statute not invalid.

An order of the Railroad Commission, enjoining the operation of stages over regular routes, and fixing termini in language of St. 1917, c. 213, held valid as against objection that charges in information did not follow findings and order of Commission.

8. Carriers 🔑21(4)—Objection to information that there was no allegation that order of Railroad Commission was duly given or made held untenable.

Objection to information charging violation of order of Railroad Commission, in that it did not conform to Code of Civil Proc. § 456, because there was no allegation that Commission's order was "duly given or made," held untenable, since information in pleading the determination by Commission set forth facts conferring jurisdiction.

9. Carriers 🔑21(4)—Charge that stages were operated for compensation not conclusion.

Charge in information for violation of order of Railroad Commission, under St. 1917, c. 213, that stages were operated for compensation, which followed language of statute, held not objectionable as alleging conclusion of law.

14. Contempt 🔑54(4)—Without statement in affidavit that contempt committed court without jurisdiction.

In absence of statement of facts in affidavit showing in themselves that contempt has been committed, court is without jurisdiction.

15. Contempt 🔑23—Party must have actual notice of order or personal service of it before being charged with violation.

To punish for contempt because of violation of court order it is essential that party charged either have actual notice of making of order or that personal service of it be had upon him prior to time he is charged with violation, and failure to charge previous knowledge or service is fatal defect.

16. Public service commissions 🔑19(4)—Allegation of service of order of Railroad Commission prior to date of alleged disobedience essential to prosecution on information.

In prosecution for violation of order of Railroad Commission, allegation of service on defendant of certified copy of Commission's order prior to date of alleged disobedience was essential to maintenance of action, and without proof of such service court was without jurisdiction, though St. 1917, c. 213, does not in terms require such notice, the provisions of Public Utilities Act, § 61, being applicable.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal by the people of the state of California from a judgment in favor of defendant on a demurrer to an information which charged defendant with the violation of an order of the Railroad Commission of this state.

An examination of the information herein discloses that the facts alleged, material to a decision of the questions which this court is called upon to decide, in substance, are: That prior to May 1, 1917, defendant was operating a certain automobile stage line in this state and within the county of Imperial; that thereafter and within the following year he ceased to operate said stage line, and that he did not again resume such operations until some time in the month of March, 1923; that on the 9th day of April, 1923, the Railroad Commission of the state of California instituted an investigation into the "methods, practices, and operations" of defendant with reference to his conduct of said stage line, and, after regular proceedings had thereon, made the finding that defendant had been operating his stage line "as a transportation company as defined in chapter 213, Statutes of 1917, and amendments thereto, and for which no certificate of public convenience and necessity has been obtained from this Commission as required by section 5 of the above-mentioned statutory enactment; that this respondent discontinued service and operation * * * in March, 1918, without having requested or received from this Commission authority so to do"; that thereupon the Railroad Commission ordered that defendant cease such operation, and that operation be not resumed by defendant until he was granted permission so to do by the Railroad Commission, of which ruling the secretary of the Commission was ordered to serve a certified copy thereof by registered mail upon defendant; that thereafter, to wit, on or about the 13th day of June, 1923, defendant resumed the operation "of automobile stages for carriage of passengers for compensation over regular routes and between fixed termini on the public highways, * * * contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

A petition for rehearing herein having been granted, the court adopts as its opinion at this time that part of its former opinion which follows herein in quotation marks:

[1] "It is a rule of law that, for the purpose of ruling upon a demurrer to an information, the material and issuable facts alleged in the information, which facts are well pleaded without inconsistency therein or conclusions of law thereon, and which are not contrary to facts of which the court may take judicial notice, are to be taken as true.

"The demurrer to the information, with exception of one paragraph thereof, was substantially in the language of the statute, which prescribes the grounds upon which a demurrer to an information may be interposed; that is to say, the attention of neither the court nor the people was directed to any particular defect in the information, but the entire objection of defendant was permitted to rest upon the general language of the statute. In the brief presented by counsel for respondent the following appears with reference to the points raised herein: 'There are six separate and distinct propositions of law first discussed herein, none of which was ever presented in the petition for the writ of review or presented in any court.' In the case of People v. Bradbury, 155 Cal. 813, 103 Pac. 215 (in which case, however, defendant was the appealing party), it is said: 'That the court may be enlightened upon the precise matter on which error is predicated we think too plain to call for discussion. * * * Defendant, therefore, may not be permitted here in this court and for the first time to urge this ground of special objection, never presented to the trial court.' The opinion of the judge of the lower court, rendered on the decision of the demurrer, shows that the only point which was relied upon by defendant on the argument of the demurrer was included in the fifth paragraph thereof, which was to the effect that the order of the Railroad Commission upon which the information is based is null and void because of lack of power from any source to make such an order. Indeed, the brief of defendant herein, while purporting to specify various defects in the proceedings leading up to the rendition of the order, in effect is but an ultimate attack upon powers assumed by the Railroad Commission, and which, according to defendant's contention, have no existence as a matter of law.

[2] "As heretofore stated, the Commission's findings of facts were that respondent discontinued service and operation in the year 1918, and that he did not resume operations until some time in the month of March, 1923. The Supreme Court of this state has repeatedly held, in accordance with the provisions of sections 1 and 67 of the Public Utilities Act (St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 18) that the findings of the Commission on questions of fact are final and not subject to review. Oro Electric Corporation v. Railroad Commission, 169 Cal. 466, 147 Pac. 118; Clemmons v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 254, 159 Pac. 713; San Leandro v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 229, 191 Pac. 1; Live Oak Water Users' Association v. Railroad Commission (Cal. Sup.) 219 Pac. 65; Motor Transit Co. v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 573, 209 Pac. 586. There can be no question, therefore, but that the finding by the Railroad Commission as to the abandonment of the right to operate a stage line and the fact that operations were not resumed until some time in the month of March, 1923, must be accepted as final; such conclusion being one that cannot be inquired into by this court.

[3] "It is urged that, because on May 10, 1917, when the statute particularly herein involved became effective, defendant was in the lawful possession of the right to operate stages over the route in question, such right was vested, and that the Commission had no jurisdiction to order the cessation of such operation. But, as is pointed out by Mr. Justice Sloss in his opinion in the case of Oro Electric Corporation v. Railroad Commission, 169 Cal. 475, 147 Pac. 118, an abstract right may exist in a corporation to engage in a business falling within the provisions of the Public Utility Act; nevertheless, in the absence of a determination by the Railroad Commission, as manifested by its certificate, to the effect that the rights and interests of the general public will be advanced by the prosecution of the proposed enterprise, the corporation may not lawfully exercise such right. That the order by the Railroad Commission was purely regulatory and was expressly authorized by a constitutional provision of the so-called Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act is clearly made to appear by the ruling of the Supreme Court of this state in the case of Motor Transit Co. v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 573, 209 Pac. 586.

[4] "It is contended by appellant that the superior court erred in assuming jurisdiction to declare that the order of the Railroad Commission was invalid. Section 67 of the Public Utilities Act provides, in part, that 'no court of this state (except the Supreme Court to the extent herein specified) shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct, or annul any order or decision of the Commission or to suspend or delay the execution or operation thereof or to enjoin, restrain or interfere with the Commission in the performance of its official duties.'

[5] "In the case of Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822, also in the case of Sexton v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Ry. Co., 173 Cal. 760, 161 Pac. 748, the constitutionality of the section just quoted is upheld by the Supreme Court. It must therefore be accepted as the settled law of this state that no court other than the Supreme Court has jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct, or annul any decision or order of the Railroad Commission. Even though the order by the Railroad Commission be palpably erroneous in point of law, until some order by the Supreme Court may be issued to the contrary, the original order of the Commission must stand as a proper and legal order in the premises. No court, other than the Supreme Court, may lawfully disregard it. Such being the state of the law, it would follow that, as is provided by the act itself, the only relief which the aggrieved party may have from such an order is by or through a writ issued by the Supreme Court. In the instant case it appears that an application for a writ of review was presented by the defendant to the Supreme Court, and was by that court denied by an order dated August 23, 1923, which was after the date when the demurrer to the information herein was sustained. The order denying the application for the writ of review was not accompanied by an opinion—merely the formal order 'petition denied' being entered in the record. That such an order is a final adjudication of the correctness and the validity of the decision which it is attempted to have reviewed is decided in the case of Napa Valley Electric Co. v. Railroad Commission of California decided by the United States Supreme Court, and reported in 251 U. S. 366, 40 Sup. Ct. 174, 64 L. Ed. 310, where the court cited several authorities, and in the course of the opinion said: 'In those cases [referring to cases cited] the applications for writs of certiorari were denied, which was tantamount to a decision of the court that the orders and decisions of the Commission did not exceed its authority or violate any right of the several petitioners under the Constitution of the United States or of the state of California. And so with the denial of the petition of the electric company—it had like effect and was the exercise of the judicial powers of the court. * * * And we agree with the district court that 'the denial of the petition was necessarily a final judicial determination * * * based on the identical rights' asserted in that court and repeated here. Williams v. Bruffy, 102 U. S. 248, 255, [26 L. Ed. 135, 137]. And further, to quote the district court, 'Such a determination is as effectual as an estoppel as would have been a formal judgment upon issues of fact'—citing cases.

" 'The court held, and we concur, that absence of an opinion by the Supreme Court did not affect the quality of its decision or detract from its efficacy as a judgment upon the questions presented, and its subsequent conclusive effect upon the rights of the electric company.'

"The case was originally heard in the federal District Court (257 Fed. 197), where Mr. Justice Van Fleet, speaking for the court, said: I am unable to perceive how the objection that the action of the state court is conclusive of the controversy, and that plaintiff is now precluded from bringing the same grievance here, may be avoided. It has had its day in court. * * * The contention by plaintiff that the ruling of the state court is not a proper predicate for invoking the doctrine of res judicata, in that it is not a judgment "on the merits," but purely a negative determination or refusal to assume jurisdiction, is unsound. We are bound to assume, if we accept the averments of the bill, that the petition put that court in full and complete possession of all the facts upon which it relies here (Detroit & Mackinac R. Co. v. Michigan Railroad Commission); and, that being true, the denial of the petition was necessarily a final judicial determination (Williams v. Bruffy, supra), based on the identical rights asserted in this court, and it was between the same parties. Such a determination is as effectual as an estoppel as would have been a formal judgment upon issues of fact [citing cases]. Nor is it material that the reasons for the conclusion reached by the court are not given. We are not concerned with the reasoning, but only with the judgment, and it must be assumed in support of the latter that upon the facts presented to it the state court upon due consideration reached the conclusion that plaintiff's rights had not been violated.'

"Taking the authorities at face value, the only conclusion which can be reached as applied to the instant case is that the point relied upon by respondent in support of the judgment on the demurrer is res adjudicata and that it is entirely against his contention.

"In view of the fact that the order of the Railroad Commission is considered as being legal in itself, the other objections to the information urged by respondent in this court, apparently for the first time 'in any court,' should receive attention.

[6] "In support of the judgment the first specification by respondent has to do with an alleged lack of findings by the Railroad Commission to the effect that the stages were being operated on the public highway of the state; the argument being that the act under which the Commission assumed to make the order in question conferred jurisdiction upon the Commission in cases of this character only where stages were being operated for compensation upon public highways. But a reference to the findings discloses the fact that counsel is mistaken in that regard; the finding being 'that the operation now being conducted by respondent, * * * its operation as a transportation company as defined in chapter 213, Statutes of 1917, and amendments thereto,' which is the enabling act, and which clearly covers the respondent's objection.

[7] "The second reason assigned by respondent for sustaining the judgment relates to the alleged invalidity of the order of the Commission because of its attempt to enjoin the operation of stages 'over regular routes and fixed termini'; but, as before, in addition to the matter being res adjudicata the enabling act contains language identical with that to which counsel objects. Hence that argument as well as the argument under respondent's third point to the effect that the charges in the information must follow the findings and the order of the Commission, would appear to be not sustainable.

[8] "The objection that the information does not conform to the provisions of section 456 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in that there is no allegation that the order of the Commission was 'duly given or made,' is likewise untenable, for the reason that the information in pleading the determination by the Commission set forth the facts conferring the jurisdiction, rather than adopting the shorter procedure of pleading that the order was duly given or made—both of which methods are recognized and at least impliedly authorized by the section to which reference has just been made.

[9] "The sixth point advanced by respondent herein, in substance, is that the charge in the information that the stages were operated for compensation is a conclusion of law and is indefinite and uncertain as to what is meant by the word 'compensation.' The language of the information in that regard follows the language of the statute; hence, under many decisions of our Supreme Court, the information is unobjectionable in that regard.

"It is urged that the information is faulty in its failure to contain an allegation of service upon defendant of the order of the Commission. The charging part of the information is couched substantially in the language of the section of the act which provides for any violation of the provisions of the act and prescribes the penalty therefor. There is nothing in the act itself which requires service upon any person of any order of the Commission before it shall become operative."

[10] But, according to the terms of that act, the Railroad Commission is vested with the power and authority to supervise and regulate every transportation company in this state; and it was in accordance with that provision that the Railroad Commission acquired and assumed its jurisdiction to enter the order to which reference has heretofore been made. The general powers of the Railroad Commission are prescribed by the Public Utilities Act, and in section 61 thereof is found the following:

> "After the conclusion of the hearing the commission shall make and file its order containing its decision. A copy of such order, certified under the seal of the commission, shall be served upon the corporation or person complained of, or his or its attorney."

The opinion in the case of Clemmons v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 254, 159 Pac. 713, intimates that, in a proceeding of the nature of the matter before the Commission at the time the order here under consideration was made, a necessary part of the duty of the Commission upon making the order was to comply with the terms of the statute by serving upon the corporation or person complained of, or his or its attorney, a copy of such order, certified under the seal of the Commission. The rule appears to be well settled that, where an act not before subject to punishment is declared penal, the mode pointed out for the prosecution of the violators of the act must be strictly pursued. Wharton's Criminal Pleading and Practice, § 230, and cases there cited.

[11-15] The alleged disobedience by defendant of the order of the Railroad Commission is in the nature of a contempt. Affidavits in a contempt proceeding constitute the complaint. Such proceedings are of a criminal nature, and nothing may be indulged in favor of their validity. In the absence of a statement of facts in the affidavit showing in themselves that a contempt has been committed, the court is without jurisdiction. In order that one may be punished for contempt because of the violation of an order of court, it is essential that such person either have actual notice of the making of the order or that personal service of the order be had upon him prior to the time that he is charged with its violation. The failure to charge either such previous knowledge or previous service of the order constitutes a fatal defect in the proceedings, and deprives the court of jurisdiction. Frowley v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 220, 110 Pac. 817; Selowsky v. Superior Court of Napa County, 180 Cal. 404, 181 Pac. 652; Johnson v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 580; Hennessy v. Nicol, 105 Cal. 142, 38 Pac. 649.

In the case of Selowsky v. Superior Court of Napa County, 180 Cal. 404, 181 Pac. 652, it is said:

> "That a proceeding to punish for contempt is criminal in character, and the affidavit which is made the basis of the proceeding is the counterpart of the complaint in a criminal action"—citing cases.

[16] Such being the law with reference to contempt proceedings, it would appear that in this matter an allegation of service upon the defendant of a certified copy of the order of the Commission prior to the date of the alleged disobedience of such order is absolutely essential to the maintenance of the action against him. It is a part of the foundation of the statement of the offense, and without proof of such service the court is without jurisdiction.

There would seem to be no escape from the conclusion that the correctness of the order of the Railroad Commission has already been determined by the Supreme Court. Such being the case, it afforded a sound basis for the issuance herein of the complaint and filing of the information against defendant. But for the sole reason that the information as filed is fatally defective, as herein pointed out, it is ordered that the judgment be and the same is affirmed.

PLUMMER, J. This is an action by the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendants for and on account of damages alleged to have been suffered by him in an automobile accident occurring on the 14th day of July, 1921. The cause was tried before a jury, the plaintiff had judgment, and the defendants appeal

It appears from the pleadings and transcript in this case that the plaintiff in this action on the day above named was driving a Ford automobile on the highway leading from Los Banos towards the town of Volta; that at the same time the defendants, by an employee and one of its partners, were driving a Ford truck belonging to the partnership on the same highway and in the same direction and, before the occurrence of the collision hereinafter referred to, were preceding the automobile driven by the plaintiff; that the driveway consisted of a concrete pavement approximately 16 feet in width; that at a point near where the collision occurred there is a narrow lane leading off from the highway towards the left at an acute angle; that for a time just preceding the reaching of the intersection of the lane with the highway, the Ford truck was proceeding along the right-hand side of said highway and close to the right margin of the pavement. It also appears that there was a roadway of some five feet on either side of the concrete slab upon which an automobile might be driven. It appears that the driver of the truck intended to turn into the lane, above mentioned, and proceed towards his home, and just before reaching the intersection turned in that direction; that at about the same period of time the plaintiff, driving at a speed in excess of that maintained by the truck, was about to and was proceeding to pass the truck on its left-hand side; that while the automobile was so passing the truck, the collision in question occurred. It is alleged on the part of the plaintiff that the driver of the truck turned to the left for the purpose of entering the lane, heretofore mentioned, without extending his arm or giving any visible signal whatever of his intention so to do; and that by reason of such failure, the impact of the two cars took place. On the part of the defendants it is claimed that the injuries suffered by the plaintiff were due to his having driven his automobile against the truck in question and failed to turn sufficiently to the left in passing the truck to allow sufficient clearance between the two machines. The answer of the defendants denies all negligence, but does not allege contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

The testimony introduced on the part of the plaintiff is to the effect that immediately preceding the collision the automobile owned and driven by the defendants was keeping and proceeding along that part of the paved highway where it was legally entitled to be and proceeding in such a position as to permit of safe passage thereby of the Ford automobile being driven by the plaintiff; that the Ford automobile was being driven at a speed of about 25 miles per hour; that the speed of the Ford truck was variously estimated at from 4 to 8 miles per hour. The testimony introduced on the part of the plaintiff is to the effect, also, that the plaintiff gave timely notice by the sounding of the horn with which his automobile was equipped a moment or so preceding his attempted passage of the Ford truck; that prior to the turning of the Ford truck to the leftward, no signal whatever was given of the intent of the driver thereof to turn to the leftward and proceed along the lane leading at an acute angle from the improved highway. On the part of the defendants it is insisted that no turn had been made to the leftward; that the driver of the truck was about to look around, according to his own testimony, to see if the turn to the left could be safely made; and that he put out his left hand as a signal of his intention to turn. The driver of the truck also testified that he did not know that the Ford automobile was coming from the rear and that he had made no turn before he was struck. The Ford automobile continued on for a distance of 40 or 50 feet after the impact before it turned over on the side causing the alleged injuries to the plaintiff constituting the basis for this action. The driver of the Ford truck testified that the hub cap on the right front wheel of the automobile was marked, and that there were no marks on the wheel of the truck.

[1, 2] On the part of the appellant it is insisted that from the estimated distances separating the cars at the instant of time the plaintiff began his attempt to pass the Ford truck and the estimated relative speed of the two cars, that it was absolutely impossible for the collision to have been caused by the driver of the defendants' truck turning to the leftward. The distance each car would run in a second of time is figured out, and the conclusion is sought to be deduced therefrom that, owing to the estimated distances, the version given by the plaintiff and the witnesses is so directly contrary to mathematical calculations as to necessitate a reversal of the judgment of the trial court. Our attention is also called to the laws of nature, the laws of motion, the philosophy of Comte, and the writings of Prof. Tyndall. If the major and minor premise laid down by the appellants were positive facts and not mere estimates, then the mathematical calculations would have convincing weight; but when there is any uncertainty in the basis upon which the argument is founded or the premises from which the conclusion is to be deduced, we do not feel impressed by the so-called mathematical demonstration. Several pages of appellants' brief are also given to the exposition of the laws of nature and of how they should be applied in determining the merits of this cause. We have no quarrel with the laws of nature or the laws of motion. When understood and properly applied, correct results undoubtedly may be reasonably expected; but however this may be, we do not feel at liberty to disregard the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act of the state of California. We do not mean to hold that an act of the Legislature takes precedence of the laws of nature, but we do find that it is more readily applicable in arriving at conclusions in automobile accident cases. The Motor Vehicle Act, by section 20 thereof (St. 1915, p. 406, as amended by St. 1919, p. 214, § 12), requires that a driver of such a vehicle on the public highway, before turning to the left, must give suitable visible signal by extending his hand and arm (not hand), which shall be visible from the rear, or by the use of an approved mechanical or electric device. There is abundant testimony in the transcript, if believed by the jury, to justify the conclusion that the driver of the Ford truck did not do anything of the kind, did not extend his arm and hand or use any means whatever to indicate that he was about to turn into the lane heretofore referred to, and also that the driver of the Ford truck did turn his car to the leftward. Much stress is laid upon the testimony of the plaintiff and criticism directed at the expression "cramped his car into the left" when describing the action of the driver of the Ford truck. It is probable that if the plaintiff had possessed the skill, learning, and ability displayed in appellants' brief, the exact manner in which it is claimed the defendant turned his car towards the left at the period of time when the Ford automobile was attempting to pass the same, a much more luminous description would have been given of the occurrence; but we think the language used was sufficiently definite and explicit to enable a jury of ordinary comprehension to understand what was meant. Such occurrences take place so quickly that it is not to be expected any one would be able to explain step by step the events as they take place or give anything more definite than a general statement of the events as they were impressed upon the mind by the rapidity of their occurrence. We may readily concede that no testimony founded upon impressions received and an almost instantaneously passing view of the events can approach anything like positive assurance, but this applies to the testimony of the witnesses for both the plaintiff and the defendants. The jury has the benefit of the personal presence of the witnesses, and where the testimony is conflicting, if there is any reasonable testimony to support the verdict of the jury, this court is bound thereby. The testimony to which we have referred complies with the requirements of the rule just stated, and hence the alleged insufficient testimony to support the verdict requires no further consideration.

[3-5] It is next insisted that the damages awarded are excessive. The jury fixed the sum at $5,000, in addition to the allowance for the damages to the truck and the moneys expended by the plaintiff for medical attention. The court, however, reduced the total damages allowed to the sum of $3,500. It is still insisted that there is no basis for this allowance. The testimony shows that the injuries were sustained and received on the 14th day of July, 1921. The verdict of the jury was returned on the 14th day of June, 1922, thus a period of 11 months had expired after the injury before the damages were fixed. The plaintiff had a collar bone broken; testified that he had been unable to work or to earn any money since the date of the collision; that it would cost at least the sum of $5 per day to obtain the kind and quality of labor that he theretofore performed; that he had suffered much pain since the time of the injury; that it was impossible for him to raise his arm to his head; that if he tried to get his arm up it pained him; that his left shoulder was "stove up"; that he could lift his left arm to a certain height only by using his right hand and arm in so doing. It further appears that the height to which the plaintiff could lift his left arm was shown in court, but the transcript in this respect is so indefinite that we can arrive at no conclusions upon this point, as the word "showing" is used to illustrate what occurred in court and nothing further is made to appear. It further appears in the testimony that the plaintiff at the time of the injury was the owner of a small vineyard, which he has since sold, and was living off the proceeds thereof. The testimony shows that the medical attendance cost the plaintiff the sum of $100, and that the repairs to his car were approximately the sum of $175, which would leave $3,295 to cover the loss of earnings for the period of 11 months, and such pain and suffering and bodily injury as the plaintiff had endured and received. The loss in earning capacity appears from the testimony to have been reasonably worth the sum of between $1,400 and $1,500. This would leave in the neighborhood of $1,700 to cover the physical suffering and injury. We do not feel that such an award can be declared excessive as a matter of law. Considerable attention is given by appellant to the fact that the jury awarded a larger sum than that allowed to stand by the trial court, and therefore must have been actuated by passion or prejudice. We do not think such a conclusion necessarily follows, as the average man would hesitate a long time before having a collar bone broken and the left arm injured so as to impair its usefulness, and, also, be deprived of his earning capacity for almost one year. We say nothing as to future suffering and inconvenience, because the testimony stops in this particular with the date of the trial, although the inference can readily be drawn therefrom that it must continue for a considerable further period.

[6] The appellants set forth 42 alleged errors of law committed by the court during the course of the trial, 31 of which are based upon instructions refused or given by the court to the jury.

To follow these objections seriatim would entail needless labor and an unwarranted lengthening of this opinion. We have carefully read the instructions and do not find anything inconsistent therein, and, taken as a whole, the instructions given by the court to the jury, we think, fairly and fully informed the jury as to the law applicable to this cause and that nothing was said or omitted which could be reasonably alleged as prejudicial to the appellants in this action. We agree with counsel for the respondent that a reading of the instructions shows that appellants' objections are exceedingly "hypercritical." This is true of nearly all the objections urged in this cause, as one example here will sufficiently establish. The plaintiff alleged in his complaint that his automobile was wrecked and destroyed. The jury found that the automobile was damaged in the sum of $175. Appellants treated this subject as follows:

> "But there was no such issue; the real issue was whether the plaintiff's automobile was 'wrecked and destroyed'; and this very issue illustrates the lack of sound judgment by the jury in dealing with the cause, and their disregard of the actual evidence before them. The plaintiff asserted, not that his automobile was damaged, but that it was 'wrecked and destroyed.'"

We do not know to what extent a Ford car may be damaged before the allegation obtained in plaintiff's complaint may be properly used, but we do know that a jury of ordinary common sense can comprehend the language used in the complaint in this action and apply it to the testimony relating to the injury to the car with the same ability as though the word "damaged" had been used instead of "wrecked and destroyed"; and we also know that the reformed procedure of this state does not require any such refinement of language.

[7] The appellants, also, urge that the trial court erred in denying their motion for a new trial based upon affidavits of newly discovered evidence. We have read these affidavits, and we agree with the trial court that there is not a sufficient showing therein upon which to grant a new trial. When carefully analyzed, the alleged newly discovered evidence presents nothing not submitted to the jury upon the trial already had. At best, the testimony set out in the affidavits would constitute only additional corroborative testimony. In order to warrant a granting of a new trial on newly discovered evidence, there must be a satisfactory showing that such testimony could not have been obtained by the exercise of reasonable diligence, and in this particular, after reading the affidavits in question, we think the trial court properly exercised its discretion in denying the appellants' motion.

It is hereby ordered that the judgment of the trial court be and the same is hereby affirmed.

Where, in action for damages arising from auto collision, there was testimony for and against on the subject of obstruction of the view of drivers of the respective machines in rounding a curve, it was the duty of trial court to give an instruction pursuant to Motor Vehicle Act, § 22.

4. Trial 🔑253(4)—Requested instruction held properly refused as omitting contributory negligence and not complete.

In action for damages to automobile arising from a collision with defendant's truck, defendant pleading contributory negligence, plaintiff's requested instruction, which omitted reference to contributory negligence and was not a full statement of the law, was properly refused.

5. Trial 🔑260(1)—Refusal to give requested instruction as to matter covered in given instruction not error.

Refusal to give a requested instruction as to matters which were covered in an instruction given held not error.

6. Evidence 🔑596(1)—In civil cases question is whether any particular issue has been established by a preponderance of testimony.

In a civil case, question is whether any particular issue has or has not been established by a preponderance of testimony, and not whether question is left uncertain.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1170(7)—Improper admission of testimony on direct examination of witness on issue of reputation held not prejudicial.

In action for damages to plaintiff's car driven by his minor son, admission, on direct examination, of testimony of what witness had heard with reference to son's fast and reckless driving, held erroneous; but testimony as to reputation having been introduced without objection, and, there being evidence of reckless driving at the time of the collision, admission of the objectional testimony was not, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by U. S. Grant Myers against A. Rovai and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Burnell and H. L. Ford, both of Eureka, for appellant.

Metzler & Mitchell, of Eureka, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff began this action for the purpose of recovering of and from the defendants the sum of $1,325 damages alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff for and on account of a certain automobile collision occurring on the 20th day of July, 1921, between an automobile belonging to the plaintiff and driven by a son of the plaintiff and a truck belonging to the defendants and driven by the defendant M. Rovai. The case was tried before a jury, the defendants had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals.

It appears from the complaint that on the said 20th day of July, 1921, an automobile belonging to the plaintiff was being driven by Sidney Myers, a minor son of the plaintiff, in a southerly direction on the public highway between Pepperwood and Englewood in the county of Humboldt; that as said automobile proceeded along said highway it reached a point thereon where the road makes a curve of about 34 degrees; that at said time the defendants were driving a truck in a northerly direction on said highway and at a point approximately midway on said curve the automobile and truck collided. The force of the collision practically demolished the automobile and also inflicted some minor injuries upon the plaintiff's son. The defendants, in their answer, among other things, pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

[1] Upon this appeal the appellant urges the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, errors in the admission of testimony, and errors in the instructions given by the court to the jury.

There is a sharp conflict in the testimony especially that relating to the speed at which the plaintiff was driving immediately preceding the time of the collision. The plaintiff's son testified that he was driving at between 20 and 25 miles an hour when he first saw the truck at a place about 35 feet distant from the point of the collision. Other witnesses riding in the automobile testified that it was traveling at about the same rate of speed. Other witnesses in the automobile did not estimate the speed. The driver of the truck and lookout, who was riding on the truck, and some of the witnesses testified that the plaintiff was going at a very rapid rate of speed. Some of the witnesses testified that when the automobile reached the curve it was running at a rate of speed between 40 and 45 miles an hour. There is, also, sharp conflict as to the exact location of the automobile and the truck at the time of the impact, and, also, whether there was or was not room to have passed the truck without injury. There was, also, testimony that the automobile was being driven at such a high rate of speed over the graveled road that it was swaying from side to side. The testimony of several of the witnesses, among them Vada Myers, Harold E. Sawyer, and others, was to the effect that willows and small trees growing alongside the road at the point of the curvature therein obstructed the view of the highway so that an approaching automobile could be seen for only a short distance. Other witnesses testified that from a point along a line of the center of the highway the view was unobstructed for a distance of several hundred yards or more. It appears from the testimony that the trees and willows along the curve in the road had been removed since the time of the collision, which may or may not account for some of the discrepancy in the testimony. Whatever the facts may have been at the time of the trial, there is sufficient testimony in the record from which the jury was entitled to conclude that at the time of the collision the view of the driver of the truck and of the driver of the automobile rounding the curve in question was more or less obstructed, and such as to come within the purview of section 22 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 220) as it then read. It would serve no useful purpose to set forth the testimony, and all that needs to be said is that it is conflicting in this case, and, if the jury believed the testimony offered on the part of the defense, the verdict is amply sustained, even though it be true that the testimony offered on the part of the plaintiff would also have sustained a verdict had the jury found in his favor.

[2] The appellant urgently insists that the trial court erred in giving the following instruction:

> "That said Sidney Myers failed to keep on the right-hand side of the road, and that said Sidney Myers' rapid driving in excess of the speed limits and by reason of his failure to keep on the right side of the highway, his machine was driven against the motor vehicle being operated by the defendant Rovai and it collided with said auto truck."

Were this the instruction given by the trial court to the jury, nothing would be left but to enter an order of reversal. Such, however, is not the instruction. It is simply an excerpt taken from a longer instruction setting forth the defense interposed by the defendants in the action. That instruction reads as follows:

> "The defendants in their answer allege that Sidney Myers, minor son of plaintiff, was driving and operating plaintiff's automobile at the time of the collision in a careless, negligent and reckless manner, and at a rate of speed in excess of the speed limit, and that at or near the point of collision, while the two motor vehicles that collided, both of them making a curve in the highway, each motor vehicle being driven in the opposite direction, that said Sidney Myers failed to keep on the right-hand side of the road, and that by reason of said Sidney Myers' rapid driving, in excess of the speed limit, and by reason of his failure to keep on the right side of the highway, his machine was driven against the motor vehicle being operated by defendant M. Rovai, and did collide with said auto truck. The defendant alleges that the fast and reckless speed of said Sidney Myers, and his failure to drive his car on the right-hand side of the highway contributed to the collision, and that he, the said Sidney Myers, was guilty of contributory negligence. Defendants further allege in the answer to the said complaint, that said plaintiff U. S. Grant Myers was guilty of contributory negligence to allow his son Sidney Myers, a minor, to drive his automobile on the highway."

The underscored portion of the foregoing instruction shows the excerpt which appellant has lifted bodily from the context and presented to us as the instruction given by the learned trial court. Comment is unnecessary further than to add that taking of excerpts from the body of an instruction and presenting them to an appellate court is seldom successful. We are accustomed to read the instructions in their entirety.

[3] Instruction number 24, given by the court to the jury at the request of the defendant, is also assigned as error. This instruction follows the language of section 22 of the Motor Vehicle Law as it read at the time of the collision, in relation to driving around curves, and, as we have heretofore shown, there was testimony in the case both for and against on the subject of the view of the drivers of the respective machines being obstructed at the point of the collision. It was the duty of the court to give said instruction. Whether the view was in fact obstructed or unobstructed is not for this court to say. There was testimony in the case on that subject, and, therefore, called for such an instruction.

[4] Instruction No. 8, asked for by the plaintiff, omits all reference to contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, is not a full statement of the law and was, therefore, properly refused.

[5] Instruction No. 9, requested by the plaintiff, also refused, was, so far as it states the law, correctly included in instruction No. 10, given at the request of the plaintiff. Instruction No. 10 is as follows:

> "If you believe from the evidence, by a preponderance thereof, that the defendants at the time of the collision in question were on the westerly side of the state highway, proceeding in a northwesterly direction thereon and that they were then on the left side of the said public highway as they proceeded northwesterly thereon, and that the road, at the time and place mentioned in the complaint, was not clear and unobstructed for at least 100 yards ahead of them, then you are instructed that the defendants' motor truck was not driven and operated by them upon the side of the public highway where the said motor truck was entitled to be driven and operated when proceeding in a northwesterly direction. And the presence of said automobile truck driven and operated by defendants on the left side of the said highway under such circumstances, if it was there, would be negligence on the part of the defendants, and if you find from the evidence by a preponderance thereof that the defendants were negligent in that regard, that such negligence, if any there was, was the proximate cause of the injuries complained of in the plaintiff's complaint, that neither the said plaintiff nor the said Sidney Myers were guilty of any negligence contributing to the injury complained of, then and under such circumstances your verdict should be in favor of the plaintiff for such damages as he has sustained as shown by the evidence in this case."

[6] Instruction No. 11, as modified by the court, also properly states the law. In civil cases it is not a matter of whether a question is left uncertain by the testimony, but whether any particular issue has or has not been established by a preponderance of the testimony.

Objections are also urged to defendants' instructions given by the court, but as they are only of minor importance it would serve no useful purpose to set them forth in this opinion. A careful consideration of all the instructions given by the court shows that the law applicable to this case was fully, clearly, and fairly given by the trial court to the jury.

[7] Finally, it is urged that the court erred in the admission of certain testimony and with this contention we readily agree, but that a reversal of the judgment should follow does not seem to us a necessary conclusion in view of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution relative to the improper admission or rejection of testimony. One of the issues presented to the jury was that of rapid and reckless driving of the plaintiff's minor son, a boy then of the age of about 16 years. After witnesses had testified, without objection, as to the reputation of the boy for reckless and rapid driving, the following question was asked: "Q. Did you ever hear anybody say it was a wonder he did not have an accident?" This question was objected to, the objection overruled and the witness answered "Yes." Again, the same witness was asked as follows: "Was it the general talk of about all the people along the highway there about his reckless driving, so the men upon the highway knew the way he drove?" This question was also objected to, and the same ruling made. The witness answered: "I have heard the remark made that sooner or later he would meet his 'Waterloo.'" No motion was made to strike out this answer on the ground it was not responsive. One or two other questions of like import were allowed to be answered over the objection of the appellant. The cases having to do with this subject are all very clear as to the questions permitted to be asked on direct examination of a witness when the subject of one's reputation for any particular trait is properly in issue and is being inquired into. None of them sanction the admission of the testimony above set forth, but, in view of the fact that testimony was introduced without objection showing the reputation of the boy in question for reckless and rapid driving, the fact that some of the witnesses stated on direct examination just what they had heard cannot, in view of the constitutional provision above referred to, be held prejudicial. There is plenty of testimony set forth in the transcript upon which the jury was entitled to base its verdict, irrespective of the reputation of the boy for rapid driving. There was testimony to the effect that he was driving from 35 to 40 miles per hour a few moments preceding the collision and also that he was driving from 20 to 25 miles per hour on a portion of the highway where the jury might from the testimony conclude that such a rate of speed was reckless and careless; hence the reputation of the boy for rapid and reckless driving becomes immaterial, in view of the fact of the existence of the testimony from which the jury might arrive at the conclusion that the driver of the automobile was driving at a rapid and reckless rate of speed at the time of the collision.

No other matters having been presented for our consideration in this cause, we conclude that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

James F. Peck, of Oakland, for appellant.
A. L. Cowell, of Stockton, and F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. The plaintiff, the appellant herein, as an owner of land situated in the county of Merced and within the exterior boundaries of the Merced irrigation district, began this action for the purpose of restraining the irrigation district and its directors from entering into a certain contract obligating the district to pay to certain persons, hereafter designated as contract holders, annually for 17 years the sum of $70,000 and upward. The trial court sustained the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint without leave to amend, and thereafter entered judgment in favor of the defendants.

Prior to the formation of the Merced Irrigation District the Merced Canal & Irrigation Company and its successor, the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, entered into contracts with divers persons by the terms and conditions of which contracts said canal company and its successor, the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, agreed to supply water from their canal system to such persons for the purposes of irrigation. These contracts differ somewhat in formation, but are separable into different classes, one of the contracts of each class being attached to the plaintiff's complaint as exhibits, to wit, Exhibits A to P, inclusive. These contracts bound the Merced Canal & Irrigation Company and its successor, the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, to furnish water for irrigating the number of acres of land set out in each particular contract for a period of years—the period being fixed in each contract. Some of these contracts, such as followed the form of Exhibit A, provided for the payment of a certain cash sum, which was therein specified, for a water right not exceeding 2½ cubic feet per second for irrigating the land therein described from the date of the contract up to and including the 3d day of March, 1933. Other contracts, as evidenced by the remainder of exhibits attached to plaintiff's complaint and executed by the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, provided for the payment of a certain sum in cash upon the execution of the contract and further annual payments in a specified sum during the life of the contract, to wit, from the date of the execution thereof in 1892 until April 30, 1938. It would appear, from an examination of the transcript, that practically all of the contracts entered into by the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company expire at about the same time, to wit, in April 1938. The total area of land covered by the contracts just referred to is slightly in excess of 52,379 acres.

In 1920, after due and regular proceedings, the defendant the Merced irrigation district was regularly formed. This district comprises an area of 185,000 acres, including the 52,379 acres covered by the contracts hereinbefore referred to. After the organization of the said Merced irrigation district and prior to the commencement of this action the district purchased of the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company all its water and water rights and its system of canals and irrigation ditches for the sum of $2,500,000. After a suit had been begun by some of the contract holders against the defendant Merced irrigation district to determine and establish the rights of the contract holders herein referred to, it appears negotiations for a settlement were entered into which finally culminated in a contract drawn in the form as attached to plaintiff's complaint, and marked Exhibit Q.

The said contract involved in this action is proposed to be executed by the Merced irrigation district as a party of the first part and the contract holders herein referred to as parties of the second part. This agreement recites the execution of the contracts by the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, while the owners of certain water and water rights system of canals, etc., with the contract holders as hereinbefore referred to; that the district has acquired by purchase the water and water rights of the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, its system of canals and irrigation ditches; and that the rights of the contract holders to receive water at the price designated in the contracts heretofore referred to should be extinguished and acquired by the district, therefore, it is agreed on the part of the district to pay annually to the contract holders or their assigns the sum of $70,000 per year for the period of 17 years from and after the 1st day of July, 1924, provided the costs and expenses of operating the district should not exceed the sum of $146,666; that, in the event the costs and expenses of operating the district should exceed that sum, 85 per cent. of such excess should be paid to said contract holders. In fixing the costs and expenses of $146,666 per annum certain specified costs and expenses and items to be considered are set forth in the agreement. On the part of the contract holders it is then covenanted and agreed that, in consideration of the provisions of said agreement relative to payment of said sum or sums, certain rights and privileges were released as follows, to wit:

> "In consideration of the foregoing covenants and other provisions of this agreement the said contract holders and each thereof hereby severally waive and release to the district all and any rights which they may have under the said contracts to receive water from the district or from the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, or from any other person, for the amounts > or at the rates specified in said contracts, and agree to pay the assessments heretofore levied by said district, and hereby agree on their own behalf and on behalf of their successors in ownership of the land to which said contract is attached not to contest any assessment hereafter levied by said district in accordance with law by reason of dues, rights, privileges or immunity growing out of their rights under said contracts."

The agreement then provides that the contract holders will pay several assessments levied by the district against them in the year 1922, and the district agrees to accept payment thereof without exacting penalty. Paragraph 8 of the agreement purports to waive the right of the district to exact water tolls and also for the repayment of certain amounts theretofore paid by the contract holders under their contract during the year 1922. Said paragraph 8 is as follows:

> "After the execution of this agreement the said district agrees to raise funds for the maintenance and operation of the said district, and for the retirement of its bonds and for other purposes, by assessments levied in accordance with law, and waives all right to exact the sums specified in said contracts, and agrees not to establish or exact water tolls or rentals for the use of water, and the amounts paid by the said contract holders under the said contracts in the year 1922 shall be refunded by the said district or credited by the said district on the assessment of 1922 against the said contract holders."

Paragraph 9 of the agreement specifically limits the extent of the waiver or conveyance or surrender of rights on the part of the contract holders to the amount of money agreed to be paid by them annually for the use of the water and the exercise of their water rights; that nothing further is intended to be relinquished or affected by the agreement so far as their rights may be concerned. Paragraph 9 is as follows:

> "Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to waive any right which the said contract holders may have, either under the said contracts or otherwise, to a preferred right to receive water from the said canals of the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company, it only being intended hereby to waive and relinquish their right to receive it at the particular rate specified in said contracts, nor shall anything herein contained be deemed as an admission by the said district that the said contract holders have any such preferred right, either under said contracts or otherwise. Nor shall anything herein be construed as in any way relinquishing any easements, rights, or privileges of the said district under said contracts, except the right to receive the several annual payments provided for in said contracts."

It is further covenanted that the agreement shall be set up in a supplemental pleading in the suit begun as aforesaid to determine the rights of the contract holders and that judgment should be entered fixing their rights as herein set forth. It is also further provided in the contract that 5 per cent. of the total amount to be paid to each contract holder was assigned to their attorney as compensation for fees for services in connection with the settlement and adjustment agreed upon.

The complaint of the plaintiff in this action sets forth all the matters herein referred to, alleges the invalidity of the agreement about to be entered into by the Merced irrigation district with said contract holders, and seeks an injunction to restrain the defendants from entering into such agreement. In addition to alleging the ultra vires nature of said contract, it is alleged that, if carried out, it will impose an unequal burden upon the landholders of the district.

On the part of the appellant it is insisted that the proposed agreement, if executed, would prove highly detrimental to the interests of the district, and on the part of the respondents it is argued that the results would prove beneficial. With this phase of the question, however, we will express no opinion, as it does not really affect the issues to be determined, there being no allegations of fraud or anything of that character in the complaint which calls in question the results that would be reached by the agreement if executed and carried through to final completion. We have to do only with the question of whether the proposed agreement is or is not ultra vires.

Section 2 of the California Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended by St. 1919, p. 717, § 2) as it read at the time of the formation of the defendant Merced irrigation district provides as follows:

> "Lands already irrigated and riparian lands may be included in the district if in the judgment of the board of supervisors such land will be benefited, or if the water used thereon or the rights to the use of water thereon should, in the judgment of the board of supervisors, be taken or acquired for the district."
